PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 95th CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

SENATE—Thursday, March 23, 1978

(Legislative day of Monday, February 6, 1978)

The Senate met at 9:30 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, in executive session, and was called to order by Hon. ROBERT C. BYRD, a Senator from the State of West Virginia.

PRAYER

Almighty and Eternal God, as the Passover event is recalled and the institution of the wondrous sacrament of the body and blood of the Redeemer is celebrated, and we walk again the way of the Cross, grant to all of us an understanding of Thy mighty acts for our salvation. When Easter Day dawns enable us to arise in newness of life to serve Thee more faithfully and to obey Thy spirit more perfectly. Strengthen us in our work this day. Watch over us in our travels, in our going out and our coming in, in our lying down and our rising up until we gather again to serve the Nation in this place. Keep us sound in faith, steadfast in hope, and persevering in love.

And to Thee shall be all the praise and glory. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. EASTLAND).

The assistant legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D.C., March 23, 1978.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable ROBERT C. BYRD, a Senator from the State of West Virginia, to perform the duties of the Chair.

JAMES O. EASTLAND,
President pro tempore.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

SPECIAL ORDERS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from New York (Mr. JAVITS) is recognized, as in legislative session, for not to exceed 15 minutes.

Without prejudice, the Chair at this time, under a previous order, recognizes the Senator from Missouri (Mr. DANFORTH), as in legislative session, for not to exceed 15 minutes.

TAX CUT PLAN

S. 2811, S. 2812, S. 2813, S. 2814, AND S. 2815

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I join my colleague, Senator JAVITS, in introducing on our own behalf, and on the behalf of Senators PERCY, CHAFEE, LUGAR, and STEVENS, a proposal for reducing Federal taxes on individuals and businesses. We are presenting our proposal as an alternative to President Carter's plan—a plan which in our view overpromises what it will do for individuals, and does not do nearly enough for business.

In many ways, this proposal evolved from a tax cut plan advanced early last year by Senate Republicans as an alternative to President Carter's ill-fated scheme to give $50 to every American. At that time, we proposed a permanent tax cut, and we continue to propose permanent tax cuts today.

The President now has joined our call for permanent tax cuts. Unfortunately, his proposal fails to live up to the inflated claims made for it.

We have worked for several months to construct a plan which is responsible, and, we believe, superior to the President's plan in every way. We have consulted extensively with a group of business leaders and economists whose knowledge and ability are widely recognized.

The plan we have developed is a good one. It strikes a careful balance between the conflicting needs to maintain and encourage economic growth, to avoid unacceptable inflationary pressures, and to improve business confidence by creating a stable and predictable economic climate.

To understand our proposal, it may be useful to remind you of what has been said about President Carter's plan. In describing his tax proposal, President Carter stated at a press conference on January 12, 1978:

> We intend to do all three things—to compensate for increases in social security taxes, to keep the economy moving strongly, and also to compensate for the effects of inflation.

In his state of the Union address, the President declared that "96 percent of American taxpayers will see their taxes go down," and his tax package itself emphatically proclaimed "it is now time for another tax reduction to offset the effects of inflation." I heartily support each of these objectives. The Federal tax burden on individuals will increase during the period 1977 through 1980 by nearly $35 billion as a direct result of inflation pushing individuals into higher marginal tax brackets and the scheduled social security tax increases.

Nevertheless the tax program the administration proposes does not achieve the objectives the President proclaimed. I am submitting a chart to be included in the RECORD which illustrates the degree to which the President's tax cut fails to offset inflation and social security by 1980.

As can be seen from this chart, the only individuals who actually receive a real tax cut are those with incomes between $7,600 and $12,500, a group which hardly constitutes 96 percent of the American taxpayers. In fact this group of beneficiaries of the President's tax package consists of less than 20 percent of those individuals who pay income taxes. Nearly 80 percent of the American taxpayers come out of the Carter tax package as losers by 1980.

The administration has indicated that while this might be true for 1980, the administration fully intends to reevaluate the situation in 1980 and propose another tax cut at that time. But is this a realistic possibility? The President entered office on January 20, 1977, talking about a tax cut. He suggested a temporary $50 rebate in the spring of 1977 pending a comprehensive tax plan to be introduced later. On January 19, 1978, a full year after entering office, the President unveiled his tax plan and it will take this Congress at least another 8 months to pass a tax cut which will become effective October 1, 1978, at the earliest, and possibly not until January 1979. This means that the gestation period for a tax bill would be about 2 years and, if the administration proposal prevails, by their own admission it is likely to be outdated a year later.

The tax package we are introducing today shares some of the same goals expressed by the President, but unlike the President's plan, our plan accomplishes those goals for all income levels and is not outdated a year later.

We propose tax cuts for individuals that are intended to offset for 3 years the impact of inflation and to limit the impact of higher social security taxes. Further, we propose tax cuts for business that are intended to improve business confidence by doing the following: providing predictable and lower corporate tax rates; improving investment incentives; and permitting better means to achieve full capital cost recovery.

Let me describe our proposal to offset the impact of inflation. Inflation is the cruelest tax of all, because it is deceptive and it is hidden. Inflation causes wages to rise. However, because our tax system is progressive, as wages rise, so also does the rate of taxation we must pay on those increased earnings. Therefore, an inflation-triggered pay increase may push a person into a higher tax bracket, and he or she may actually be worse off than before.

This inflation effect increases Government revenues over what they otherwise would have been. Then, the Congress in its wisdom and benevolence can do one of two things with this dividend: It can increase Federal spending or it can generously announce a tax cut. The folly of all this is that there is no tax cut at all. Instead, in the name of a tax cut, taxpayers are permitted to keep what is rightfully theirs in the first place.

The President claims to correct this problem—for 1 year at least—in his tax plan. He fails. His package of rate cuts, conversion of the personal exemption to a credit, and so-called tax reforms simply do not do the job.

The only proper way to offset the effects of inflation is to widen the marginal tax brackets and increase the personal exemption, the standard deduction, the general tax credit, and the earned income credit. Our proposal will do exactly that for 3 years; that is, through 1980—at a fixed rate of 6 percent.

Some might call this proposal indexing, but it is distinguishable from indexing in two ways. First, we adjust the tax code by a straight 6 percent, not by the amount of inflation actually experienced. Second, indexing involves a permanent change in the tax structure to offset inflation forever. Although such a permanent change ultimately may be advisable, and I supported such a move last year, we did not feel that such a dramatic change was possible this year. Our proposal would permit a 3-year trial run of the concept, and would provide important relief and protection during that period.

The second part of our tax cuts for individuals is a tax credit equal to 10 percent of social security taxes paid. Once again, the President claimed that his plan would offset the effect of social security tax increases. Once again, his proposal fails to achieve the stated objective.

We do not attempt to offset the impact of social security by reducing Federal income tax rates—as President Carter does—for several reasons. First of all, a general tax reduction would affect all taxpayers, including the millions of Federal, State, and local government employees who do not pay social security taxes.

Second, a reduction in tax rates would provide insufficient help to those hardest hit by social security increases—two-earner families. Our proposed tax credit would provide "double" relief for such persons.

Finally, we do not believe the social security tax credit is the best long-range solution to the social security financing problem. Assuming a better means can be found to restructure the social security system, and I intend to speak to that question in the very near future, the proposed tax credit can be fairly easily eliminated if that should become a desirable course of action.

One thing should be pointed out about the social security tax credit—it will not offset fully the social security tax increase for individuals earning more than $18,000. This is in recognition of the fact that individuals with incomes above that level will be entitled to additional social security benefits as a result of the changes voted into law last year. Therefore, it is not unreasonable to have such persons bear a somewhat higher social security tax burden.

However, under our proposal, no taxpayer's Federal tax burden—social security and income tax combined—will increase by more than $220. This is a dramatic change from the administration's proposal.

I ask unanimous consent that a table I am submitting be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. DANFORTH. Now I would like to outline our proposals for business tax reductions. Let me preface this section with a statement about one of the most serious problems facing our economy today—the critical erosion of business confidence.

Business confidence is an intangible concept measured in very tangible ways—the stock market, the level of capital investment, the level of employment, the willingness to take risks, and so on. The private sector of our economy is an easy target for criticism by every conceivable interest group, yet it is the business sector which provides us with the jobs, the technical innovation, and the vitality to maintain the highest standard of living in the world today. When business confidence suffers, America suffers.

The Federal Government plays a very large role in determining how business perceives the future. Government spending policies affect the size of the Federal deficit and the rate of inflation; Federal tax policies directly affect the rate of return a business can receive on its investment; Federal credit policies cause abrupt changes in the relative attractiveness of different kinds of investment; Federal trade policies directly affect the balance of payments and the strength of the dollar; U.S. foreign policy influences investment decisions abroad; and Federal regulatory policies place a tremendous financial burden on all kinds of business. Perhaps the greatest problem generated by the Federal Government, though, is the constant change in all of these policies.

I am convinced that this Nation's private sector has the resilience and inventiveness to adapt to just about anything the Government can do to it—except when Government changes the rules in the middle of the game. And that is what we do all the time.

We change the tax laws year after year. We encourage businesses to convert from coal to oil and back to coal again. We encourage utilities to build nuclear powerplants and then make it impossible for them to do so. We increase the minimum wage that business must pay to labor, we tell them what kind of pension plans they must provide, what kind of health insurance they must purchase, and at what age they may ask an employee to retire. We in Government do all these things with very good intentions and then we change the rules—again, and again, and again.

Needless to say, our tax bill will not change all this. But it does make an important, if modest, beginning.

Our bill is a signal to business that we intend to let up on it—at least a little bit. Not only that, but we intend to phase in our tax proposals over a 5-year period with the specific goal of creating a tax environment that is more predictable than any tax proposal in recent legislative history.

The business portion of our plan has five components.

First, we offer a reduction in the maximum corporate tax rate from 48 to 42 percent. This cost is phased in over a 5-year period between 1978 and 1983. These rate cuts will assist all employers, whether they are capital intensive or labor intensive, and will provide maximum flexibility to the individual business in deciding how best to use its increased aftertax profits.

Second, we offer a graduated corporate tax on the first $200,000 of corporate income to assist small businesses. These businessmen were largely ignored in the administration's proposal. Yet, small businesses account for 55 percent of U.S. employment and nearly half of the total U.S. output. Furthermore, small businesses have historically been the source of many of this country's most innovative business developments. We feel it is imperative that the business tax plan allocate a larger share of the tax cut to this important segment of the business community.

Third, our proposal would reduce the period over which assets are depreciated under the ADR system of depreciation. This provision is intended to offset the debilitating effect of inflation on capital cost recovery. Our tax system provides that the cost of a business asset shall be recovered over the productive life of that asset. Thus, where a machine costs the business $100 in 1978 and will be productive until 1988, the business is entitled to recover the $100 investment over this 10-year life. Unfortunately, the recoupment of the 100 nominal dollars during a 10-year inflationary period is far less in real dollars than the $100 original cost. Present law recognizes this discrepancy and allows businesses to depreciate their machines and equipment over a period up to 20 percent less than the productive life of the asset so as to reduce the effect of inflation on cost recovery. However, a 20-percent shorter life is simply not a sufficient inflation offset in our current inflationary environment. Therefore, we propose to allow businesses to recover their capital cost investment over a period up to 40 percent less than the productive life of the asset. It should be noted that this proposal does not allow depreciation deductions in excess of the original cost of the asset, but only accelerates the time period in which the cost can be recovered so as to minimize the devastating effects of inflation.

Fourth, we expand the effectiveness of the investment tax credit by permanently increasing the rate from 10 to 12 percent and providing that 25 percent of the credit remaining after offsetting current year tax liability will be refunded. This latter provision will aid small and growth-oriented businesses, and is based upon the conviction that the investment tax credit subsidy should be based upon the level of investment and not upon the profitability or taxability of the enterprise. The provision should increase the level of competition between businesses in the same industry rather than encourage dominance by the largest company in the industry as present law often does. It will also provide for the first time an investment credit to nonprofit institutions in recognition of the fact that many of their capital investments provide the identical economic stimulus as private investment decisions.

Finally, our proposal would extend the coverage of property eligible for the investment tax credit to commercial and industrial structures in geographic areas of high unemployment. We are convinced that the President's proposal would encourage businesses to leave already depressed inner city areas.

The overall cost of our plan will be $25 billion in fiscal 1979 (approximately the same as President Carter's plan) and $36 billion for calendar year 1979 (as compared to $24.5 billion under the President's plan). The 1980 calendar year revenue loss will be $51 billion. Although the President's revenue loss for 1980 is estimated to be only $27.68, it must be noted that the administration already admits that an additional tax cut will almost certainly be needed in that year.

All in all, we believe our proposal directly meets the most pressing needs of this Nation's citizens, its businesses, and its economy. We sincerely hope that our colleagues in the Congress will study its provisions and become convinced, as we have, of its wisdom.

Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DANFORTH. How much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 5 minutes remaining.

Mr. DANFORTH. I yield that 5 minutes to the Senator from Illinois.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I am very pleased to join my distinguished colleagues in introducing this comprehensive tax reduction proposal.

This proposal has three basic purposes: First, to offset the increases inflation will create in individual income tax payments; second, to significantly limit the impact of recently enacted social security tax increases; and third, to assist our businesses in meeting their investment capital needs. This legislation will protect the average taxpayer's purchasing power and standard of living, create renewed confidence by consumers and business leaders, and lay the basis for new jobs and stable growth in the private sector.

Typically, tax reduction and tax reform proposals ignore the problems and interests of those who bear the most significant burden of Government taxation: The middle-income worker. Taxpayers who earn between $10,000 and $29,000 pay over 50 percent of all Federal income taxes. Taxpayers who earn between $10,000 and $24,000 pay over 44 percent of all Federal income taxes. These taxpayers are considered too "rich" to be eligible for Government benefits. But it is these middle-income families who are faced with an average price of $6,200 for a new car, with an average price of $50,300 for a home, and with an average price of $12,000 to $19,600 to provide a college education for one child.

The most significant factor in the growing burden borne by middle-income taxpayers is inflation. It has only been recently that this impact has been generally recognized, although it has been a major one for several years. Even workers who have been fortunate enough to receive wages which have kept pace with inflation have been negatively affected, because our progressive tax rates take a larger bite of income without the worker having attained increased purchasing power.

Assuming a 6-percent annual rate of inflation over the next 3 years, the average taxpayer making $10,000 today will pay $230 more in taxes in 1980 if his wages rise by only enough to keep up with inflation. Taxpayers earning $20,000 today will pay $268 more and those earning $30,000 will pay $524 more. Just to stay even, a family's income must rise faster than the inflation rate.

Inflation has had as insidious an effect on the tax bite taken from capital gains. Upon the sale of an asset such as a home, the seller must pay taxes on the increase in value due to inflation, regardless of whether there has been a real gain. Any incentive for investment is greatly reduced when one must pay a real tax on a paper gain.

Uncle Sam has not been so unfortunate: A 10-percent increase in inflation reaps a 16.5-percent increase in Government revenues.

It is these middle-income families who are usually forgotten and often hurt by tax reduction and tax reform proposals.

The great irony of the administration's tax proposals is that rather than assisting 96 percent of taxpayers as promised, they assist less than 20 percent and actually leave those with incomes under $7,600 and over $23,500 less well off.

By 1980, under the administration bill, taxpayers who now earn between $5,000 and $8,000 will pay approximately $128 per year more in inflation taxes plus several more dollars in new social security taxes. The bill will not cover inflation taxes for those earning $20,000 or more and those workers will be faced with social security tax increases of up to $368.

Even those for whom the bill provides total inflation relief are not secure once new social security taxes are considered: In 1980, only taxpayers earning between $7,600 and $12,500 will actually receive a tax cut from the administration's tax cut bill.

Furthermore, the administration proposal will actually raise the taxes of middle-income taxpayers in the name of closing loopholes of the rich. I have never seen a definition of "loophole" that everyone could agree on, but it is a statistical fact that the higher an individual's income, the less it is sheltered by exemptions and deductions. Deductions amount to 48.9 percent of the income of those earning under $10,000; they amount to only 22.8 percent of the income of those earning over $25,000. In addition, fringe benefits are considerably more important to the standard of living of a middle-income family than they are to the wealthy. To reduce or eliminate deductions for fringe benefits, medical and casualty expenses, and State sales taxes will hurt most those who are alleged to benefit from the revenues these changes will raise.

The proposal we are introducing today avoids these shortcomings. It provides a permanent tax cut which will give total protection to all taxpayers against inflation for the next 3 years, and it gives nearly total protection to most taxpayers against new social security taxes. Only workers earning over $18,000 would pay additional taxes in 1980 and those would in part be made up through their eligibility for higher social security benefits upon retirement.

Finally, our proposal lays the basis for private sector jobs and growth by reducing corporate tax rates and increasing the return on investment.

At a recent hearing, Federal Reserve Board Chairman G. William Miller stated the need that the business section of our proposal is designed to address:

> The encouragement of greater capital spending must be an integral part of any comprehensive national policy to achieve full employment, price stability, and a sound dollar internationally. Our efforts in this regard should be directed at both increasing the flow of savings available to private businesses and increasing the willingness of firms to undertake productive investment.

Our tax cuts are drafted as a 5-year program so that business planners will know what their obligations to the Federal Government will be and what assets they will have for modernization and growth. There is probably no single action we could take that would have a more positive impact on business confidence.

In conclusion, Mr. President, the program we are introducing today is a sound one. The additional increase in the Federal deficit that it necessitates will be a temporary one, because the new jobs and investment it creates will reduce Federal expenditure and generate new revenues. It is a program that will have a lasting impact. We cannot legislate consumer confidence on an annual basis. Taxpayers, whether families or businesses, must be able to count on continued income and not have today's tax cut taken back by next year's tax increase.

I merely want to add this, as an updated report to our distinguished colleague from New York and our distinguished colleague from Missouri, whose electorate is not, after all, very different from that in Illinois. Senator DANFORTH'S constituency is right across the river. We share many of the same problems. Some people live in Illinois and work in St. Louis, and vice versa.

Today, in Illinois, we are facing a phenomenon of a taxpayers' revolt that is hurting the very people our social programs are designed to help. I was in a school district just 3 days ago that had had five bond issues for education turned down in a row. People are starting to turn down programs, and we are going to do irreparable damage to lower income people if some relief is not found for middle-income people.

It pays to be poor, they say. Then you get a green card and all your hospital expenses are paid. Then you get scholarships for your children. But if you are in that middle-income area, with the crushing tax burden of property taxes and other regressive taxes, plus the progressive income taxation, without a wage increase going beyond inflation, you do not feel that way. They are paying more and more, and they are saying, "We are not going to do it any longer; we are going to find a way to lower our costs," and they are going to revolt against local taxes.

Mr. President, may I have 30 seconds additional?

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I believe I have the next 15 minutes, is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is correct.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. PERCY. I thank my distinguished colleague very much indeed.

I simply wish again to commend the creativity shown by my two colleagues. We are not just saying "no" to the President's package; we are saying, "Let us start with what you have given us." We agree in principle there ought to be tax action, but it ought to be the right kind. It ought to be the kind that will really stimulate not only consumer spending but investment; that will create jobs not in the public sector but in the private sector; that will put people on private payrolls that will pay taxes and lessen this burden for everyone else, and not just in public sector jobs that will cost taxpayers additional money.

We are looking for the right way to do it. We now reach out and say, "Let's work together on this, and here is a creative proposal, not a negative one." We are not saying "No, we don't want to do it," we are saying, "Let's do it the right way and let's find the way."

I strongly believe the leadership that has been provided by our distinguished colleagues is in the right direction, and I shall fight on this floor to help them in every way I possibly can to see that we implement this proposal into law.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an outline summarizing our tax proposal.

There being no objection, the outline was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TAX PROPOSAL

I. INDIVIDUAL TAX REDUCTIONS

Purpose: To offset the expected impact of inflation for three years, and to limit the impact of social security tax increases.

Proposals:

(1) Increase tax brackets, the standard deduction, individual exemptions, and the special credit by 6 percent per year for the next three years. (October 1, 1978, effective date, with subsequent changes occurring January 1 of 1979 and 1980); and

(2) Provide a tax credit equal to 10 percent of social security contributions effective January 1, 1979.

II. BUSINESS TAX REDUCTIONS

Purpose: To improve business confidence by providing predictable and lower corporate tax rates, improving investment incentives, and permitting better means to achieve full capital cost recovery.

Proposals:

(1) Reduce the maximum corporate tax rate to 42 percent by 1983;

(2) Reduce the tax on the first $200,000 of profits to aid small businesses;

(3) Increase the investment tax credit (ITC) from 10 percent to 12 percent and make it permanent;

(4) Make the ITC 25 percent refundable (after offsetting 100 percent of tax liability);

(5) Extend the ITC to industrial and commercial structures in high unemployment areas; and

(6) Expand the accelerated depreciation range (ADR) from 20 to 40 percent.

III. ESTIMATED GROSS COSTS (BILLIONS OF DOLLARS)

	FY 1979	CY 1979	CY 1980
1. Individual tax reductions:
A. Inflation offset	12.0	17.1	27.9
B. 10 percent social security credit	5.0	6.6	7.2
Total individual	17.0	23.7	35.1
2. Business tax reductions:
A. Corporate rate cuts	4.0	5.9	8.2
B. Investment tax credit changes	3.9	5.5	5.3
C. Expanded ADR	0.4	0.9	2.5
Total corporate	8.3	12.3	16.0
Combined total	25.3	36.0	51.1

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY) for his eloquence and for his statement of appreciation to Senator DANFORTH and myself.

Mr. President, today Senator DANFORTH and I, together with Senators CHAFEE, LUGAR, PERCY, and STEVENS, are introducing a legislative package that includes bills that propose tax reductions and targeted economic stimulation as an alternative to the President's proposed tax reduction package.

In a period when our country is trying to sustain healthy economic growth, individuals must be protected from possibly onerous tax burdens stemming from inflation and higher social security taxes. Consumer spending has provided the impetus for the present recovery and we cannot let the purchasing power of the American people be eroded by inflation and cuts in take-home pay as a result of the precarious position of the social security system. The administration's tax plan does not provide this protection.

Continued economic growth basically depends upon the ability of American business to invest and expand, which in the final analysis means more jobs. The only way in which American strength and American prosperity—and the strength and prosperity of the free world can be secure is if the private sector is full of initiative, full of technological advance, and operating in the public and national interest.

Stimulation of capital formation is vital to our recovery and economy. Improved equipment resulting from increased capital formation increases productivity and will help to ease the inflationary pressures plaguing us today and to make us more competitive in world markets. To this end, our business require tax reductions and targeted tax incentives. The administration's plan does not provide the needed stimulus for American business to achieve national goals of employment, capital investment and productivity.

Our package provides $7 billion more in essential relief to the individual than does the administration's, and twice the administration's figure for business.

As an indication of our feelings about the importance of business recovery to the health of the economy, our package would provide business with one-third of the total tax relief, whereas the President's gives business only one-fourth.

We offer two approaches to provide individual tax relief: The first would widen the spread of income in the different tax brackets and increase the standard deduction, individual exemptions, and the special credit by 6 percent each year for the next 3 years. The second would limit the impact of higher social security taxes by giving a tax credit equal to 10 percent of social security contributions. The combined effect on the individual taxpayer of these two elements would be essentially to offset the effects through 1980 of anticipated inflation and the increased social security taxes levied by Congress last December.

Under current law, a typical family of four earning $10,000 would see its tax burden rise by $258 in 1980 because of these factors. The same family earning $15,000 would see its taxes increase $228; at $20,000 taxes would be up $528 and at $25,000 the increase would be $727.

Under our proposal, by 1980, instead of inflation-social security increases, a family earning $10,000 would have taxes reduced by $47. The reduction would be $59 at $15,000. An increase of $125 would occur at $20,000 but from $25,000 up increases would be held to about $219 in all tax brackets. This increase is a small price to pay for the increased social security benefits which the taxpayer would receive at retirement due to the increased earning levels on which taxes are paid.

President Carter promised in his state of the Union address to provide tax cuts to 96 percent of the taxpayers. In fact, by 1980, his proposal would reduce the Federal tax burden only for families earning between $7,600 and $12,500, less than 20 percent of taxpayers. A family earning $30,000 would, in fact, have an increase tax burden of $670—no trifle.

The first element of our proposal, to wit: individual tax relief through an expansion of tax brackets by 6 percent per year, recognizes the impact of inflation on American taxpayers in shifting them into higher and higher tax brackets—the so-called bracket creep, to offset the possible fiscal drag effect on the economy of this phenomenon. I have long been opposed to blanket indexing of the income tax system, but there is a need prudently and judiciously to relieve somewhat this increasing burden. I believe our proposal to compensate prospectively for estimated inflation for this year and the next 2 calendar years appropriately accomplishes this objective.

The other element of the individual tax cut is a credit equal to 10 percent of social security contributions. While I agree that there should be a reexamination of the social security tax increases enacted last December, I do feel this issue needs to be given extensive consideration. Options to balance the social security budget, including funding disability insurance and medicare from general revenues and mandating universal social security coverage, need careful consideration. But because of the time that this will take, we are proposing a tax credit to relieve some of the fiscal drag. This credit has the important side benefit of targeting the relief better than incorporating such relief in a tax rate reduction. The twenty million taxpayers not covered by social security who are not being subjected to higher contributions and to the cut in take-home pay, will get none of this benefit; taxpayers with two earners covered by social security will get relief commensurate with their additional burden; and the credit can be easily eliminated if future changes are made in social security financing. In my judgment, our proposal is an eminently sensible interim measure while we consider the other options.

The cost to the U.S. Treasury in terms of foregone revenue in Fiscal Year 1979 of these individual tax reductions amounts to $17 billion and, for calendar year 1979, $23.7 billion.

Although tax relief for the individual American taxpayer is an important component of our tax reduction package, it is equally vital that American business be provided with the tax relief and investment incentives needed to expand its productivity. It is hard to imagine a strong U.S. economy, which will reassure the foreign exchange markets, without a vibrant business sector prepared to invest heavily in America's future.

To reduce the tax burden on corporations and consequently to increase the funds available for investment purposes, our proposal reduces the maximum corporate tax rate from 48 to 46 percent in 1979 and one additional percentage point annually for a maximum corporate tax rate of 42 percent when fully effective in 1983. This reduction will offset the increased social security burdens on the employers as well as provide additional tax relief for needed capital investment.

We have chosen a 5-year program of incremental corporate tax cuts to facilitate the long-term planning of American business. Business confidence is lacking in part because business is not sure of long-term Government tax policy; this 5-year reduction would permit such certainty in the area of the maximum tax rate that corporations will be expected to pay.

To assist small businesses—the historical source of many of this country's most innovative business developments—we propose larger corporate rate cuts on the first $200,000 of earnings. Under our proposal corporations would pay at a rate of 18 percent on the first $25,000 of income, and 20 percent on the next $25,000 of income. This is a reduction of 2 percent at each of the two income brackets. Whereas under present law corporations pay the maximum tax rate of 48 percent on income above $50,000, under our proposal corporations would pay 30 percent on income between $50,000 and $100,000 and 40 percent on income between $100,000 and $200,000. For income above $200,000 the maximum corporate rate would apply. This will provide essential relief for small businesses, which, even today in the so-called big business, era, remain the heart of the free enterprise system. We must provide relief to those who have devoted long hours to maintaining their independent concerns and whose positions have become increasingly difficult with each new round of the inflation spiral.

While one-half of the estimated $12 billion benefits to corporations is in the form of the corporate rate reductions I have just outlined, the other half takes the form of tax incentives specifically aimed at stimulating capital formation, without which an expanding American economy is but a dream.

The need for increased capital formation is manifest. The ratio of business fixed investment to GNP was down last year to 9.1 percent—a 10-percent decrease from the 10.1-percent average that prevailed from 1965 to 1974. We rank behind all major industrialized nations in investment as a percent of real national output.

A key factor to improving the rate of capital formation is an improvement in our system of capital recovery. Inflation has severely limited the ability of corporations to obtain the intended benefits of our depreciation laws. Corporations pay taxes on current income but receive depreciation allowances based upon historical investment costs. It has been estimated that $12.6 billion of tax revenues last year are attributable to this underdepreciation.

Our capital recovery system is less favorable than that of our major trading partners. With the exception of Japan, where special factors apply, we require considerably longer cost recovery periods for our nonstructural capital investment.

To improve our capital recovery system, we propose to expand the asset depreciation range and modify the investment tax credit. The proposal for ADR is simple—to expand the existing 20-percent range to 40 percent. This would mean that a piece of equipment with a guideline life of 10 years could be depreciated over a period of 6 to 14 years rather than the present 8 to 12 years. This would permit individual businesses to have greater flexibility in tailoring capital recovery to their own particular needs.

Our investment tax credit proposal has four parts. First, we propose increasing the existing tax credit from 10 to 12 percent and making it permanent. This alone together with an expanded ADR would make the cost of investment in equipment almost 5 percent less and would produce, in a rough estimate, approximately 1.5 million jobs.

In addition to the 12-percent credit, we propose to permit corporations to offset up to 100 percent of their tax liability with their ITC. We would also allow corporations, State and local governments, and nonprofit institutions a refundable credit equal to 25 percent of their unused ITC. Finally, we would extend the ITC to industrial and commercial structures in impacted areas of high unemployment for a 5-year period.

I ask unanimous consent that a comparison of our business tax cut package with the President's be inserted in the RECORD at this point in my statement.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, our proposal to allow utilization of the investment tax credit against 100 percent of tax liability and to refund 25 percent of the excess credit would greatly improve the stimulative nature and fairness of the investment credit.

Present law permits credits to be offset against only 50 percent of the amount of income tax liability in excess of $25,000. The portion of the credit which is unused because of insufficient tax liability can be carried back for 3 years or forward for 7 years. Our proposal recognizes the key fact that a dollar invested by an unprofitable company or a nonprofit institution is just as valuable to the economy as a dollar invested by a profitable company. Certainly, loss companies and break-even companies need the benefit of the credit at least as much as the profitable companies.

The limitations in present law result in a basic inequity because those companies with little or no profits or which incur losses, and this includes, in particular, new and growing business enterprises, are unable to realize fully the immediate benefits of the credit enjoyed by their competitors.

One serious defect in President Carter's proposals for business is the extension of the investment tax credit to structures. At a time when our cities are in great need, the President is dealing another blow to their viability by providing another incentive to corporations contemplating a move from the cities. With the higher construction costs generally prevalent in the cities, their choice for relocation will more likely be the suburbs or the sunbelt. By extending the ITC to industrial structures and excluding commercial structures the President is also eliminating the segment of the economy most likely to come into the cities. Increasingly the cities are becoming not the centers of manufacturing they once were but the centers of the service and other types of commercial establishments.

To eliminate the adverse effects of the President's policy and to provide additional incentives to remain in or move to the cities, we propose expanding the ITC to include structures, both industrial and commerical, and limiting the eligibility to structures in impacted areas of high unemployment. And in further recognition of the need of the cities, the credit will be available for renovation as well as new construction.

Taken together the individual and corporate elements of the package provide a balanced approach to meeting the problems facing the American economy. Individual taxpayers will be protected from the burdens of inflation and increased social security while American business will be provided with stimulation to invest—to make the productivity pie larger than it is today—without which we cannot have expanded employment in the United States.

We will have in the next fiscal year a $2 trillion gross national product. If in the last 28 years we had just pushed up the improvement in the gross national product annually by 1½ percent, we would now have approximately a $3 trillion gross national product. There is nothing written in the heavens which says that it has to be 2 instead of 3. It could just as well have been 3 with only that marginal increase in improvement in the GNP.

The productivity pie is just too small to do the job we need done without imposing a crushing burden, especially in view of the continuance of the arms race, upon the middle class of America, which is the great majority of the country, and upon all other Americans. Senator DANFORTH and I are trying, together with our colleagues, to present to the people an alternative which will limit the tax burden on individuals and provide incentives for expansion to business. For we have learned the hard way that our dependence for a healthy economy must be upon the private sector and its productivity and success.

Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland is recognized.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from New York and the distinguished Senator from Missouri for the serious thought that they have given to this subject.

I subscribe in particular to the last point made by the Senator from New York. The profound impact that this problem is having on all American classes and on the whole social profile of the country is very serious. I think their response to the problem has been in proportion to the magnitude of the problem, and I think the Senate should be grateful to them for the fact that they have taken the time and devoted the attention to address the problem.

THE TAX REDUCTION ACT OF 1978

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, today I am joining in sponsoring a bill to provide for a 30 percent tax cut for all Americans by 1980. The time is short, I believe, before we reach the point when unemployment, inflation, and stagnation will grow to crisis proportions. We must move soon against this possibility.

We must move to set clearly Government's tax policy for the coming years.

The bill I am cosponsoring is the "Tax Reduction Act of 1978," authored by Representative KEMP of New York and Senator ROTH of Delaware. It is a bill aimed at getting the economy back on the trail of real growth. In my mind, it would allow the economy to grow "out from under" big government.

The bill is aimed at restoring incentives to people who work. By reducing taxes, it means people will receive more for their effort. By reducing the rates on higher income people hope to earn in the future, it provides greater incentives for them to strive to reach those higher income goals. In other words, it means that people will work harder when they can keep more of what they will earn for working harder.

This bill is not another warmed-over package of Keynesian stimulus. It is permanent so people and businesses can plan with some degree of certainty. It stimulates production of goods and services, not just the demand for goods and services. It will be big enough to compensate for the dramatic increases in social security and energy taxes, and the inflation-imposed tax increase caused by pushing people into higher brackets without higher real income.

This bill is needed because taxes are just too high. The facts are that Americans now spend more on taxes than on the necessities of life—last year, total taxes came to $486.4 billion, while total spending for food, clothing and shelter amounted to $469.7 billion.

Specifically, the Tax Reduction Act would reduce the present tax rates of between 14 and 70 percent to a range of 8 to 50 percent. This means that the low and middle income taxpayers would greatly benefit. For example, today the family of four with an income of $8,000 pays approximately $120 in taxes. This bill would cut taxes to $12 or by 90 percent. The family of four earning $12,500 now pays $917. Under this bill, a tax cut of 40.3 percent would result in a tax bill of $370.

Upper income brackets would also benefit, though by lower percentages; and the reductions would be phased in over a 3-year period.

One major economic projection of the effects of this bill revealed an expected increase in the gross national product (GNP) of $43.4 billion the first year, and the creation of an added 1,200,000 new jobs.

Norman Ture, an economist who worked at great length on the tax-cut bill enacted in 1963 under President Kennedy, stated last week in testimony before the House Ways and Means Committee:

> The fundamental challenge for tax policy today is to reduce the present heavy tax bias against work and savings. In other words, we must remove some of the reasons people don't work harder and save more. Ture says: "This tax penalty on work and productivity gains is accentuated in the payroll taxes."

The penalties are most dramatic when we discuss what economists call "marginal income." It is that added amount of income a worker gets by taking a promotion, by saving and thus getting some investment income, by working overtime, by taking a second job, or in other ways increasing the number of dollars coming in.

Dr. Ture points out that:

> The recently enacted increases in social security taxes raise the overall marginal rate of tax on labor income; 10 years from now, the increase will be equivalent to 3 percentage points—the same as if the overall marginal income tax rate on wages and salaries had been increased by 6.8 percent. In itself, this tax hike will cost about 650,000 jobs in 1980, about 1 million in 1982, and close to 1.4 million jobs in 1987.

Dr. Ture does not, of course, discuss the present marginal tax rates, which are already high; and unfortunately, the President proposes changes that would make marginal rates even higher. The President's so-called tax-cut program will barely make up for social security and energy tax hikes in terms of total dollars; but it will result in increasing the progressivity of the tax system. In other words, for almost everyone, the amount of income he will be able to keep out of the next few dollars he might earn will be lowered by the President's proposals. That is going to reduce the incentives to work. That is going to reduce the output of our economy. That is not going to help anyone.

Mr. President, if the Government taxes something, we would naturally expect that we would get less of it. In fact, our Government has done just that to certain commodities in order to put a disincentive on production or consumption or both. Well, if we tax extra effort, we can expect to get less of it.

Without rewards for effort, effort fades away and so, eventually, does the supply of rewards which motivated effort in the first place.

If a person in our society decided that he wanted to begin a savings account—and found he had to go to work nights to accumulate added income—he might do so. If, however, he found that the amount of added income he actually could take home and save was far less than he thought it would be, there would be less reason for him to work at the extra job. If he decided not to take the job, there would be less savings. That means there would be less investment; and less investment means our economy would experience less growth.

How many times is that story repeated? But instead of a savings account, it is a new refrigerator, or a second car, or a new home. I contend that it is repeated enough to result in a higher rate of unemployment than we should have. It has resulted in a lower rate of growth than we should have. It has resulted in lower standards of living for Americans; and it has resulted in fewer opportunities for the neediest Americans.

I consider myself a fiscal conservative. I believe that Government should live within its means. In fact, I believe that Government must live within its means. For this reason, I have had some difficulty bringing myself to support a tax-cut bill which would reduce Federal taxes by an estimated $21 billion this year; $48 billion in 1979; and $80 billion in 1980. The estimates that I have indicate that the increased revenues, flowing to the Government as a result of this bill and resulting in higher levels of economic activity, would mean an actual reduction of tax revenues over the present tax system of $10 billion this year; $22 billion in 1979; and $36 billion in 1980.

But, I have done some studying and found that these figures do not tell the rest of the story. In fact, Federal revenues will grow by massive amounts in coming years. I mentioned earlier in my remarks a tax increase that is caused by inflation. Every time inflation pushes prices 1 percent higher, tax revenues go up 1.5 percent. For example, a family of four now earning $17,000 has a disposable income less than that of a family earning $12,000 in 1970. By just earning enough money to maintain a constant standard of living, many individuals would have to be obtaining raises at a rate up to 50 percent higher than the rate of inflation.

This means that tax rates left unmodified will rocket the tax burden in coming years. One Congressional Budget Office study calculated that personal income taxes will increase from last year's total of $130.9 billion to $339 billion by the end of fiscal 1982.

That is an increase of $209 billion and it does not make this tax-cut proposal look like much in comparison.

What must be done is to stabilize Federal outlays. Regardless of the present outrageous sums the Federal Government spends, it looks sometimes as if we are stuck with them. We may be stuck with them. But, if, in fact, we can stick with them, and let our economy grow, then things would not look so bad for the future.

The Tax Reduction Act of 1978 will allow the economy to grow out from under big government.

In 1963, the so-called Kennedy tax cut was estimated to result in a reduction of Federal revenues of $89 billion over 5 years. In fact, it resulted in revenue gains to the Federal Government of $54 billion. It is more impressive, I believe, to note that the Kennedy tax cut resulted in far greater increases in the economy and great increases in disposable income and in real investment.

I believe that there is that potential in our economy today. I have remarked that given what Government has done, and is doing to the American economy, it is a miracle that we have any growth at all. But there are great resources we can tap. That great potential in the American economy which lies in the American people can be tapped. I believe it will be tapped. That American people want this tax cut. I hope we do not waste any more precious time.

Mr. President, I yield the floor and I thank the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank my colleague very much.

I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Maryland, to speak on another subject.

THE NATIONAL CATHEDRAL

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, in this morning's Washington Post, columnist George F. Will turns his attention to the glories of the National Cathedral and to its problems. As is often the case, Mr. Will deals eloquently and constructively with a problem others have overlooked.

Mr. Will reminds us that the cathedral went deeply in debt to complete the nave in time for our Bicentennial and, as a result, since last year construction has been virtually at a standstill. It will take $15 million to complete the cathedral. Mr. Will Writes:

So in a town where billions evaporate, a shortage of a few million is halting a collective work of genius that has been rising for 71 years.

He proposes that—

If more people would visit the Cathedral, and if they and others would give more generously, they would be important participants in what may be the last pure Gothic work the world will see built.

I would only add that they would also contribute to the completion of a magnificant edifice which has served the Nation's Capital not only as a monument to the glory of God, but as a meeting place for all His creatures—for believers of all faiths and for nonbelievers as well. It is and has been a showcase for the achievements and aspirations—artistic, intellectual, and social—of all humanity.

To me it is significant and important that there is in our Nation's Capital a pulpit open to people of widely different points of view. Cesar Chavez and Sahabzada Yaqub-Khan, the Pakistan Ambassador, who acted as one of the go-betweens with the Hanafi Moslems, both have spoken there. And, of course, it was from this pulpit that Martin Luther King, Jr., gave his last sermon.

The National Cathedral, like the great cathedrals of the middle ages, serves our community as a spiritual and cultural center. Here Gian Carlo Menotti's operas have been heard and here the late Jose Limon danced his Moor's Pavane for the last time. Here, too, Dr. Faustus has been staged magnificently and Noe's Fludde given perhaps its most brilliant performance.

When Fulbert, bishop of Chartres, was rebuilding that cathedral after it had been destroyed by fire, we are told that—

Many kings, princes, barons, and gentlemen, vied with each other in their contributions to this Cathedral . . .

I believe the citizens of this Nation should do no less. George Will's article on the cathedral entitled, "Amidst Our Defective Times, an Enduring Value," will give impetus to this effort. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMIDST OUR DEFECTIVE TIMES, AN ENDURING VALUE

(By George F. Will)

Among the 20th century's many defects is this: It offers few opportunities for joining a noble profession, that of cathedral builder. But Easter is a time to note how people can join, and why they should.

Like a runoff of melting snow, the flow of tourists through Washington becomes a torrent in spring. Unfortunately, only a small fraction visit the Cathedral Church of Saint Peter and Saint Paul, commonly called the National Cathedral. The architecture is 14th century Gothic, but one need not be inclined, as I am, to think civilization peaked a bit early (about the 14th century) to delight in it.

Washington is rich in visual pleasures, but none matches the cathedral's newest rose window in late afternoon, when slanting sunlight dapples the nave with color. The cathedral is faithful to the Gothic principle: Every stone adds strength as well as weight. The flying buttresses are functional. Four 100-foot columns, 27 feet in diameter at the base, support the main tower and its 100 tons of bells.

Virtually every nook and cranny has decorative details, and there are lots of nooks and crannies on a building one-tenth of a mile long. A cathedral is a place for a bishop's cathedra, or chair, and near the main altar is a chair made of stones from Glastonbury Abbey, founded by Saint Joseph of Arimathea about the year 43. The stone for the altar comes from the quarry near Jerusalem that supplied the stone for King Solomon's temple.

Ten small stones from the Chapel of Moses on Mt. Sinai are set in the floor in front of the altar. One pulpit was carved from limestone quarried 900 years ago for Canterbury Cathedral. The only president buried in Washington, Woodrow Wilson, is buried in the National Cathedral.

In the great cities of the civilization from which this republic is descended, the noblest works were built to serve religion—the Parthenon in Athens, St. Peter's in Rome, Notre Dame in Paris, Westminster Abbey in London. They are stone memories of a pre-modern age when cities were supposed to be something other than mere arenas for acquisition, when civil society was supposed to serve ends other than the pursuit of self-interest, when civil law was supposed to be patterned after a higher law.

Washington has no pre-modern past, and the monuments people flock to see are, like the Capitol Building, places where power is exercised or, like the Lincoln Memorial, temples for democracy's civil religion, the worship of those who epitomize popular government. The inscription above Lincoln's statue begins: "In this temple . . ."

The National Cathedral is different. Beneath it lies the world of strain and uproar. More than any other city, Washington represents a civilization founded on self-interestedness. But because the cathedral is mounted on such a splendid pedestal—Mount Saint Alban, the city's highest hill—it seems, from a distance, to be the institution beneath which the city has reverently arrayed itself. Obviously, Washington presents a misleading profile.

Last year, construction on the last phase of the cathedral virtually stopped. The cathedral went deeply into debt to complete the nave in time for the Bicentennial. The energy crisis is an apalling burden when you are heating a "room" with a 100-foot ceiling.

It would take $15 million today to complete the facade and twin towers on the West front. So in a town where billions evaporate, a shortage of a few million is halting a collective work of genius that has been rising for 71 years. If more people would visit the cathedral, and if they and others would give a bit more generously, they would be important participants in what may be the last pure Gothic work the world will see built.

One of the first and finest expressions of Gothic architecture is Chartres Cathedral. Its completion in 1164 was a sign of spiritual springtime as European culture bloomed after the long winter of the Dark Ages.

It is, perhaps, unlikely that, a thousand years hence, the National Cathedral will be seen as a sign of 20th-century America's real values. But a thousand years hence, whatever else remains along the Potomac, this cathedral will remain, like a sailing ship on the swell of a rolling sea.

AGE DISCRIMINATION IN EMPLOYMENT ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1978—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, as in legislative session I submit a report of the committee of conference on H.R. 5383 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PROXMIRE). The report will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 5383) to amend the age group of employees who are protected by the provisions of such Act, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses this report, signed by all of the conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

(The conference report is printed in the House proceedings of the RECORD of March 14, 1978.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Time for debate on this conference report is limited to 30 minutes, to be equally divided between and controlled by the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. WILLIAMS) and the Senator from New York (Mr. JAVITS).

Who yields time?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may need to present to the Senate the report of the committee of conference.

I ask unanimous consent that the following staff members have the privilege of the floor during the consideration of this matter: Michael Forscey, Steven Paradise, Don Zimmerman, and Peter Turza.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am pleased to bring to the Senate the conference report on H.R. 5383, the Age Discrimination in Employment Act Amendments of 1978.

As chairman of the conference committee, I wish to commend my fellow conferees from the Senate, including, of course, the ranking minority member of the Human Resources Committee, Senator JAVITS, and the distinguished Senators from Rhode Island, Senator PELL and Senator CHAFEE, for their invaluable assistance in developing this legislation in its final form. The work of the House conferees, including their committee chairman, Mr. PERKINS; the chairman of the House Employment Opportunities Subcommittee, Mr. HAWKINS; and the chief sponsor of the legislation in the House, Mr. PEPPER, was also invaluable. The conference committee engaged in extensive deliberations on this legislation and produced a report which I am confident will gain the support and approval of this body.

In 1967, Congress enacted the Age Discrimination in Employment Act to provide fundamental protections to the employment rights of older workers.

In the 10 years since the enactment of that landmark legislation, much has been learned about the desires and abilities of older persons.

New social and scientific research studies have demonstrated the high level of skills and abilities possessed by older workers. We now know, as well, that an increasing number of the aged work either for economic reasons or for the sense of satisfaction that they derive from their jobs.

The 1978 amendments to the ADEA are designed to reflect this more comprehensive understanding and will insure that the act provides a full measure of meaningful protections to older workers.

Under the conference agreement, the protections which the law affords to the employment rights of older workers have been substantially strengthened and broadened. The agreement provides for raising the protected age limit of the ADEA from 65 to 70 years of age, effective January 1, 1979. Mandatory retirement for most Federal employees is abolished entirely, effective September 30 of this year.

The conference agreement also clarifies existing law to insure that pension plans or seniority systems which require mandatory retirement may no longer be applied to employees covered by the act.

This is perhaps the most important and, indeed, critical change in present practice which the bill requires. The Supreme Court's recent ruling in McMann v. United Air Lines, 98 S.Ct. 244 (1977) has been interpreted by employers to permit them to retire individuals at virtually any age specified in their pension plans. Raising the act's upper age limit would therefore be meaningless if the Court's interpretation of section 4(f)(2) was allowed to stand. The conference agreement assures that this loophole in the present law will be closed.

I am also pleased to report that the conferees agreed to an equitable resolution of our differences pertaining to college and university faculty and top-level business executives.

The conference agreement provides that colleges and universities will remain free to require retirement of tenured faculty at age 65 until July 1, 1982.

The House agreed to accept a modified version of the provision of the Senate bill which exempted high-ranking business executives from the increase in the act's upper age limit from 65 to 70.

The conference agreement provides that the exemption shall apply to those top-level employees who for the 2 years prior to retirement are employed in a "bona fide executive or high policymaking position." Only those employees entitled to an immediate annual nonforfeitable retirement benefit which is the equivalent of a straight-life annuity of $27,000 will fall within the exemption. Under the conference agreement, the $27,000 annual retirement income figure will not be annually adjusted to reflect increases or decreases in the cost of living.

In addition to meeting the retirement income test, an employee who is to be retired under the exemption must also be employed in a bona fide executive or high policymaking capacity for the 2 years prior to retirement. The conferees agreed that the exemption is not intended to apply to blue-collar workers or middle- or low-level employees who happen to meet the retirement income test. Rather it will apply to top-level employees who exercise substantial executive authority or to employees who, because of their position and responsibility, play a significant role in the development of corporate policy.

The conference agreement delays the effective date of the increase in the act's upper age limit with respect to employee benefit plans or seniority systems contained in collective bargaining agreements. Mandatory retirement between age 65 to 70 may be required until January 1, 1980, or the expiration of the contract whichever occurs first, so long as the contract was in effect on September 1, 1977.

I am pleased that the House conferees agreed to recede, with certain modifications, to three Senate amendments to the ADEA which are designed to insure that claims of discrimination will be more efficiently processed and that plaintiffs in ADEA lawsuits will obtain the full relief to which they are entitled.

The conference agreement provides that a party will be entitled to a jury trial on any issue of fact in an action by an individual for recovery of amounts owing as a result of a violation of the act. The conferees defined amounts owing to include items of pecuniary loss, such as wages and fringe benefits and other employee benefits as well as readily ascertainable consequential losses, such as moving expenses, which directly result from the violation. In addition, juries are authorized to award liquidated damages to compensate victims of discrimination for those losses which are too difficult of proof for estimate.

Because of the act's complex procedural scheme, many age discrimination claims have been dismissed without adjudication on the merits.

To remedy this situation, the conferees agreed to modify the ADEA's 180-day notice of intent to sue requirement. Notification to the Labor Department must still be given within 180 days, but such notice need not manifest an intent to sue. Moreover, the conferees agreed that the notice requirement is not a jurisdictional prerequisite to bringing a cause of action.

The conferees also provided for tolling of the statute of limitations for a period of 1 year during conciliation conducted by the Department pursuant to section 7(b) of the act. That conciliation requirement is not to be construed as a jurisdictional prerequisite to maintaining a cause of action.

The conferees agreed to include provisions requiring the Government to conduct studies on mandatory retirement and the effects of this legislation. The Civil Service Commission study relating to Federal employees must be completed by January 1, 1980.

The Labor Department is directed to study the effects of these amendments on the private sector. Under the conference agreement, this study will include a report on the effects of the exemptions for top-level business executives and college and university faculty.

The Department's final report is to be completed and transmitted to the Congress and the President no later than January 1, 1982; an interim report would be due January 1, 1981.

These 1978 amendments to the ADEA represent an important step forward toward the goal of insuring that no capable worker will wrongfully be deprived of a job solely on account of age. They represent a further recognition of the basic right of an individual to remain active in the work force as long as he or she is capable.

In my opinion, these amendments represent a significant step forward in our effort to establish full and meaningful protections for the employment rights of our older citizens, and I urge the Senate to approve and adopt the conference report.

Mr. President, I know the ranking minority member from the committee, my esteemed colleague from New York (Mr. JAVITS), who has been with this effort to raise the age discrimination from 65 to 70, throughout the deliberations, wishes to speak to the Senate on this subject. I yield to the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALLEN). The Senator from New York is recognized.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank my colleague. I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. President, Senator WILLIAMS is very generous in giving me credit for my work on this bill, but I must emphasize the fine leadership which he gave to us in respect to the bill and the conference which has brought about the result now before us.

It was a difficult conference. It took a number of months, but we finally achieved a reconciliation of the views of both Houses. That is very heavily attributable to the gifted and patient handling of the matter by Senator WILLIAMS of New Jersey, and I wish to pay every credit to him in that regard.

Mr. President, the fact that we have reached an agreement is itself a wonderful thing, almost a miracle. For a long time it did not appear that we would.

If signed into law, this measure will be a significant milestone for older Americans.

By raising the 1967 act's upper age limit from 65 to 70 years of age for private sector employees and by eliminating the upper age cap for most civilian Federal employees, this bill will give our older workers greater freedom in deciding whether to retire or continue working. No longer will a private employer be able arbitrarily to retire a worker between the ages of 65 and 70 who is qualified to do the job and wants to continue his or her gainful employment.

Mr. President, if I had my way, I would have gradually eliminated the mandatory retirement age for all covered employees. My bill, S. 1773, would have phased out the upper age limit of the act by 1985 and I believe that should be the ultimate policy objective of our country.

I am pleased, though, on balance with the compromise which has been worked out. Effective September 30, 1978, most civilian Federal employees will be freed of any mandatory retirement rule based on age, the Federal Government will serve as a laboratory for testing the feasibility of having no mandatory retirement age ceiling at all. The experience of the Federal Government as well as the results of Labor Department reports required by these amendments on the feasibility of eliminating the upper age cap will provide a proper basis for future legislative action eliminating the upper age limit for private employees. Until this occurs, the upper age limit for the private sector will be 70 years of age. This new age cap for most private employees will take effect on January 1, 1979.

I am also pleased that the conference report adopts the language which I proposed in my bill to amend the act's section 4(f)(2) bona fide employee benefit plan exception. This amendment has become all the more necessary in light of the Supreme Court's recent decision in United Air Lines Inc. v. McMann, 93 S.Ct. 244 (1977). In McMann, the Supreme Court held that under the ADEA, the involuntary retirement of an employee at age 60 was permissible under the provisions of the retirement plan there at issue, which was established by the employer prior to the act's passage.

I most respectfully disagree with the court's opinion. My statements on section 4(f)(2) were, I feel, not correctly interpreted. This exception was not intended to permit the wholesale evasion of the act's protections by means of involuntary retirement provisions contained in employee pension benefit plans. The meaning of the exception, as I stated in a colloquy with Senator Yarborough on the Senate floor, was that an "employer will not be compelled under this section to afford to older workers exactly the same pension, retirement, or insurance benefits as he affords to younger workers." The dissent by Justices Marshall and Brennan correctly interpreted the meaning of section 4(f)(2).

The amendment to the section 4(f)(2) exception is intended to overrule the McMann decision. As stated in the conference report, the "conferees specifically disagree with the Supreme Court's holding and reasoning in that case."

The section 4(f)(2) amendment is effective immediately upon the date of enactment except that the prohibition of involuntary retirement provisions for ages 65 through 69 is deferred for employee benefit plans and seniority systems contained in collectively bargained agreements in effect on September 1, 1977. The effective date for the prohibition of such provisions is the termination of the contract or January 1, 1980, whichever occurs first.

In addition to the collective bargaining exemption, the conference report contains two other exemptions applicable to particular groups of employees.

The first of these is the bona fide executive exemption. This exemption permits the compulsory retirement of any employee who has attained age 65 and who, for the 2-year period immediately before retirement, is employed in a "bona fide executive or a high policymaking position" and who is entitled to an immediate nonforfeitable annual retirement benefit from the employer equal to at least $27,000. The $27,000 amount is not adjusted for cost of living increases and does not include amounts attributable to social security, employee contributions, and contributions of prior employers. The class of employees covered by the exemption is described in detail in the conference report and is not intended to include low-level managers, supervisors or blue collar workers. The exemption, which is permanent, does not apply to Federal employees covered by section 15 of the act.

The second of these exemptions is the college and university faculty exemption. This provision permits the compulsory retirement of any employee who has attained age 65 and who is serving under a contract of unlimited tenure or similar arrangement at an institution of higher education. The exemption, which will end on July 1, 1982, also does not apply to Federal employees covered by section 15 of the act.

I have had, and continue to have, serious doubts about the justification for the executive and faculty exemptions. I am pleased that the conference report requires the Secretary of Labor to examine the effect of both exemptions and to make recommendations thereon.

The conference report also contains three procedural changes. First, it requires that a "charge" rather than a "notice of intent to sue" be filed with the Secretary of Labor within the stated time periods before an individual can bring a civil action. The conferees agreed that the filing of a "charge" is not a jurisdictional prerequisite to maintaniing an action and that equitable relief for failing to file within the appropriate time period will be available.

Second, the conference report provides that the applicable statute of limitations shall be tolled for a period not exceeding 1 year during which the Secretary of Labor is attempting to effect voluntary compliance pursuant to section 7(b) of the act. The conferees agreed that conciliation is not a jurisdictional prerequisite to the Secretary's bringing of an action.

Third, the conference report provides for a trial by jury of any issue of fact in an action by an individual for recovery of "amounts owing" as a result of a violation of the act. "Amounts owing" refer to items of pecuniary or economic loss as well as liquidated damages. Items of pecuniary or economic loss refer to such items as wages, fringe, and other job-related benefits.

Mr. President, the 1978 amendments to the Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967 are a vital step toward the eventual elimination of mandatory retirement on the basis of an arbitrarily established age. These amendments signal a fundamental change in the way older workers perceive themselves and the way they are perceived by society. Our older citizens are a valuable human resource whose well-developed abilities and mature judgment can greatly contribute to the welfare of our country. Passage of the conference report will facilitate the productive efforts of our older workers, and I urge my colleagues to vote for it accordingly.

Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the chairman of our committee and manager of the conference report on the floor, I wish to clarify a number of issues involving employee benefit plans and the Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967, as modified by the 1978 amendments. I want to ask our distinguished committee chairman whether he agrees that an employer will be permitted under the act, as amended, to maintain a defined contribution plan—other than a plan which is merely supplemental to a defined benefit or defined contribution plan maintained by the employer—which precludes employer and, if applicable, employee contributions to such a plan subsequent to an employee's attainment of the plan's normal retirement age.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The answer is "yes." I completely agree with the statement of the distinguished Senator from New York. Your statements are consistent with the position taken by the Department of Labor regarding these matters. As assistant Secretary Elisburg's letter, which appears in the Senate committee report, makes clear, employers will not be required to continue contributions to either defined benefit or defined contribution plans for employees who continue working beyond a plan's normal retirement age.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, there are a number of other questions in this respect that I wish to go into now.

Some employers are concerned that the 1978 amendments may increase costs for employee welfare benefit plans, such as life, health, and disability programs. The Senate report notes that some plans currently reduce coverage for older workers or increase the required employee contribution as workers advance in age.

I want to emphasize that these amendments do not change present law regarding these practices. As the Senate report states:

> Existing principles of law, including the section 4(f)(2) bona fide employee benefit plan exception, as modified by these amendments, would be the standard by which these practices will be evaluated.

The purpose of section 4(f)(2) is to take account of the increased cost of providing certain benefits to older workers as compared to younger workers.

Welfare benefit levels for older workers may be reduced only to the extent necessary to achieve approximate equivalency in contributions for older and younger workers. Thus a retirement, pension or insurance plan will be considered in compliance with the statute where the actual amount of payment made, or cost incurred in behalf of an older worker is equal to that made or incurred in behalf of a younger worker, even though the older worker may thereby receive a lesser amount of pension or retirement benefits, or insurance coverage. This is consistent with the following statement I made during the November 6, 1967 floor consideration of the original act:

> The amendment relating to . . . employee benefit plans is particularly significant: because of it an employer will not be compelled to afford older workers exactly the same pension, retirement, or insurance benefits as younger workers and thus employers will not, because of the often extremely high cost of providing certain types of benefits to older workers, actually be discouraged from hiring older workers. At the same time, it should be clear that this amendment only relates to the observance of bona fide plans. No such plan will help an employer if it is adopted merely as a subterfuge for discriminating against older workers.

The Department of Labor intends to promulgate comprehensive regulations in order to provide guidance in this regard for sponsors of employee benefit plans, and the Secretary is urged to act as soon as possible.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator's statement, accurately reflects congressional intent in this regard. As the Senator is aware, Congress is presently considering the President's reorganzation program which would transfer enforcement of the ADEA from the Department of Labor to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. Should this transfer be approved, we fully expect that the principles you have just stated will continue to govern policy development and enforcement of the ADEA.

Mr. JAVITS. It may be that certain employee benefit plans will have to be amended in order to comply with the new law. In light of the extensive amendments which most plans were required to make in order to comply with the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 is it not our view that the Department of Labor and the Internal Revenue Service should work closely together to assist these plans to the fullest extent possible in the making of necessary changes?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Absolutely; it is essential that these two agencies seek to reduce any administrative burden created for plans as a result of these amendments.

Mr. JAVITS. Finally, Mr. President, it is understood that just as these age discrimination amendments do not interfere with ERISA, State age discrimination in employment laws also are not to interfere with ERISA. The ADEA itself, as pointed out in the Senate report, does not preempt such State age discrimination laws. However, there should be no question that the preemption rules of section 514(a) of ERISA shall be determinative regarding the preemption of State age discrimination laws which directly or indirectly establish requirements relating to employee benefit plans. ERISA's preemption of State age discrimination laws shall be determined without regard to section 514(d) of ERISA or the fact that the ADEA does not itself preempt State law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I concur in my friend's observations as they accurately state the controlling principles of law in this regard. Federal law will preempt State age discrimination statutes only to the extent that those laws relate to an employee benefit plan described in section 4(a) of ERISA and are not exempt under section 4(b) of ERISA.

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I am pleased to join the distinguished managers of this bill in urging my colleagues to approve the conference report on H.R. 5383, a bill to amend the Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967. As the ranking minority member on the Senate Special Committee on Aging I have long advocated major reforms in mandatory retirement. It has become increasingly clear to me that, for those individuals who did not wish to retire at a fixed chronological age, mandatory retirement is a cruel and arbitrary form of age discrimination. In January of 1977 I introduced S. 481 which was the first Senate bill in the 95th Congress aimed at abolishing age discrimination in employment. While the conference report we are about to vote on differs greatly from S. 481, it constitutes a significant step forward and it has my full support.

Mr. President, I think it is important for us to stress that our goal is not to require any American to work 1 day longer than he or she voluntarily chooses to do so. My goal, in sponsoring and supporting this legislation has always been to expand the individual's basic right of freedom of choice. If an older worker is able and willing to work beyond the age of 65 or if he or she feels they must work beyond that age they should have every opportunity to do so.

In many instances we find the Congress enacting legislation in response to emergency situations. I believe, Mr. President, that major demographic changes are occurring in the American society. The longer life expectancy which has resulted from medical and nutritional research and the general improvement in our quality of life coupled with the continuing low birth rate has produced a steady graying of American society. This process will produce, in the not too distant future, a dramatic shift in the American work force. I believe that we will see, within our lifetime, a growing demand for the skills, talents, and services of middle-age and older workers. Economic considerations may well produce a reversal of the postwar trend of earlier and earlier retirement. If these predictions are accurate, then the legislation we are enacting today will lay the ground work for meeting our labor market needs in the decades that lie ahead. By anticipating these changes now, we can lay the ground work for a new set of economic and social attitudes among both employers and employees. I would, therefore, like to urge my colleagues to give this measure their full support.●

● Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, the Senate will overwhelmingly approve the conference report on H.R. 5383, which, but for a few excepted categories, would prohibit mandatory retirement in the private sphere before age 70 and eliminate mandatory retirement for most civilian Federal employees. I join my colleagues in personally disapproving of mandatory retirement. It can deprive our society of the valuable and tested skills of a growing segment of our population. It avoids merit and competence in favor of arbitrary limits. It limits individual freedom of choice, one of the fundamental tenets of our social contract.

Yet, I oppose this legislation.

First, the report exemplifies a growing schizophrenia in the Congress approach to unemployment, especially among the young and disadvantaged. We are all against unemployment; yet, when we are asked to vote on minimum wage increases, increased social security taxes or amendments to the Age Discrimination Act that could eliminate an estimated 200,000 job opportunities a year, if not more, we are asked to subjugate our unemployment goals to other social aims. The cumulative effects of such actions will be devastating for the young and the disadvantaged and their opportunity to participate in our economic system. The truth is getting harder to avoid on this issue. Last month while overall unemployment declined from 6.3 to 6.1 percent, unemployment among teenagers increased from 16 to 17.4 percent. Approval of H.R. 5383 will not help this figure go down. As David S. Broder recently stated in his column, if H.R. 5383 becomes law—

> It means that those of us who have jobs already can hold on to them longer, if we wish, while younger people, scrambling for a foothold on the employment ladder, wait still longer in the cold.

Many of those standing in the cold will be young, will be black, and will have families to support. Many of those who will benefit will be comfortable, will be eligible for pensions and will no longer have families to support. They also have higher wage jobs that could be filled by others at lower wages. So this is inflationary legislation, too.

I raise these points, as few others have, to remind my colleagues that this bill is not all mom and apple pie. It presents hard choices. In order to make an expedient choice easier, we have given too little attention to the unemployment and inflation this bill will cause. The Congress likes to deal with unemployment in the abstract, as in Humphrey-Hawkins, with high-sounding promises it cannot keep. When it comes to acting, it approves legislation supported by powerful lobbies with no heed to the hardship it causes for all. This bill alone will not have great impact on unemployment; but the sum of this and other of our recent actions is weighing heavily against the young and all the unemployed. This bill, like others, including the social security tax increases, will not by itself, but in combination with others, also cause inflation.

There are other reasons to oppose this report. Why are top-level business executives exempted entirely? Why exempt college and university faculty until 1982? Why exempt mandatory retirement required by collective-bargaining agreements in effect before September 1, 1977? And why impose no age limit on most of the Federal bureaucracy where fresh blood is most urgently needed? These classifications are arbitrary and reflect no merit—only the lobbying of certain groups. Being arbitrary, they invite litigation and perhaps a ruling that such indefensible classifications are unconstitutional. If, as the proponents contend, this bill is intended to protect basic civil rights, why should professors have fewer civil rights than alumnae, and why should the former be forced to retire before the latter? Why is it assumed that professors and business executives are made expendable by age but not laborers? The tortured explanation in the conference report demonstrates no reason for the distinction. No rational basis exists for forcing retirement upon those likely to be strengthened in the mind by life while retaining in the work force those weakened physically by it. This was a muscular contest in which the lobbies, as usual, won out.

The bill itself is an invitation to litigation. Such arbitrary distinctions will be challenged. Employees will contest their discharge on the grounds of age and employers will conceive of imaginative ways around the law. At a time when President Carter is seeking to improve the civil service system, I sense we in Congress are moving toward placing the whole Nation under a kind of quasi-civil service set of rules that will only further erode the efficiency of our economic system which is already suffering from intense worldwide competition from the Japanese, Germans, and others.

Legislation is not always the answer to everything we disapprove of, and, in this case, I feel employers and employees are better able to make retirement decisions than is the Federal Government. Our tendency to increasingly intrude upon and regulate voluntary transactions between consenting adults has resulted not only in increased direct governmental costs—$7 billion to fund regulatory agencies last year—but also in a hidden tax on our economy.

We should do far more to take advantage of the skills and experience of the elderly—but not at the expense of the economic system as a whole and those who are young. I am not so worried about big business; it usually copes, usually by charging us all a little bit more for its wares. I am concerned, however, about those unemployed, who to borrow from David Broder, are "not all right, Jack." ●

AN END TO MANDATORY RETIREMENT

● Mrs. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, today the Senate is considering the conference report on Age Discrimination in Employment Act amendments—mandatory retirement. I would like to take this opportunity to urge my colleagues to vote to end arbitrary discrimination against a viable, productive segment of our Nation's work force—the elderly.

For too long, our society has perpetuated ill-founded myths which have stereotyped and distorted society's vision of the aged. The denial of equal employment opportunities to the elderly stems from this stereotyping. I believe we must continually strive to dispel the myths which hinder individual accomplishment and waste human resources.

Mandatory retirement results in an enormous waste of skills, experience, and talents by forcing well-trained people to leave employment and take their knowledge with them. Each day, more than 4,000 Americans reach the age of 65. Each year, hundreds of thousands of older workers are turned out of their present jobs or denied opportunities for new employment simply because of their age. Compulsory retirement of citizens based on chronological age alone is grossly unfair because longevity is a poor indicator of ability to perform a job.

I am particularly attuned to the unique problems and concerns faced by the older woman, who may be thrust unprepared into new life roles through the death of her husband or divorce. Mandatory retirement is especially disadvantageous to the displaced homemaker. Forced retirement limits the work life of these women and reduces their ability to build up significant pension benefits.

I would like to point out that in supporting this measure it is not my intention to imply opposition to those citizens who wish to retire. Instead, I want to reaffirm the legislation's intent to protect the employment opportunities of older Americans and afford them the opportunity to make their own choice between employment and retirement. I believe it is time we give the American workers greater freedom in determining whether to retire or continue working. Now is the time to improve our Nation's retirement policies by insuring that the competence of a worker and his or her desire to work, not age, is the determining factor in whether a person retains a job past age 65.

H.R. 5383 is both a practical and far-reaching piece of legislation. It will not only aid a large and deserving segment of our population, but will benefit the Nation in terms of the special contributions that older workers can make to our society because of their wealth of knowledge and experience. In short, these 1978 amendments mark an important step in affirming and protecting the rights of older Americans and ending age discrimination in employment. I urge my colleagues to support this conference report.●

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield back the remainder of the time on this side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ZORINSKY). The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK), the Senator from Florida (Mr. CHILES), the Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH), the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. EASTLAND), the Senator from Alaska (Mr. GRAVEL), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HASKELL), the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY), the Senator from Hawaiii (Mr. INOUYE), the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG), the Senator from Washington (Mr. MAGNUSON), the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. MATSUNAGA), the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH), the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. RIBICOFF), the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. SASSER), and the Senator from Alabama (Mr. SPARKMAN) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN) and the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) are absent on official business.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH), the Senator from Alaska (Mr. GRAVEL), the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY), the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG), and the Senator from Washington (Mr. MAGNUSON) would each vote "yea."

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BELLMON), the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. BROOKE), the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. CASE), the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. CURTIS), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS), the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS), the Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD), and the Senator from Kansas (Mr. PEARSON) are necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from Virginia (Mr. SCOTT) and the Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD) are absent on official business.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 62, nays 10, as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 78 Leg.]

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be granted 1 minute, as in legislative session, before the Senate resumes consideration of the Panama Canal Treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Will Senators please clear the well? Will Senators carry their private conversations to the cloakrooms?

The Senator from Alaska.

S. 2793—HIGH COURT OF AMERICAN SAMOA APPEALS ACT

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, during the hearings on the Department of Interior appropriations in our Senate Interior Appropriations Subcommittee, I questioned witnesses at length on the problem concerning the appellate review of decisions from the High Court of American Samoa. I now send to the desk for appropriate reference as in legislative session a bill to provide for appellate review of decisions of the High Court of American Samoa.

The bill I introduce today, Mr. President, is designed to correct a glaring inconsistency in our judicial system. More specifically, I refer to the absence of any outside review by an article III, Federal court of judicial decisions rendered by the High Court of American Samoa. This absence of any right of appeal into our Federal courts is not only incompatible with American concepts of justice, it is unique to American Samoa. All other U.S. possessions—the Canal Zone, Guam, Northern Marianas, and the Virgin Islands—and also the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico have appeals into our Federal judicial system.

My bill, entitled the "High Court of American Samoa Appeals Act," would rectify this situation by permitting appeal to the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals by writ of certiorari, thereby bringing cases in Samoan courts into line with the rest of our judicial system. Recommended by the Judicial Conference of the United States, this is a long overlooked but necessary and noncontroversial reform which should be enacted into law without delay.

At this point, Mr. President, I would like to explain in a bit more detail why this legislation is necessary and how the situation developed which has led to my bill's introduction.

The Secretary of the Interior under Presidential Executive Order No. 10264, June 29, 1951, 16 F.R. 6419, is charged with exclusive authority to provide for the executive, legislative, and judicial administration of American Samoa, subject only to the superior power of the Congress to administer and dispose of possesssions under article IV, section 3 of the U.S. Constitution.

Under the authority granted by the Secretary of the Interior, an American Samoan Constitution and three branches of government have been established. The executive is headed by an elected governor. A bicameral legislature (the Fono) is elected by the people of American Samoa. The Secretary of the Interior appoints both the Chief Justice and the Associate Justice of American Samoa.

The High Court of American Samoa is divided into a trial division and an appellate division. If the Chief Justice sits for a case in the Trial Division, the associate justice will preside in the appellate division and vice versa.

The problems of this system are self-evident. The relationships between the justices at times—although not at present—have been of such nature that an attorney's best efforts on behalf of his client required that he lose a case at the trial stage to insure ultimate victory for his client on appeal. More generally, the essential problem with the system was captured by Chief Justice O'Connor in his statement that no one can have confidence in the appellate decisions of the judicial system of American Samoa when the only two justices of the closed system who sit in review of each other share the same privy.

The bill I introduce today was approved by the Judicial Conference of the United States in its report to the Supreme Court. It was recommended to the Judicial Conference by its Committee on Pacific Territories chaired by the Honorable Richard H. Chambers, circuit judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit.

Hearings conducted by the Committee on Pacific Territories support the conclusion that there exists among the Samoans a majority in favor of an off-island appellate procedure.

My bill provides for appeal to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit by writ of certiorari. Exceptions from appellate review include cases involving exclusively matai titles and cases involving exclusively title to communally-owned real property. Both of these topics are unique to Samoan culture and law.

Mr. President, this bill's provisions would take effect only for appeals filed after its enactment, to avoid confusion and possible injustice. I urge prompt passage of this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2793

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of American in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "High Court of American Samoa Appeals Act."

SEC. 2. (a) Chapter 83 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"1295. Cases in the High Court of American Samoa

"(a) Final judgments, decrees, or decisions rendered by the High Court of American Samoa which are not reviewable by another division of that court may be reviewed by the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit by writ of certiorari granted upon petition of any part: Provided, That the jurisdiction granted by this subsection shall not extend to cases or controversies which involve exclusively:

"(1) matai titles,

"(3) both (1) and (2).

"(b) The United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit shall have the same jurisdiction of appeals from interlocutory orders of the High Court of American Samoa in accordance with section 1292 of this title as if the High Court of American Samoa were a district court of the United States: Provided, That the jurisdiction granted by this subsection shall not extend to cases or controversies which involve exclusively:

"(1) matai titles,

"(3) both (1) and (2).

"(c) The United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit shall promulgate necessary rules to carry out this section, and shall have the power to affirm, modify, vacate, set aside, or reverse the judgment appealed from, and may remand the cause and direct the entry of such appropriate judgment or order, or require such further proceedings to be had as may be just in the circumstances."

(b) The analysis of chapter 83 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"1295. Cases in the High Court of American Samoa."

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION FOR DISASTER RELIEF—HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 796

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, there is being held at the desk, pursuant to unanimous consent as of yesterday, House Joint Resolution 796, a fiscal 1978 supplemental budget request for $300 million for the Federal Disaster Assistance Administration. I ask unanimous consent as in legislative session that the Chair lay before the Senate a message from the House on House Joint Resolution 796.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ANDERSON) laid before the Senate House Joint Resolution 796, an act making urgent supplemental appropriation for disaster relief for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1978.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the joint resolution will be considered as having been read twice by its title, and the Senate will proceed to its consideration.

Mr. MAGNUSON. The Senator from North Dakota and I will discuss the bill.

Mr. President, yesterday we asked that this joint resolution be held at the desk because the Appropriations Committee of the Senate is, and should be, very sensitive to any bill which contains this amount of money. It is $300 million, and most of it already has been obligated because of the severe winter and other natural disasters we have had.

The House committee went into great detail on this matter and held a lengthy hearing. They came to the conclusion that unless we did this now, there would be no money to pay some of these people who are entitled to payments, whether it be for flood or severe winter storms or tornadoes—whatever the disaster was; and there could be many.

Senator YOUNG and I have checked with other members of the committee—we checked with Senator PROXMIRE just now—and we are proceeding with this matter because of the emergency nature of the appropriation. This agency will run out of money by the end of next week. This is a matter for which we would then have to appropriate later, anyway, so we thought we should move ahead today. It is urgently required to adequately fund those relief activities in numerous States affected by severe weather emergencies and natural disasters.

The report lists the number of States involved and the total amount available this year. There was an unobligated balance from prior periods of $4.2 million and in fiscal 1978, we appropriated $150 million, which makes the amount available $154.2 million.

The funds required for prior year disaster declarations, such as Appalachia, Johnstown, Pa., and Kansas City amount to $188.60 million; for disasters in 1978, other than severe winter weather declarations, $34.3 million was required.

For the severe winter weather declarations, thus far in 1978, the costs have totaled $160.6 million.

That includes the States of Michigan, Indiana, Ohio, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, California, Maine, and New Hampshire. There is a list of other States here as well. I know my own State was involved in 1977. And I do not know but looking at the weather conditions all during the past few months you could cover pretty near every State in the Union. And all these needs have to be taken care of.

For potential declarations during the remainder—may I have order, please?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ANDERSON). May we have order?

Mr. MAGNUSON. For potential declarations by the local authorities, Governors, and otherwise, during the remainder of 1978 a contingency of $70.7 million is provided. This is conservative. So the total amount is actually $454.2 million, and we may be required later on to add even more.

But the urgency is now. The relief is provided in many forms.

I wish to state this for the record: Temporary housing, unemployment assistance, individual and family grants, debris removal, repair and restoration of damaged facilities, and similar reimbursements had to be delayed due to the extreme shortage of funds. You can see how important they are. They not only deal with property damage but with the welfare of human beings.

So this supplemental of $300 million is required, again, to insure that States, counties, and cities will be reimbursed for the costs they have already incurred and to provide a modest reserve for potential emergency and disaster declarations during the remainder of this year, fiscal 1978.

Today, the disaster relief fund is exhausted. Firm commitments to States and localities far exceed the balance on hand.

If any unforeseen disasters were to occur in the next week or 10 days, it is impossible that no relief could be provided such areas and our fellow citizens.

A fiscal emergency now exists at HUD and I urge the Senate to approve this $300 million supplemental appropriation for the Federal Disaster Assistance Administration.

If any unforeseen disasters were to occur in the next week or 10 days, and I know there was one in Nebraska last week or day before yesterday—snow melting is going to cause a lot of this—but if any of these did occur, no matter how small, there would be absolutely no funds down there at HUD.

So the Senator from North Dakota and I are urging, in view of all this and in view of having cleared it with a great majority of the Appropriations Committee members on this side, and with the House of Representatives being almost unanimous on the matter, that we should go ahead today because we are going into a recess, and they need this money.

The Senator from North Dakota has been very cooperative. Normally I think he and I have a pretty strict rule down there that when we get to these amounts of money we better have it down in front of the committee and have a thorough review. But this turned out to be an emergency in itself to be able to take care of such emergencies, and this is no precedent whatsoever in the Appropriations Committee about taking up bills at this time or this way.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, I agree with the destinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee (Mr. MAGNUSON) that this is a very urgent matter.

The bill came over from the House of Representatives last night too late to get a committee quorum.

Mr. MAGNUSON. The House of Representatives waited too long. We should have had this bill a week ago or 10 days ago, yes.

Mr. YOUNG. There was no chance of the Appropriations Committee acting before we recessed for Easter. The recess schedule was set sometime ago.

I agree with the chairman, Senator MAGNUSON, that this is unusual procedure, one which we would not want to follow very often, but this is such an emergency that we feel that we must handle the bill in this way in order to help those States that have experienced devastating floods and other disasters.

Mr. President, I shall read a paragraph from the House report which explains very well the need for this appropriation and ask that the remainder of that report be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks:

The Committee recommends $300 million to meet the urgent requirement for disaster relief activities resulting from the severe weather conditions recently experienced in many areas of the Nation. This level of funding represents the $150 million supplemental request transmitted with the President's budget in January and an additional $150 million supplemental request pending within the administration but not yet formally transmitted to the Congress.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the report of the House Committee on Appropriations entitled "Disaster Relief Supplemental Appropriation" be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DISASTER RELIEF

The Committee recommends $300 million to meet the urgent requirement for disaster relief activities resulting from the severe weather conditions recently experienced in many areas of the Nation. This level of funding represents the $150 million supplemental request transmitted with the President's budget in January and an additional $150 million supplemental request pending within the administration but not yet formally transmitted to the Congress.

Because of the heavy disaster activity in fiscal year 1977, the budget for fiscal year 1979 (H. Doc. 95-280) proposed a supplemental appropriation of $150 million for disaster relief activities in fiscal year 1978. However, the recent severe weather conditions, especially in the northeast and midwest regions of the country have resulted in several major disaster and emergency declarations. Funds required for these recent declarations are the subject of an additional supplemental request which the administration is now considering. Although this request has not been formally transmitted, because of the urgent need for the funds, the Committee is recommending that the full supplemental appropriation of $300 million be provided at this time.

The disaster relief program is designed to supplement the efforts and available resources of State and local governments and voluntary relief organizations. The President's declaration of a major disaster or an emergency authorizes Federal assistance under the Disaster Relief Act of 1974 and triggers other Federal disaster relief programs. By Executive Order 11795, the President delegated the primary responsibility for administering the act to the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development. The Secretary assigned program management responsibility to the Administrator of the Federal Disaster Assistance Administration. The Federal response to a major disaster or emergency declaration is coordinated by the Federal Disaster Assistance Administration.

A Presidential declaration of a major disaster or an emergency makes a wide range of assistance available to individuals and to State and local governments. Some of the available assistance is targeted at temporary housing, temporary mortgage or rental payment assistance, legal services, clearance of debris, repair or replacement of roads, public utilities, and emergency protective measures for preserving life and property. The assistance can be provided by various Federal agencies which are subsequently reimbursed by the Federal Disaster Assistance Administration.

The Congress, in the 1978 HUD-Independent Agencies Appropriation Act, provided $150 million for disaster relief activities in fiscal year 1978. That amount was believed sufficient to meet average yearly relief requirements. However, it was recognized that additional funds could be needed because of the unpredictable nature of this activity.

Funds required in fiscal year 1978 for fiscal year 1977 disaster declarations such as the floods in Johnstown, Pa., and in Kansas City total over $180 million, or more than $30 million in excess of the regular disaster relief appropriation. In addition, recent emergency and disaster declarations due to severe weather conditions in Michigan, Indiana, Ohio, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, California and elsewhere have resulted in estimated requirements of $180 million.

The Federal Disaster Assistance Administration has already delayed reimbursement of more than $150 million to other Federal agencies for expenses they have incurred due to disaster and emergency declarations. Supplemental funding is required to insure that States and localities will be reimbursed for costs they have already incurred, and to enable the Federal Disaster Assistance Administration to advance funds for individual and family grants for clothing, medical and other eligible emergency expenses.

Finally, the Committee is concerned about problems associated with disaster relief procedures. In the past few months the FDAA has authorized reimbursement of local governments for snow removal in at least six States. This reimbursement authority applies only to work performed under contract or purchase order. This may have the effect of penalizing a locality that maintains an adequate snow removal capability and rewarding a locality that under-budgets for snow removal or maintains little or no in-house capability. This policy appears to be inherently inequitable and the Committee requests that FDAA review the criteria by which localities may receive reimbursements for future emergency snow removal declarations.

The Committee also notes that because of a variety of circumstances—including actual determination of the severity of an emergency—declarations may not be made immediately after a storm strikes a State or States. The Committee urges both the States and the FDAA to shorten as much as is prudently and reasonably possible the length of time from when a storm strikes a specific area to when the actual emergency declaration is issued. This will insure that assistance is forthcoming in a timely manner.

INFLATIONARY IMPACT STATEMENT

Pursuant to clause 2(1)(4), rule XI of the House of Representatives, the Committee estimates that the enactment of the joint resolution would have no inflationary impact.

COMPARISONS WITH BUDGET RESOLUTION

In accordance with section 308(a)(1)(A) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-34), the following table provides comparisons between new budget authority set forth in the Second Concurrent Resolution on the Budget, as allocated by the Committee on Appropriations under section 302 of the act, and the fiscal year 1978 new budget authority contained in the accompanying joint resolution:

Subcommittee: HUD Independent Agencies	Thousands
Sec. 302 allocation	$77,900,423
Amount in prior appropriations	74,008,601
Amount remaining	3,891,822
Committee bill	300,000
Amount (+) over allocation (−) under allocation	−3,591,822

FIVE-YEAR PROJECTION OF OUTLAYS

In accordance with section 308(a)(1)(B) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-344), the following table contains five-year projections of the outlays associated with the fiscal year 1978 new budget authority provided in the accompanying joint resolution:

Budget authority, fiscal year
Outlays:
1978	$300,000,000
Fiscal year:
1979	45,000,000

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENTS

In accordance with section 308(a)(1)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-344), the financial assistance to State and local governments provided in the joint resolution totals $205 million in new budget (obligational) authority and $205 million in budget outlays.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I also wish to mention, in the presence of the the Senator from North Dakota, myself, and the Senator from Wisconsin, that yesterday this matter was discussed at some length with the leadership on both sides and several Senators, and they all urged us to go ahead this morning and do as we are doing.

Mr. YOUNG. That is correct.

Mr. PROXMIRE subsequently said. Mr. President, the disaster relief measure we passed earlier today is a completely noncontroversial appropriation resolution to provide disaster relief to States and localities that have suffered substantial losses because of severe weather conditions. The legislation was passed by the House on Wednesday and appropriates $300 million in fiscal 1978 funds for two purposes: about $170 million is to reimburse Federal agencies for obligations made in fiscal year 1977 to counteract the effects of disaster declarations affecting Appalachia, Johnstown, Pa., Kansas City and other parts of the country; and the remainder is to provide support directly to States and localities that have suffered from winter weather conditions over the last few months with a cushion of $47.8 million for future declarations in fiscal year 1978.

Speed is of the essence here. Otherwise towns in the States of Michigan, Indiana, Ohio, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, California, New Hampshire, and Maine may find that, despite a disaster declaration, funds are not available to meet their requests for assistance.

For that reason, I think it was wise for the chairmen of the Appropriations Committees in the House and Senate both to agree to take up this legislation, although all of us would have preferred to have had it discussed at greater length in the Appropriations Committee. As I say, it is noncontroversial. It is necessary. Without it it means these cities would have been in very serious difficulty.

The situation as I understand it is that $50 million in disaster funds remains unobligated but $35 million of this total is currently committed to applications for assistance that have been received by the Federal Government. That leaves a total of $15 million in uncommitted funding. This kitty could easily be depleted by April 1.

Normally I would oppose taking up legislation of this magnitude without referring it first to the Appropriations Committee. But experience tells me that we will not deny these funds in any event. Experience also tells me that the citizen who does not receive disaster relief support to which he is entitled because the Senate took an Easter recess without passing this legislation is going to lose a great deal of faith in his Government. Thus I completely approve of the Senate's decision to move now to send the proposal to the White House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution is before the Senate and open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be offered, the question is on the third reading and passage of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (H.J. Res. 796) was ordered to a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. YOUNG. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I know this will happen, but I urge that this measure be returned to the House of Representatives as promptly as possible, because they will only be in session, I understand, until 1 o'clock to sign some of these bills. All we have been doing will come to naught unless we get it over there fast.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume consideration of Executive N, 95th Congress, 1st session, Calendar No. 2, the Panama Canal Treaty, which the clerk will state.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

EXECUTIVE N, 95TH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION, THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the treaty.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I inquire of the Chair: What is pending before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Article I is pending.

Mr. SARBANES. Article I of the Panama Canal Treaty.

Mr. President, am I correct there are 14 articles to this treaty?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SARBANES. Is there an amendment pending to article I?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is none.

Mr. SARBANES. I ask the Chair: How many amendments are there pending at the desk? I realize, of course, Senators can offer unprinted amendments from the floor or submit further printed amendments to the Chair as we proceed with our consideration of the Panama Canal Treaty. But I ask the Chair, if there is a count as to how many amendments there are to the text of the treaty, to the 14 articles. We are now on article I of the 14; how many amendments to the 14 articles are pending at the desk?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-four.

Mr. SARBANES. Forty-four amendments to the 14 articles?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. SARBANES. Does the Chair have it by category as to how many amendments are pending to article I, article II, article III, and so forth?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are nine amendments to article I.

Mr. SARBANES. Nine amendments to article I pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes. Three to article II; six amendments to article III.

Mr. SARBANES. Excuse me, six to article III? May I recapitulate? Nine amendments to article I, six amendments to article II, six amendments to article III.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Two to article IV.

Mr. SARBANES. Two to article IV.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One to article V; one to article X.

Mr. SARBANES. One to article X?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. SARBANES. I take it there are none pending to articles VI, VII, VIII, and IX?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SARBANES. There are nine amendments pending to article I, three to article II, six to article III, two to article IV, one to article V, none to articles VI, VII, VIII, and IX; one to article X.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. These are the printed amendments.

Mr. SARBANES. Printed amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. None are unprinted.

Five to article XII; 11 to article XIII; one to article XIV.

Mr. SARBANES. How many to article XI? I do not think I heard the Chair say?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Article XI?

Mr. SARBANES. To article XI.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eleven to article XIII.

Mr. SARBANES. The question was how many amendments are there pending to article XI.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are four that are printed that deal with article XI.

Mr. SARBANES. All right. Four to article XI; five to article XII, 11 to article XIII, and one to article XIV?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. SARBANES. Then, I take it, there are understandings, reservations, declarations, and amendments pending to the resolution of ratification?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A total of 12.

Mr. SARBANES. I want to make sure of where we are. I think it is probably useful, doing it at this point. If I may inquire further, as I understand it, there are 44 amendments pending at the desk to the 14 articles of the treaty; is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. SARBANES. There are then 12 amendments, understandings, reservations, or declarations pending to the resolution of ratification; is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SARBANES. So there is a total of 56 changes of one sort or another pending on the articles of the treaty or on the Resolution of Ratification?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SARBANES. I thank the Chair.

Mr. HATCH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who seeks recognition? The Senator from Utah or the Senator from Alabama? The Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, after the legislative recess I intend to present an amendment at the desk which will call up, I think, one of the most important issues in our country's history, and it happens to involve the Panama Canal and this particular treaty.

I have had the privilege of being the ranking minority member of the Separation of Powers Subcommittee, which is chaired by the distinguished Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN), and I have had the privilege of sitting in on countless hours of testimony concerning the constitutional issues involved in these treaties.

I have listened to the comments on both sides and, of course, the questions propounded and the answers received by the distinguished Senator from Alabama and others; and I think we are about to enter into, as soon as we return from the recess, the consideration of one of the most important constitutional issues to involve the country in many, many years. That happens to consist of the arguments surrounding article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution, which basically makes it clear that whenever the President seeks by treaty or otherwise to transfer American property he has to have the consent of both Houses of Congress and not just the two-thirds ratification or consent to ratification of the Senate.

Article IV, section 3, clause 2, in my opinion, is probably the most important consideration involved in the whole matter concerning the Panama Canal treaties.

Mr. President, it is my understanding that Senator Proxmire is here and would like to speak on the treaty, and because of his schedule I would be delighted to yield to him to speak at this time and continue my remarks after he is through. I will be delighted to listen to what he has to say.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Utah. I am very grateful to him. I happen to have heard the Senator from Utah speak on the treaty many times. He is not only very articulate and persuasive but he is, unfortunately, one of those most handsome and attractive Republicans who defeat our good Democrats. I do not like that, but there is nothing I can do about it.

I must say I greatly admire him.

Mr. President, the Senator from Utah was talking about how important this treaty is, and I think it is important. But we ought to put it in perspective. I would like to put it in perspective in a couple of ways. First, let us consider that in the more than 200 years of existence of this Republic and existence of the Senate, we have never taken, to the best of my knowledge, as long on a treaty as we are likely to take on this one. There will be 3 or 4 months of debate, and I think it is a good thing to discuss any issue as much as we can; but I think we should recognize that there are many other issues of great importance.

We have discussed this far longer than we discussed the Declaration of War in World War I or World War II; the Louisiana Purchase, which, of course, represented about a third of our country; and many other issues of great importance were not discussed at any length at all.

I have been in the Senate now for more than 20 years, and it is interesting that a very parallel international waterway, the St. Lawrence Seaway, has been discussed, in the 20 years I have been here, maybe a total of 2 hours. I doubt if it has been discussed that much on the floor of the Senate. It has been considered in committee for a day or two, but not very long.

It is a waterway that, in my view, has a greater potential than the Panama Canal, and has been neglected by far more than the Panama Canal, and I would like to discuss that in the Senate this morning.

THE PANAMA CANAL AND THE ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY SYSTEM: ATTENTION AND NEGLECT

On March 16 the Senate approved the first of two treaties that will affect the future of the Panama Canal. Since debate on the treaties began in early February, the Senate has devoted more than 160 hours and nearly 1,000 pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to exploring the prospective ramifications of the proposed treaties on the national security and economic well-being of the United States.

The time has been well spent. The Panama Canal treaties have opened up a highly charged, emotional controversy requiring many days and weeks of meticulous presentation on both sides of the issue in order to lay the facts before the American people. Even now, final passage of the second Panama Canal Treaty remains in doubt as opponents redouble their efforts to preserve the status quo in our relations with the Republic of Panama.

Mr. President, I have been struck by the discrepancy between our having poured so much thought, hard work, money and effort into the Panama Canal over the years and so comparatively little into promoting the interests of another international waterway along our own borders: the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway System.

The Federal Government's failure to promote the interests of the seaway is a national disgrace, particularly in view of the phenomenal attention we have lavished on the distant Panama Canal for the last 6 weeks.

Just as fish pay little attention to water despite its constant life-giving nourishment, we as a nation too often ignore the value of national resources close at hand because they make relatively fewer demands on us. We take them for granted.

All of us are aware of the strategic importance of the Panama Canal to the United States. The canal's primary function of shortening distances for military and commercial vessels moving between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans is readily discerned from a quick glance at the map. Its national security and economic significance for the United States has been highlighted by a colorful and exciting history, a saga of legendary proportions which thrilled many of us in our childhood years.

It is regrettable that we do not have as firm a grasp of the importance of the St. Lawrence Seaway to millions of American citizens who live in the Great Lakes region. The Presiding Officer, Senator ANDERSON lives in the Great Lakes region. The Midwest is home to more than one-third of our Nation's people and over 40 percent of our industry. The St. Lawrence is a vital transportation artery connecting the heartland of America to the rest of the world. It serves as an essential conduit for thousands of tons of goods from the largest exporting area of the United States to other nations via the port cities of the Great Lakes.

The story of the seaway lacks the medical drama of the Panama Canal with its 20,000 deaths from yellow fever and malaria and a dashing Dr. Walter Reed to the rescue. But it makes for compelling reading nonetheless. Few Americans realize the staggering effort required to open one of the largest rivers in North America to commercial navigation. Construction of the 360-mile seaway was one of the great engineering feats of human history, exceeding in scope both the 52-mile Panama Canal and the 100-mile Suez. I contrast that 360 miles for the seaway, only 52 miles for the Panama Canal and a 100 miles for the Suez. And while the history of the seaway offers no charismatic young doctor, it does provide us with a beautiful young Queen Elizabeth who arrives on the scene to join with President Eisenhower in dedicating the beginning of the waterway's operations.

Mr. President, it has occurred to me during the debate on the Panama Canal that we should also pause long enough to reflect on the problems, potentials and needs of this other vital link in the world's transportation system, one which is much closer to home and which has given us low-cost and nearly trouble-free service in its two decades of operation.

After all, the Panama Canal and the St. Lawrence Seaway enjoy a number of similarities:

Both greatly facilitate commercial navigation between parts of the United States otherwise separated from each other and from foreign ports by land and longer distances.

Both systems were conceived in the latter years of the 19th century. In 1879 Frenchman Ferdinand De Lesseps declared that he would build a canal across what is now Panama, which was then a part of Colombia. In 1897 a joint United States-Canadian commission first recommended construction of a deep-draft seaway to open the Great Lakes region to international trade.

Second. The canal and the seaway join America's four seacoasts. The canal links the Pacific to the Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico; the seaway provides access from the gulf and Atlantic coasts to the shores of our fourth seacoast, along the Great Lakes.

Also these two waterways were even constructed at a similar cost to the United States: $387 million for the canal and $383 million for the St. Lawrence and connecting channels in the lakes.

But here the similarities end.

Construction of the Panama Canal was completed by 1914, just slightly more than a decade after ratification of the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty which ceded control of the Canal Zone to the United States. But it was more than 60 years after the United States-Canada Deep Waterway Commission urged construction of the seaway before plans to open the 2,342 miles of water between Duluth, Minn., and the Atlantic Ocean were brought to fruition. Intense lobbying by east coast and gulf port interests against the seaway filled the intervening years.

The Panama Canal has been operated under increasingly hostile conditions since the 1964 riots indicated that the people of the Republic of Panama no longer took a benign view of American occupation of the zone dividing their country. Because of the canal's distance from the United States and the need to provide effective military protection, the Federal Government has spent almost $7 billion in the last three-quarters of a century to insure the security of the Panama Canal's operations. Nearly 34,000 Americans live in the Canal Zone to serve its military and operational needs.

Now, the St. Lawrence Seaway, on the other hand, has enjoyed nearly 20 years of cooperative joint operation by the friendly governments of the United States and Canada. During this time the American portion of the Seaway has required fewer than 200 people for operation and administration. The costs of the seaway do not include any expenditures for defense. Furthermore, the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation, the agency charged with responsibility for administering the American locks, is authorized to collect toll revenues sufficient to recover the original cost of the seaway's construction in addition to annual operation and maintenance costs.

In 19 years the Seaway Corporation has repaid 14 percent of its original investment for construction of the seaway, with payment of the balance due by 2009. This compares favorably with the Panama Canal, which in its nearly 75 years of operation has returned only $1.25 billion to the Nation's taxpayers who have footed the bill for nearly $9 billion in total costs over the lifetime of the canal.

Mr. President, it is paradoxical that the Federal Government demands by law that the St. Lawrence Seaway pay for itself while at the same time promoting policies that militate against the efficient use of Great Lakes ports. One major difference in our Government's attitudes toward the Panama Canal and the seaway is found in our double standard approach to discrimination.

Ever since the 1900 Hay-Pauncefote Treaty with Great Britain, the United States has pledged to keep the Panama Canal "free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations" on terms of equality and without discrimination as to "conditions and charges of traffic." But we have not shown the same consideration to our own citizens in the Midwest for whom the seaway should be the most efficient route for shipping goods abroad and to other locations within the United States. Despite the fact that the 1970 Merchant Marine Act recognized the Great Lakes as America's fourth seacoast, the Intertate Commerce Commission has endorsed rail freight rates that are prejudicial to the Midwest's Great Lakes ports—prejudicial to Duluth, prejudicial to Milwaukee, prejudicial to Green Bay, Superior, Kenosha, and other ports on the Great Lakes—and give preferential treatment to gulf and Atlantic ports.

Ever since completion of the seaway in 1959 the lakes have tried to get a fair rate formula for their ports. In 1971 the ICC finally investigated the rate charges to and from the Great Lakes. These rates were then compared with the charges to and from other ports. In 1976, after 5 years and overwhelming evidence of discrimination, ICC ruled that the rates were neither unjust, unreasonable, nor prejudicial. Even granting the ICC's reputation as a protector of monopoly enterprise, this conclusion represents an incredible blindness to the facts.

Take just one example typical of the discriminatory rates currently in effect: In 1977 the rate to freight fiberglass shipments from Charleston, W. Va., to Baltimore was $0.68 cheaper per hundredweight than the rate to ship the same commodity to Cleveland, even though Cleveland is 143 miles closer.

This charge-the-Great-Lakes-more policy is thoroughly discriminatory and flies in the face of ICC's responsibility to regulate commerce in the public's interest. Can you imagine the international outrage that would result if we demonstrated the same flagrant disregard for fairness toward other nations that use the Panama Canal? The present controversy over the pending treaties would pale in comparison to the uproar that would result from such action.

The lakes have tried and failed to get administrative relief from freight rate discrimination. Clearly the ICC is not about to disturb life-as-usual by treating the Nation's fourth seacoast on a par with the ports along our other coasts.

The only available remedy left is legislative action to prohibit rate discrimination on the basis of geographical location.

Legislation along these lines is now pending before appropriate committees of the Senate and House of Representatives. Devotion of just a fraction of the time we have spent on the canal treaties to hearings on rates discrimination bills would provide a needed step in the direction of solving this particular problem.

I just wish that a recitation of the facts on rail freight rates would exhaust the list of discriminatory policies that inhibit commerce via the St. Lawrence Seaway. No such luck.

Under the Cargo Preference Act of 1954, at least 50 percent of federally financed freight must be carried on American-flag vessels when they are available at fair and reasonable rates. The purpose of that act was to provide support for the American shipbuilding industry without unduly restricting the exercise of discretion by a particular Government agency as to costs or quality control. For 15 years the Agency for International Development maintained a firm policy of requiring that Public Law 480 food-for-peace grains be shipped on American-flag vessels to the maximum extent possible, at levels substantially higher than the 50-percent provision of the Cargo Preference Act. Because relatively few American ships plied the lakes, Midwestern ports lost a large number of jobs, and American taxpayers paid the bill for shipping Midwest grains to distant ports served by American ships.

Although this thoughtless policy was changed by AID in 1976, there are still pressures on the Agency to reinstate its former discriminatory approach to implementing the law. Congress should consider amending the law itself to reflect the realities of the levels of American shipping companies that patronize the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway system.

Another way in which government policy has historically put the seaway at a disadvantage is found in the repayment requirements that apply to the seaway alone. Of all the waterways in the United States, only the St. Lawrence system is required to pay back its entire cost of construction as well as the costs of operation and maintenance. There is substantial merit in the argument that users of a transportation system should be required to help defray the costs of building and operating that system. But it is patently unfair to impose such a demand on the St. Lawrence alone. Congress has waited long enough to impose user charges on the Nation's other inland waterways. I cannot think of any more appropriate followup to disposition of the Panama Canal treaties than prompt enactment of the Domenici amendment to the Navigation Development Act which has been pending on the Senate Calendar since October of last year. Passage of this amendment will put other domestic waterways on the same pay-as-you-go basis that has been required of the seaway from the beginning.

Mr. President, I am particularly concerned about the most recent example of discrimination against the Great Lakes that has come to my attention: The Treasury Department's trigger pricing formula to protect the domestic steel industry against the dumping of foreign steel in the United States.

I am sure that most of the Great Lakes commercial interests recognize the need to provide safeguards against such dumping practices. This is true even though import steel accounts for 85 percent of the total general cargo moving through Great Lakes ports. At the same time, the Great Lakes should not be called upon to bear any greater share of the burden of such protection than any other section of the country.

A week ago Tuesday I shared a taxi cab with Frank Miller, seaport director of the Toledo-Lucas County Port Authority. On a day when the Senate had spent more than 10 hours debating the Panama Canal it was ironic to learn of the short shrift which the St. Lawrence Seaway is getting from the Federal Government. The problem which Frank Miller described to me is this:

Under the Treasury Department's trigger pricing formula which sets price floors for imported steel, the Great Lakes are put at a competitive disadvantage vis-a-vis gulf and east coast importers in the calculation of transportation assessments included in the total trigger price. The trigger price formula is designed in a way that seriously alters the normal ocean freight differentials among the various coastal regions of the country. The result will be disastrous for the Great Lakes which stand to lose a disproportionately large share of remaining import steel shipments and grain backhauls.

The Great Lakes task force has recently issued a fact sheet that spells out the extent of discrimination against the lakes. For example, the task force report notes, Japanese steel by way of the seaway can now be laid down in the port of Cleveland for $5 per metric ton cheaper than via New Orleans and the Mississippi River to Cincinnati. Under the trigger price formula, this cost advantage of the seaway is lost and it becomes $1 per metric ton less expensive to use the New Orleans route.

An even more telling example: European steel, which has a $15-per-ton advantage to cities such as Dayton, Ohio, via the seaway, could be delivered cheaper under the trigger formula via New Orleans, even though the latter route is nearly 2,000 miles longer.

It is essential that the Carter administration act immediately to redress this situation by restoring the pretrigger formula ocean differentials so as to maintain a competitive transportation relationship among the Nation's seacoasts. The Great Lakes ports are willing to share equally in the effort to preserve the jobs of domestic steel workers and the U.S. steel industry. But they should be allowed to compete on a competitive basis for remaining supplies of import steel.

Mr. President, as chairman of the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee which funds the Environmental Protection Agency I have had yet another occasion during this time of debate on the canal treaties to compare the extent of our efforts on the canal with our treatment of the lakes. Earlier this month, in the course of hearings on EPA's budget request for fiscal year 1979, I learned that the agency proposed to reduce its funding for Great Lakes pollution and R. & D. programs by half. This lack of interest in the Great Lakes is appalling given Congress expressed intent to protect and upgrade the water quality of this unique national treasure. The Great Lakes constitute nearly 20 percent of the world's fresh water supply, almost 97 per cent of our own domestic supply of fresh water. Because of the high level of commercial activity on and around the lakes, we must make an extended effort to solve the environmental problems which invariably accompany such activity. I intend to make every effort to insure that these unwarranted budget cuts are restored.

Finally, Mr. President, I would like to conclude my remarks on a more positive note. One of the major differences between the Panama Canal and the St. Lawrence Seaway System is that the former is open to navigation throughout the year while the latter is closed as a result of weather conditions during the winter months. I am glad to say that great strides are being made in our efforts to open the lakes to navigation on a year-round basis.

In 1970 Congress authorized a program to demonstrate the feasibility of prolonging the navigation season, which traditionally has been limited to the period between March 15 and December 15. Under the 1974 Water Resources Development Act, the winter navigation demonstration program was continued to the end of 1976.

The Water Development Act of that year included an amendment which I introduced to extend the program for 3 additional years, until September 30, 1979. That amendment also increased the authorization for the program from $9.5 million to $15.6 million.

Knowledgeable sources in the Army Corps of Engineers believe that extending the navigation season to January 31 is achievable in the next 3 to 5 years on the upper four Great Lakes and within 5 to 7 years for the lower St. Lawrence system. The Administrator of the Seaway Development Corporation concurs with this timetable and believes that navigation for 11 months of the year may be feasible within a decade.

Mr. President, I might point out that the Soviet Union operates in waterways that are much farther north and much colder, because they use their technology and use it fully to open up those waterways. The benefits not only to Wisconsin, Minnesota, Illinois, Michigan, and other Great Lakes States but to the whole country from opening up the Great Lakes for 12 months, which can be done with our present technology, are enormous. The economic benefits would be very great. Imagine what it does to someone who operates on the Great Lakes who can only operate 8 months a year. It has a very, very difficult and paralyzing kind of effect.

We need to do all that we can to encourage the winter navigation program while concurrently insuring that environmental problems associated with an extended navigation season are resolved. One of the most effective actions we can take is to upgrade the icebreaking capability of the U.S. Coast Guard fleet on the lakes. Year around navigation on the St. Lawrence Seaway system will save the Nation millions of dollars in transportation costs and provide substantial economic benefits for the third of the Nation's people who live in the Midwest. But better, more efficient icebreakers are needed if winter navigation is to become a reality.

Mr. President, the Senate will continue to debate the merits of the Panama Canal treaties in the weeks ahead. We will undoubtedly hear repeated many times the ways in which the Panama Canal is important to the United States. I hope that in the midst of all of this attention to that distant waterway in the south, we will stop to remember the enormous contribution which the other waterway to the north has made to our Nation's economic well-being. It is difficult to predict what the future holds for the Panama Canal. But we can do much to determine the future of the St. Lawrence Seaway system along our own borders. I hope that we will take full advantage of that opportunity and act wisely to promote and not destroy the many benefits offered by the gateway to America's fourth seacoast.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator withhold that?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I withhold that, Mr. President. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

UP AMENDMENTS NO. 15

(Subsequently numbered amendment No. 91.)

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment offered on behalf of the distinguished Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH), the distinguished Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS), and myself, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alabama, for himself, Mr. HATCH, and Mr. HELMS, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 15.

At the end of article I, section 3, strike period, insert semicolon and add the following: "Provided, however, that all citizens of the United States who are now employees of the Panama Canal Company shall be permitted to continue their positions with the Panama Canal Commission until they reach retirement age, retire voluntarily, or are discharged for cause."

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, on the last vote we had in the Senate there were 71 Senators who answered to their names. I do not know how many would be present to answer to a rollcall vote on this amendment. I am not insisting on a rollcall vote at this time. I do not know what the position of the managers of the treaty will be or what the position of the leadership will be with respect to a vote. Of course, I am ready to have a vote after the amendment has been explained, or I am ready for it to be carried over until Monday a week, after the recess. It seems it would be more appropriate to wait until a larger number of Senators are present. That, of course, would be on Monday a week.

This is an important amendment, as are all of the amendments the Senator from Alabama will offer.

I do not feel that any dilatory amendments will be offered by any of the Senators who wish to strengthen this treaty and who wish to strengthen the Neutrality Treaty, or the defense treaty—that might be a more appropriate term to apply to it. The amendments that have been offered have sought to strengthen the position of the United States with respect to the defense of the canal. The amendments to the Neutrality Treaty would have provided a stronger defense role for the United States in defending the canal because, under the Neutrality Treaty as agreed to here in the Senate, we are given certain rights to defend the canal, starting in the year 2000, but we are deprived of much of the means of defending the canal, because all of our troops have to be out of Panama by the year 2000.

It would take an invasion of Panama by the United States, after the year 1999, in order for us to defend the canal. That, of course, would cause international repercussions. But the Neutrality Treaty has been approved in the Senate. It is not as strong as the so-called opponents of the Panama Canal treaties would have liked that treaty to be. It does not protect our ability to defend the canal as the opponents of the treaties would have liked to see provided. Those of us who oppose the treaties take the position that if we are unable to defeat the treaties, we want to see approved in the Senate the best possible versions of the treaties to protect the interests of the American taxpayer, versions that will allow our country the best opportunity to defend the canal.

(Mr. HUDDLESTON assumed the chair.)

Mr. ALLEN. I suggest that the amendments that are going to be offered will not be as numerous as was pointed out a few moments ago as the number of amendments at the desk, in the neighborhood of 40 or 50. I feel that that number will not be offered, but I do not feel that the amendments at the desk necessarily would be the ones that are called up.

I would say that it is in the best interests of our country, in the best interests of the taxpayers of our country, first, to defeat this treaty, the Panama Canal Treaty. After all, the main question is still before the Senate. All we have done thus far is provide for a defense of the canal starting in the year 2000. There remain the basic and fundamental questions to be decided: Shall we give the canal away? And shall we pay hundreds of millions of dollars for the privilege of giving it away? Those questions are still before the Senate.

I might say that all of the work that has gone into approving the first treaty will be held for naught unless this treaty is approved. Defeat of the Panama Canal Treaty will, in effect, defeat the Neutrality Treaty. Because that treaty was put ahead of the Panama Canal Treaty, we were called on to decide about the manner of defense of the canal starting in the year 2000 before we even decided whether or not we are going to give the canal away. So, to those who feel that the battle against these treaties has been partially defeated, that would not present an accurate assessment of the situation, because defeat of this treaty will defeat both treaties. The basic and fundamental question, whether we should give the canal away and whether we should pay hundreds of millions of dollars in the process, is the paramount question before the Senate today.

We never know what will be the result of a rollcall on the resolution of ratification. We do not vote on the treaty itself. After it has gone through the amendment process, then a resolution of ratification is prepared and that is what we vote on. But until we have a final vote, we shall not know what the outcome will be.

It has been stated on the floor a number of times that the vote on the Neutrality Treaty was 68 in favor and 32 against, suggesting, of course, that the vote was top-heavy in favor of the treaty. At first blush, that would seem to be correct. A vote of 68 to 32 would certainly be a top-heavy vote. But, under our Constitution, of course, it takes a two-thirds vote to give the Senate's advice and consent to a treaty. The very minimum required to approve the treaty was 67 votes. So, in getting 68 votes to 32, there was only one vote to spare.

I am pleased that the recess that has been agreed upon in the Senate will enable Senators to go back to their home States, talk to their people, and see if the people approve of the actions that they have taken. I welcome the opportunity to go back to Alabama and talk to my constituents, because I believe that I have acted in their best interests. I believe I have acted in line with their wishes and their thinking. I am delighted that Senators will get this opportunity to go back and talk to their people and see if they approve of the action that has been taken.

At least two Senators who voted for the Neutrality Treaty have stated that their vote for the Neutrality Treaty does not necessarily mean that they are going to vote for the Panama Canal Treaty; that it is one thing to vote for the defense of the canal, but it is another thing to vote to give the Panama Canal away. So we are hopeful that Senators, after talking with their constituents, if they find that their constituents do not approve of the actions that they have taken here, will be statesmanlike enough to reverse their positions. Actually, it would not be a reversal of position, because approval of defense does not necessarily imply approval of a giveway. I feel that Senators who voted for the Neutrality Treaty could, while still being consistent, vote now against giving the canal away.

It is up to the American people. It is up to the American people whether this treaty before us can be defeated and will be defeated.

A group of dedicated Senators has sought, as they see it, to protect the best interests of the people of the United States by defeating these treaties. They feel that is in line with the wishes of the people. Certainly we hope that the people, if that be the case, will communicate their wishes to their Senators.

I have no doubt in my mind that if the view of the people of the United States was being expressed here on the Senate floor, the treaties would be overwhelmingly defeated.

The distinguished Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH) has an amendment in which several of us are joining, the distinguished Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) being one of the sponsors, and the Senator from Alabama now speaking being one of the sponsors, that would provide that this treaty shall not enter into force until article IV, section 3, paragraph 2 of the U.S. Constitution has been complied with. That section provides that the Congress shall have the power to dispose of the territory and other property of the United States.

Legal authorities, scholars, have pointed out that where a power is given to one branch of the Government under the Constitution and no conflicting power is given to another branch, that power would be an exclusive power.

We own the property in the Panama Canal Zone, own it in fee simple, which means the entire title. It has been stated on this floor by Senators that we lease that property. Well, I feel whoever made that statement—and one eminent Senator did—is not advised as to the facts, because a joint Panamanian-U.S. commission bought the property in the Panama Canal Zone in the name of the United States of America. To remove all doubt of that, we had brought into one of the hearing rooms in the Senate the actual deed records showing the acquisition of this property in fee simple by the United States.

So let us not hear any more talk of this property being leased. The United States owns the property in the Panama Canal Zone, which would include the actual artery as well as the Panama Canal Zone.

Mr. HELMS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; I yield to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. The Senator from North Carolina was present in that hearing room to which the distinguished Senator from Alabama just alluded.

I think it is interesting that it required three enormous crates to bring into the hearing room all the documents relating to the acquisition of the property.

Mr. ALLEN. That is correct.

Mr. HELMS. These were sealed and they were in good condition.

As this Senator recalls, a distinguished citizen from my State, J. C. Luitweiler, was in charge of an important aspect of the acquisition of the property, and he testified in a very interesting, enlightened fashion about the question.

The Senator from Alabama mentioned that a Senator on this floor had stated that the United States does not own the property. Well, as as a matter of fact, the President of the United States said the same thing on television.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. HELMS. And the President of the United States was just as wrong as the Senator who stated during these debates that the United States does not own the property in the Canal Zone.

Mr. ALLEN. Another thing he said was that this treaty, giving the canal to Panama, would not cost the American taxpayer anything. Maybe he should check up on that a little bit.

Mr. HELMS. I think the President needs to get his arithmetic straightened out a little.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. ALLEN. I have just been advised by the distinguished Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH) that an agreement has been reached with the managers of the treaty, that somewhat later today the amendment of the Senator from Alabama will be laid aside temporarily in order that the distinguished Senator from Utah may offer his amendment, to which I alluded a moment ago, requiring an act of Congress, in effect, for the disposition of the property of the United States in the Canal Zone before this treaty shall enter into force, and of course, that is agreeable to the Senator from Alabama.

But I do, inasmuch as I have the floor, wish to continue discussing this amendment that is the pending business.

So the major amendments that I might refer to—as I say, I am not interested in introducing an amendment unless it is a major amendment—the amendment that will be offered by the distinguished Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH) requiring congressional—which includes House and Senate—congressional approval of the disposition of the property of the United States in the Canal Zone, that will be, as I understand it, the first amendment to be voted on, which will not be voted on until the Wednesday after we come back from the recess.

We come back on Monday a week, and, as I understand it—though this might be changed—the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Utah will be the first voted on amendment, and that will come on Wednesday, almost 2 weeks hence.

But in discussing some of the major amendments that must be agreed to, I would set the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Utah as first and foremost—that is, the requirement that the House of Representatives, where sentiment does not seem to be so strong for these treaties as sentiment in the Senate seems to be, must be considered in this matter. The Constitution must be followed. Before this treaty can become effective, there must be a statute passed by the House and the Senate, approved by the President, giving permission for the disposition of this property or actually making the disposition. I would think it would be approval of the disposition, and more than half the Members of the House have joined in a resolution requesting that they be allowed to act on this question.

The managers here would have nothing to do with reaching that decision. But if we can get the amendment approved, then the House of Representatives will have to join in a statute with the Senate, authorizing its disposition. That, as I say, will be the first amendment voted on after the recess.

Another major amendment that we will offer will be an amendment to protect the taxpayers of the United States from having to pay hundreds of millions of dollars to Panama for taking the canal off our hands. An amendment will be offered providing that there shall be no expense to the American taxpayer, no payments from the Treasury, in connection with this disposition of the canal, with giving it away. It should be sufficient to give the canal away without actually paying them to take it.

I think that is an important amendment, an amendment that must be agreed to if the taxpayers of the United States are to be properly protected under this treaty. No matter how much we strengthen the treaty, it is faulted by the fact that we should not give the canal away.

We are in the best position to operate the canal, to maintain the canal, to defend the canal. Why should we give the canal to Panama and allow them to receive approximately $100 million from the operation of the canal, when the United States has operated the canal on a nonprofit basis all these years?

In addition, Mr. President, to show how the taxpayer of the United States is being treated, there is still $319 million unpaid on the original cost of the canal. We have not even received back our original investment. There is still $319 million, which is going to be canceled in this transaction. That should not be allowed. This unpaid purchase price, you might say—the unpaid cost of construction—should be frozen in as a debt of the Panama Canal Commission and should be repaid, if we are going to give away the canal.

Let us assume you have a house with a mortgage on it and you want to give it to somebody. Ordinarily, you would give it to them subject to the mortgage, if you were that big-hearted. You would not pay off the mortgage and then give it to them. The situation here is similar. There is still $319 million due on the original cost of the canal. So that needs to be straightened out by amendment.

Another amendment that will be offered in the course of the debate has to do with the Panama Canal Commission. That will be the body that takes over the operation and management of the canal from the Panama Canal Company, which is an agency of the U.S. Government. They changed the name from "Company" to "Commission." It would be transferred without debt, without liens, at the end of the 22-year period of this treaty. The Panama Canal Commission goes into effect at once.

Who makes up the commission? It is a U.S. agency, a U.S. commission. It is made up of five Americans—five citizens of the United States—and four Panamanians. No provision is made for the approval of these members of the Panama Canal Commission by the U.S. Senate.

The Senate has to approve many appointments. It has to confirm appointments that the President makes to high office. The Senate has to confirm every promotion in the Armed Forces, for that matter. If somebody becomes an ensign in the Navy or a second lieutenant in the Army, he has to be approved by the U.S. Senate.

However, there is no provision for confirmation of the appointment of these commissioners, even though four of them are Panamanians. There is no requirement that they be men or women of good character. There is no requirement that they not have a police record. There is no requirement that they may not have been engaged in criminal activity.

The treaty provides that Panama sends the names of four Panamanians to the United States and they have to be named to the commission. There is no discretion on our part. If there is any, I would like somebody to show it to me. Where is there any discretion on the part of the United States as to naming these four Panamanian commissioners?

The five U.S. commissioners do not have to be approved by the U.S. Senate. It is said that the four are Panamanians and their appointments should not be confirmed by the U.S. Senate. This is a U.S. commission, and appointment of all commissioners should be approved by the Senate. They are working for an agency of the U.S. Government; so why should they not be confirmed by the Senate? That is going to be a major amendment.

Another amendment that is going to be presented again—it was presented on the floor by the distingiushed Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE) but was rejected, and it is so important that it must be considered again—is a requirement that during the 22-year life of the Panama Canal Treaty, Panama—inasmuch as Panama and the United States are defending the canal—cannot bring in or allow to come into Panama any troops from a foreign nation.

They say we should not require that in the treaty. It is required in the Neutrality Treaty, because it says that Panama only shall have soldiers and bases in Panama starting with the year 2000. They are going to go it alone. The United States will be gone, and the Neutrality Treaty says that nobody but Panama can have troops there. Why should not the same rule apply during the 22-year existence of the Panama Canal Treaty, especially since the United States is there to defend the canal? Why allow Panama to bring in Cuban soldiers, Russian soldiers, and perhaps have a confrontation with soldiers of the United States? That is what the Dole amendment did, but it was rejected.

As we move forward in the debate on this treaty, it is interesting to see that, while some of the proponents of the treaty say they have an open mind on amendments, I notice their open minds did not open wide enough for them to support a single amendment to the Neutrality Treaty, and there were dozens offered. Not a single amendment was agreed to other than the two so-called leadership amendments. So I am going to be interested to see if that same open mind on the part of the leadership and the managers of the treaty is going to prevail here in this debate, as we consider legitimate and necessary amendments to the Panama Canal Treaty.

As I said yesterday in discussing this matter, I believe I like best the attitude of the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH). He says, very frankly, "No, I am not going to support any amendment. We cannot add"—to use his words—"8 words, 6 words, 2 words, or 1 word without killing the treaty."

Why would that kill the treaty? While there is one-man government in Panama, if dictator Torrijos wants to approve the treaties he can approve them. It does not matter if we amend the treaty 100 times. He would say, "Well, this is in the spirit of the treaty and we are going to approve it; the Panamanian Government is going to approve it."

As has been brought out here, no collateral attack on their approval could be made. So to say that amendments are going to kill the treaty is something that I do not see how Senators can state categorically. No one knows what dictator Torrijos' attitude is going to be. He is putting on quite an act down there in Panama now, making out like he is straining at the DeConcini reservation, which does by reservation provide that if it is necessary to send troops into Panama to keep the canal open, if it is closed by reason of labor strife, or military action, or whatever, then we can go in. But a reservation does not have the force and effect of an amendment to the treaty. As a matter of fact, the DeConcini reservation was first offered as an amendment, but it was turned down at the urging of the managers of the bill, supported by the leadership and supported by the administration.

We come now to the pending amendment, which I hope will be agreed to. I checked with the Panama Canal Company, which has an office here in Washington, just this morning to find out how many U.S. citizens work for the Panama Canal Company. I was told that the number is 2,065 U.S. citizens who work for the Panama Canal Company, which operates and maintains the canal.

It has been brought out here on the floor, and the distinguished Senator from Maryland (Mr. SARBANES) quoted a figure that I thought possibly was a little high, that 80 percent of the employees of the Panama Canal Company or the operators of the canal—I do not know if they use that expression, "Panama Canal Company"—but 80 percent are Panamanians. That is all right. I am not kicking about that. And Panama is going to take over the entire canal starting in the year 2000.

We will be out. Our soldiers will be out. Any control on the canal that had been exerted by us will be a thing of the past. So if they have 80 percent of the employees, why should they seek to hurry the departure of those 2,065 U.S. citizens? The treaty provides that in the next 5 years, since we are supposed to be operating the canal, we have to dispense with the services of 20 percent of those 2,065 employees. We have to show the gate to over 400 U.S. citizens who now work for the canal.

Why could they not have a little heart? People work there, have their homes, and make their livelihood there. Why can they not wait? They have 80 percent already. Why should they worry about this 2,065 to hasten their exit? I do not feel that that is quite fair.

They say the United States is going to continue to operate the canal under this treaty for 22 years, until the year 2000. What kind of operation is that, if we are to say that we have to hasten the departure of 400 of those employees? Who was looking after the U.S. citizens when this treaty was negotiated? Who was looking after them? Obviously not our negotiators. Why would they agree to such a thing?

That is not all. During this time that we are supposed to be operating the canal, this 22-year period, it is provided in the treaty that if they employ an American—I guess I should say "citizen of the United States," because I guess in a sense we are all Americans, since the name of Amerigo Vespucci was used to arrive at the term "American," but we are all too prone to say "Americans" to identify citizens of the United States.

But in this 22-year period, Mr. President, when we are supposed to have control of the canal, what does it say? That they cannot employ a noncitizen of Panama, any citizen of the United States, unless it is found that nobody there in Panama, no available employee, has this particular skill. So, during the 22 years we are supposed to operate the canal we have got to get rid of 400 employees, and we cannot bring any new employees from the United States into the employ of the Panama Canal Commission unless the person has a skill that is not available there in Panama. That does not seem to give us control of the canal during this 22-year period.

What this amendment does, Mr. President—and I state my understanding that the distinguished Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH) who worked out an agreement with the managers of the bill that his very important amendment will be brought up, and this amendment will be laid aside, so that this great constitutional issue may be determined here in the Senate—this amendment that is pending, of course, is more important to the 2,065 U.S. citizens who work for the Canal Company than is the great constitutional issue of whether the House has got to act in this area.

But overall, if the requirement that the House must act before the treaty goes into force is met, if that amendment is adopted, and then if the House kills this effort to give the canal away, that would prevent this treaty from going into effect, and that would allow these employees of the Canal Company who are citizens of the United States to be secure in their jobs.

These people have been doing good work down there. They have been operating the canal. Nobody says they are giving dictator Torrijos any trouble. Why then should they be penalized by turning them out to graze? It is just not right.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; I will yield to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. I want the Senator to know that I commend him on his amendment. I am delighted to join him in the cosponsorship of it, because he is putting his finger on what could be a very serious problem very quickly——

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. HELMS (continuing). Respecting the Panama Canal.

Governor Parfitt appeared before the Armed Services Committee, of which I am a member, and I addressed a number of questions to Governor Parfitt about the personnel situation in the Canal Zone in the unhappy event that these treaties are approved by the Senate. Governor Parfitt, in his responses, made it very clear that the operation of the canal may well be in jeopardy, because of the fear of the American employees there that they will not have their rights protected.

I asked Governor Parfitt, for example, what impact the approval of these treaties would have on the efficiency and operation of the canal. He stated that it was estimated that because of the uncertainty of tenure of the canal employees, the American employees of the canal, as many as 69 percent would depart within 3 years. The Governor said very candidly that this would have a disastrous effect upon the operation of the canal.

Let me quote him precisely. He said—and this is Governor Parfitt speaking—

> The efficiency of the operation of the canal would be significantly affected if two-thirds of our skilled U.S. citizen employees were to leave within the first three years.

Earlier he had said that was a probability:

> There is no question that it would have an adverse impact on our training capability as well as the efficient operation of the canal. We would need to seek replacement from the United States. It would probably take a period of years to rebuild that reservoir of specialized knowledge. This is why I feel it is important to provide sufficient incentives to retain an adequate and skilled U.S. work force.

That is precisely what the Senator from Alabama is addressing himself to with his amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. HELMS. At another point in his testimony Governor Parfitt was discussing the pilots who direct the transit of ships through the canal.

Senator GOLDWATER inquired if it was not true that the canal has 200 pilots and only 2 of them are Panamanians. Governor Parfitt said:

> Yes, sir.
> Senator GOLDWATER. I know this is not through any desire of the Company but just a general disinclination on the part of Panamanians, who are not basically seafaring people, to get into that field.
> Now, do you think you can train a sufficient number of Panamanians to replace the American pilots who will be leaving?
> Governor PARFITT. We have a potential serious problem there. In the short term we cannot train Panamanians to take over the piloting function. A pilot does not become fully skilled to handle the highest or largest ships until he has been there 8½ years and, prior to his coming he has to have considerable seafaring experience. So it takes a long period of time to train a pilot.

So the Senator's amendment is a sensible amendment, a necessary amendment, and he is addressing himself to a very real danger that the proponents of these treaties will be well-advised to consider, and consider carefully.

Again I commend the Senator from Alabama for his amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished Senator, and I appreciate his sponsorship of the amendment.

The fact that we are supposed to have control of the canal for 22 years certainly is changed radically by this provision in the treaty that we have got to get rid of 20 percent of our employees there who are U.S. citizens, and that no citizen of the United States can get a job down there in this 22-year interval, not a one, unless he has got a particular skill that is not available in Panama.

That would mean, then, the chances are that that would close the door to possibly hundreds of Americans who might want to work down there. Possibly a man and his wife might have a son or sons who might want to start working there where his father had worked. Unless he has got some special skill, this door for employment is closed to him during these 22 years that the United States is supposed to have control of the canal.

Another thing, Mr. President: Even though it is said that the canal is not being turned over to Panama for 22 years, the Panama Canal Zone, as such, is eliminated in a relatively short time—I think a matter of months. It comes to an end. Remove the northern and southern boundaries of the Panama Canal Zone—it might be a different direction, because the isthmus there does twist around, as a matter of fact, and the canal runs northwest to southeast, and you have to go west to go east on account of the canal, so you cannot necessarily say they are northern and southern boundaries of the Canal Zone. But the Canal Zone, as such, ceases to exist, and our employees there, our U.S. citizens are left subject to Dictator Torrijos' tender mercies.

If we are going to give the canal away 22 years from now, why should we give the zone away at once, and not provide against U.S. citizens becoming unemployed during this 22 years? That is not much control by the United States.

We start operating it immediately not on a nonprofit basis, but on a basis that will net Panama $100 million a year. Now, is that a figure I have pulled out of the air? The answer is "No." Economic Minister Baretta of Panama has stated that under the treaty arrangement Panama will receive $2,262 million during the life of this treaty. Well, divide 22 into $2,262 million and you end up with a figure of $100 million a year. That will be enough money to perpetuate Dictator Torrijos in office. So that is what we are doing: Allowing them to siphon off, according to Minister Baretta, $100 million a year.

So, Mr. President, it would seem to me at some later time an amendment would be appropriate that the Panama Canal Zone will cease to exist at the time the canal itself is given to Panama. If we are disposed to continue operating the canal for the benefit of Panama for the next 22 years, that is one thing, but why should we turn the entire area over to the jurisdiction of Panama? There is a transition period there where they have dual jurisdiction, but they are moving toward the takeover of the entire 500 square miles by Panama.

So, Mr. President, this amendment is an amendment to protect the U.S. citizens who are employed by the Panama Canal Company. It recognizes that 80 percent of the employees are already Panamanians, but it would allow these employees to work until—you have got three conditions: They can work until retirement age, or until their voluntary retirement, or until they are discharged for cause.

Now what could be so wrong about that? Why should we not protect these employees? Why write a vicious provision into the treaty that we got to get rid of 25 percent of our employees in the next 5 years?

Well, they have been talking about "Oh, we can't do this, that or the other; it would heap indignity on Panama." Now what about a provision like that, that we have got to run off 20 percent of the American employees there in 5 years' time? I do not know; attrition might be 20 percent or more, but if it is not they have got to get rid of the number necessary to bring it up to 20 percent whose employment has ended.

At a later time, possibly, if the Senate looks with favor on this amendment, as I am hopeful that they will, I would seek to change this provision saying no U.S. citizen can be employed unless he has got some special skill. That hardly seems fair. That is discriminating. Talking about discriminating; that discriminates against American citizens.

And how, Mr. President, can we claim we have the operation and control, management and defense of the canal for the next 22 years, when we cannot even employ an American citizen unless he has some special skill that is not available in Panama? Talk about discrimination. Why, we ought to get EEOC over there.

Would not the Senator from North Carolina agree with me there is some discrimination here? I think it might be well to turn that over to the EEOC and let it perform a useful function for a change.

Mr. HELMS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; I will be happy to yield.

Mr. HELMS. Let us send Joe Califano down there and let him work on that.

Mr. ALLEN. He might be a good man to send for that purpose. [Laughter.]

But these provisions are discriminatory against U.S. citizens. I do not feel like the Senate wants to do that, in our performance of our duty of advising the President on the provisions of this treaty, and telling him whether to ratify it or not. We certainly ought to present to him the treaty in the best possible shape. We are leaning over backwards, Mr. President, to take care of Panama, and we are forgetting the American taxpayer and the American citizen. I feel that it is our duty here in the Senate to have a little thought of Americans.

Senator DOLE the other day said, and he said it on this floor a couple of times:

The attitude of the managers of the bill and the leadership is you cannot add a single word to this treaty. As exemplified by Mr. Church, if they have their way, you cannot add a single word.

Mr. DOLE says you cannot even add the word "America," and have the leadership or the managers of the treaty approve such an amendment.

What have we come to here in the Senate? If we are going to require that the Senate rubberstamp every word in this treaty, if we are going to stonewall against every amendment, no matter how meritorious, whose interests are we looking after?

"Oh," they said, "It will kill the treaties." Well, who thinks that we will kill the treaties? You know, Mr. Torrijos wants this $100 million a year to start coming in. That is almost $10 million a month. That will help this regime there in Panama. You know, they have to expend 39 percent of their income—that is, the Government of Panama—39 percent of their receipts to service their national debt, which is owed in the main to major banks in this country.

I will not charge that the major banks are behind this treaty, but this $2.3 million that Panama now gets out of the canal receipts goes through the hands of one of the New York banks. They then dole it out; and I would think that the same procedure would be followed on this $100 million that Mr. Baretta says Panama is going to get.

Whose interest are we looking after? Are we going to protect those 2,065 U.S. citizens who have been working in Panama? Are we going to throw them out of work? Are we going to say that no American citizen can hope to get a job with the Panama Canal Commission unless he has some special skill not available in Panama? What would that be?

I do not know what they are talking about. I assume Panamanians can be trained to perform the work required to operate the canal.

I would say it would very nearly close the door. In the next 22 years, when we are supposed to have control of the canal and the operation of the canal, we cannot hire a single American citizen unless he has some special skill not available in Panama. That does not look after the best interests of the citizens of the United States.

I hope when this amendment does come up for a vote it will be approved by the Senate.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FORD). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Who yields time?

Mr. HATCH. Will the distinguished Senator yield, Mr. President?

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I think the distinguished Senator from Utah wishes to submit the amendment to which he referred earlier, and to which the distinguished Senator from Alabama also referred during the course of his comments, so that it might become the pending business before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama has an amendment which is pending.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, if the distinguished Senator from Utah would like to offer his amendment at this time, I ask unanimous consent that my amendment, the pending amendment, be temporarily laid aside in order that the distinguished Senator from Utah may offer his amendment, of which I am a cosponsor. My amendment would then be called up for a vote after disposition of the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. SARBANES. Reserving the right to object, Mr. President, the Senator was not suggesting that it be called up for a vote back-to-back, but simply that it would follow on for consideration?

Mr. ALLEN. That is correct.

Mr. SARBANES. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The amendment of the Senator from Alabama will be temporarily set aside. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I will offer my amendment on one of the constitutional issues at this time so that it can become the pending business. We will chat about it for a few minutes today and then, as I understand it, we will have a vote on this amendment no later than Wednesday, April 5, 1978, at no later than 11 o'clock a.m., and this will be the pending business until that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senator asking unanimous consent to that effect?

Mr. HATCH. Yes, I ask unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. SARBANES. Is the amendment pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has not been offered yet.

Mr. SARBANES. I was going to ask unanimous consent that a vote with respect to the disposition of the Hatch amendment, which will be offered by the Senator, occur no later than the hour of 11 a.m., Wednesday, April 5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. Also, I ask unanimous consent that we add to the unanimous-consent request that the vote not occur until 11 o'clock, April 5.

Mr. SARBANES. Does the Senator wish to set a fixed time?

Mr. HATCH. Yes, a fixed time at 11 o'clock on April 5, to have a vote on the amendment which I am about to call up.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a vote with respect to the disposition of the Hatch amendment, to be offered by the Senator from Utah, occur at the hour of 11 a.m. on April 5, 1978.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 16

(Subsequently numbered amendment No. 92.)

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I send my amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration. This amendment is cosponsored by Senators ALLEN, LAXALT, CURTIS, GARN, HELMS, MCCLURE, THURMOND, EASTLAND, and GOLDWATER.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH), for himself, Mr. ALLEN, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. GARN, Mr. HELMS, Mr. LAXALT, Mr. MCCLURE, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. EASTLAND, and Mr. GOLDWATER, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 16:

At the end of Article I add the following new section:

"5. It is expressly provided that this treaty shall, in no event, enter into force until the Congress of the United States, in accordance with the provisions of Article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution of the United States of America, shall have disposed of, or shall have authorized the disposition of, the property belonging to the United States of America, or of any of its agencies in the Panama Canal Zone, as it existed on September 7, 1977.".

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, this amendment, I believe, is one of the most important amendments to be brought forth on these treaties, and deserves the careful consideration of every Senator.

Mr. President, I believe there have been a lot of issues brought up with regard to the Panama Canal Treaties, trying to clarify ambiguities and problems of language, trying to solve and resolve various other conflicts where we believe the United States needs to be protected, and a number of other concerns which have been expressed and will be expressed in the future.

However, this particular amendment is an amendment which goes right to the heart of the Constitution of the United States of America. Under article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution the Congress has the right to dispose of American property, not just the Senate but the Congress of the United States.

There are a number of us in the Senate, the cosponsors of this amendment and others, who believe that only the Congress can dispose of the $10 billion worth of American property we are talking about here. There are many constitutional authorities all over the Nation today who feel exactly the same way, that it is the exclusive right of the Congress to pass upon the transfer of American property.

I call this one of the most important constitutional issues in the recent history of our country, and certainly, I think, the most important constitutional issue with regard to the Panama Canal Treaty.

I believe that during the course of this debate concerning the constitutional issues we can all discuss this particular issue and hopefully the public, our fellow citizens throughout the country, will understand what really is involved.

Preliminarily, today, we will just chat for a few minutes about generally what is involved, and then as we come back from our legislative recess period we will go into the specifics of the details concerning article IV, section 3, clause 2, and the importance not only of having the Senate give its two-thirds consent to the Resolution of Ratification, but of having the House of Representatives also vote on the implementing legislation and on the actual transfer of American property.

Our contention is that when the President, through the State Department and the Ambassadors, negotiates these treaties and brings them back to the Senate, especially and specifically this Panama Canal Treaty, he cannot, in light of the separation of powers doctrine, which says that we have three coequal branches of government under the Constitution—the executive branch, evidenced by the President; the legislative branch of government, evidenced by the Congress; and the judicial branch, the principal part of which is the Supreme Court of the United States of America, all coequal under the Constitution under the separation of powers doctrine—our contention is that the President, in negotiating and submitting these treaties only for the consideration of the Senate and the Senate's consent by 67 votes or more to the Resolution of Ratification thereof, without presenting it to the Congress as well with regard to those matters involving property transfers of American property, is violating the Constitution and extending his power in violation of the separation of powers doctrine, to the detriment of the other two coequal branches of government.

I cannot imagine a much more important issue with which to be confronted. This issue is highlighted by the fact that 232 Members of the House of Representatives—more than half—have cosponsored a resolution in the House demanding that they have the right to vote on this $10 billion property transfer. I, for one, stand for the principle that they should have that right, and that the Senate should protect that right.

There are many authorities in this area, and we shall get into them as we debate this matter and as we talk about it well into the future. Perhaps it is very good that this amendment will be the pending business up to 11 a.m. on the Wednesday after we return, so that everybody in America can stop and think about this particular issue.

The Constitution states in article 4, section 3, clause 2:

> The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory of other property belonging to the United States.

Not the Senate, the Congress. The President acknowledges that that is the language of the Constitution. The executive branch of the government acknowledges that. The State Department acknowledges that; the ambassadors acknowledge that. But their contention is, based upon State Department and Justice Department briefs—which we feel are filled with error, unpersuasive, and constitutionally unsound—that the President or the executive branch of the government has concurrent jurisdiction with the Senate involving the transfer of American property.

In other words, what the President basically is saying is that although the Constitution provides that only Congress shall have that right, or that Congress shall have the right to transfer American property and to set needful rules and regulations respecting the territory of other properties of the United States, he also can ignore that provision under a theory of concurrent jurisdiction and come only to the Senate; and if he can get 67 votes in the Senate, then bypasses the full Congress and the House of Representatives.

What that means is that the President henceforth, if we establish this precedent, may be able—and I do not say will be able, but may be able, because I think there will also always be a fight on this issue, to transfer any American property merely by treaty and merely by having 67 Senators who agree with him.

The reason, in my opinion, that the founding fathers wanted the whole Congress to pass on whether or not we transfer American property is that they wanted every one of the people's representatives—in this case all 535, the 435 Members of the House and the 100 Senators—the people's representatives in this representative Republic, to have to stand up and cast a vote, within view and under the eyes of the public and the citizens that they represent, concerning the issue whether that property should be transferred. It is our contention that the Founding Fathers did not want any President of the United States, with only one body of the Congress, to pass or transfer American property to another nation without the consent of all of the people's representatives.

Perhaps that is one of the reasons why the Founding Fathers wanted them to be able to vote, so that those who are representatives and who are elected on a 2-year interval basis should have to stand up and let the people know where they stand on an issue as important as this one is, one which involves not only the transfer of $10 billion of American property, but also appropriations which the Constitution goes on to say must originate in the House of Representatives—in spite of the fact that the President seemed to say in his fireside chat that the American taxpayers will not have to pay anything under these treaties, that the tolls will take care of them; again, without any vote by the House of Representatives until after the fact or after the "fait" is "accompli," when nothing else can really, in effect, be done.

I might mention, to clarify the matter, that the House itself does not vote on the treaties. Some people, I think, get mixed up on this point. Occasionally, in our conversation, it may sound as if we are mixed up on the point. The House votes on the transfer of American property under article 4, section 3, clause 2. In other words, the House should be asked to give its consent or approval to the transfer of the property involved in this particular treaty, which, as I have mentioned before, involves somewhere near $10 billion.

The distinguished Senator from Alabama, my friend and colleague on the other side of the floor who is chairman of the Separation of Powers Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee, one of the important subcommittees on the Judiciary Committee, and I, as the ranking minority member of the Separation of Powers Subcommittee, have held extensive hearings into this question.

We believe there is much that can be said and great legal precedent to back up our position.

In spite of the fact that we think the law is overwhlemingly on our side, if not totally on our side, we have been told by the majority leadership in the Senate that they are not going to allow the House of Representatives to vote on the transfer of this $10 billion of American property.

We think that the American people ought to know about this issue. I think there is another important aspect that should be brought out here. That is, that we brought up this issue early last year. We made many comments about it in the Separation of Powers Subcommittee. There were reporters there and, really, as important as this issue is, as well as some other constitutional issues which we will raise in subsequent amendments, hardly any of the media carried anything about it.

I am not blaming the media, inasmuch as this is a difficult question. They may not have understood it. They may not have understood how to put it in writing at that point, because it has been clarified much since that time.

I might also add that the media have mentioned the problem off and on in isolated articles, but I have not read very much anywhere in the media where this has been covered in any kind of depth, so the American people could realize what an important problem it is.

One of the most interesting phenomena to occur in this matter was that Prof. Raoul Berger, formerly of the Harvard University, came in and testified that our position is solid and right in this matter.

That may not mean very much to us at this particular point, but I might mention that Professor Berger was the constitutional authority who assisted greatly during the Watergate proceedings, and was world renowned for having done so, on the question of executive privilege and the question of the impeachment of Richard Nixon. His book on executive privilege is considered to be the classic in the field. He is renowed in the field of constitutional law.

I consider it a great honor that he would come in and agree with us on this particular issue, even though I think it is fair to say that Professor Berger would himself, if this issue could be resolved, vote for the treaties.

In other words, here is a pro-treaty man who, basically, said, "No reasonable Senate should vote for the Panama Canal Treaty"—this transfer of American property—"unless the transfer of property is made subject to the approval of a majority in the House of Representatives."

If we do not do that and honor the Constitution, then he would not vote for the treaties, either.

His point was that the Constitution and this particular problem are more important than the Panama Canal itself or any of the issues involved in the Panama Canal, because it goes to the very fabric and basis of our whole country, and that is, are we going to subvert the Constitution of the United States to the driving desire of the President of the United States to have these treaties, for whatever purpose?

The answer must be "no." The Constitution is more important. This issue is more important than the Panama Canal itself. I agree with him, although I believe the Panama Canal to be of immense importance, and I believe that our running of the canal is of inviolable importance.

The fact of the matter is that when Professor Berger came out and substantiated our belief that the Constitution is being ignored in this matter and that we have a President extending wrongfully his power to the detriment of the other two coequal branches of Government, hardly anybody read a word about it. Yet when he was attacking President Nixon, or at least bringing out that President Nixon could and perhaps should have been impeached, he was acknowledged as a world-renown expert.

As I mentioned before, his book on executive privilege was the bible used by the Congress in challenging the claims of Nixon on withholding information from the Congress. He was front page material during that time.

I might add, hardly anything has been said about his viewpoint or his opinion in this matter, which I happen to believe actually involves a bigger issue.

I, for one, am very anxious to protect the power of the Congress, because if we give any of our delegated power under the Constitution away to the President of the United States, and extend and increase his power to the detriment of ours, the whole country is going to suffer.

This is an important issue. That is why we have set aside a number of days in which to consider it. It will be considered for not only the few minutes we spend today, but for at least 2 full days and the morning of the third day before it is voted upon.

Another leading constitutional scholar named Charles E. Rice, a professor of law at the University of Notre Dame Law School, before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the U.S. House of Representatives, on January 18, 1978, with reference to the proposed Panama Canal Treaty, basically had this to say on the same subject:

It is clear that the property ceded by the United States in the Panama Canal Treaty is "Territory or other Property belonging to the United States", within the meaning of Art. IV, Sec. 3, cl. 2, of the Constitution.

Article 2 of the 1903 treaty between the United States and the Republic of Panama "grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of said canal." Article 3 of that treaty "grants to the United States all the rights, power, and authority within the zone mentioned and described in article 2 of this agreement, . . . which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters were located, to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority."

It is interesting to compare the language of the 1903 treaty with the earlier treaty of 1846 between the United States and the Republic of New Granada, the predecessor in ownership of the Isthmus of Panama to Colombia and the Republic of Panama. In Article 35 of that treaty the United States undertook to guarantee "the rights of sovereignty and property" of the Republic of New Granada over the Isthmus. [9 Stat. 881; see Moore, a Digest of International Law (1906). Vol. III, 5–6] The 1903 treaty, by contrast, is strong in the affirmation of sovereign authority in the United States.

In Wilson v. Shaw, 204 U.S. 24, 27 S. Ct. 233, 235 (1907), the Supreme Court declared, "It is hypercritical to contend that the title of the United States is imperfect, and that the territory described does not belong to this nation, because of the omission of some of the technical terms used in ordinary conveyances of real estate." As the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals held in United States v. Husband R. (Roach) (453 F.2d 1054, 1057, 1059 (5th Cir., 1971), cert. den. 406 U.S. 935 (1972)], "The Canal Zone is an unincorporated territory of the United States" to which applies the power of Congress to "make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States."

That is a direct quotation from article IV, section 3, clause 2, of the Constitution.

Congress, said the court, has "plenary power over the Canal Zone."

The controlling question, however, is whether the grant of power to Congress to dispose of the territory and property of the United States is exclusive or concurrent.

If the grant is concurrent, that is, if it may be exercised by the Executive as well as Congress, then it would be proper for the Executive to make a self-executing treaty disposing of such property without the necessity of implementing legislation by Congress. If, however, the grant of such power is exclusively to Congress—the treaty would not be self-executing and such implementing legislation would be necessary.

That is our contention here—

I might add that I believe it is absolutely necessary.

The power of disposition provided in Article IV, Sec. 3. clause 2, does not explicitly exclude concurrent power of disposition in the Executive. Also, Article IV generally deals with the relations between the states and the government of the United States. In this respect, the Supreme Court has consistently ruled that the Congressional power is controlling over state legislation. [See Annotation, 49 L. Ed.. 1239, 1248] In sustaining the Wild Free-Roaming Horses and Burros Act, the Supreme Court stated in 1976 that "we have repeatedly observed that "[t]he power over the public lands thus entrusted to Congress is without limitations." United States v. San Francisco, 310 U.S. at 29. [Kleppe v. New Mexico, 426 U.S. 529, 539 (1976)]

In Wisconsin Railroad Co. in Price County. [133 U.S. 496, 504 (1890)], the Supreme Court said, "The Constitution vests in Congress the power to 'dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.' And this implies an exclusion of all other authority over the property which could interfere with this right or obstruct its exercise." And in Utah Power and Light Co., v. United States [243 U.S. 389, 404 (1916)], theCourt said:

"Not only does the Constitution (Art. IV, Sec. 3, cl. 2) commit to Congress the power "to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting" the lands of the United States, but the settled course of legislation, congressional and state, and repeated decisions of this court have gone upon the theory that the power of Congress (to dispose of United States property) is exclusive and that only through its exercise in some form can rights in lands belonging to the United States be acquired."

There is no Supreme Court decision clearly deciding whether a treaty disposing of property must be submitted to the entire Congress for approval. Nor is there any definitive Supreme Court ruling as to whether the power to dispose of territory and property, in Art. IV, Sec. 3, cl. 2, is exclusive in Congress or concurrent with the Executive.

Nor do the debates in the Constitutional Convention and the actions of the state ratifying conventions provide any clear guidance on these points. There was some incidental discussion but nothing conclusive. George Mason, in arguing that the House of Representatives alone should have the right of originating revenue bills, argued rhetorically that the Senate "could already sell the whole country by means of Treaties" and that "the Senate by means of treaty might alienate territory, etc., without legislative sanction." [Farrand, Records of the Federal Convention, II, 297] However, it is interesting that such an enormous power in one house of Congress excited little agitation among the delegates. There is no clear indication as to the Convention's mind on the relation between the treaty power and Congress' power to dispose of property.

Attorney General Griffin B. Bell, in his statement before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on September 29, 1977, emphasized that the Ratifying Convention of Virginia proposed the following amendent to the Constitution:

"7th. That no commercial treaty shall be ratified without the concurrence of two-thirds of the whole number of the members of the Senate; and no treaty ceding, contracting, restraining, or suspending, the territorial rights or claims of the United States, or any of them, on their, or any of their rights or claims to fishing in the American seas, or navigating the American rivers, shall be made, but in cases of the most urgent and extreme necessity; nor shall any such treaty be ratified without the concurrence of three-fourths of the whole number of the members of both houses respectively." Elliot, Debates on the Federal Constitution Vol. 3, p. 660.

The same amendment was proposed by the North Carolina Convention (United States: Formation of the Union (Govt. Printing Office, 1927), 1048) Attorney General Bell argues from this that the Founding Fathers were aware "that the Constitution authorizes self-executing treaties disposing of the territory and property of the United States." But this conclusion is unwarranted. The proposals are fully consistent with the interpretation that the assent of Congress is required to a treaty alienating United States territory. The first clause of the proposed amendment asks merely that commercial treaties be ratified by two-thirds of all the Senators rather than by two-thirds of the Senators present. The following restriction, that treaties ceding United States territory shall require ratification by three-fourths of all their members of both Houses is fully consistent with an interpretation that any treaty alienating United States territory. The first clause of the proposed amendment asks merely that commercial treaties be ratified by two-thirds of all the Senators rather than by two-thirds of the Senators present. The following restriction, that treaties ceding United States territory shall require ratification by three-fourths of all their members of both Houses is fully consistent with an interpretation that any treaty alienating United States territory already required consent of both Houses. What the Virginia and North Carolina conventions sought to do was to fasten on those treaties a requirement for a virtually prohibitive majority, three-fourths of all the members of both Houses. One cannot draw from this the conclusion that, because those proposed amendments were not adopted, therefore the House of Representatives is entirely excluded from the process of alienating United States territory by treaty.

The treaty power is very broad but it is not unlimited. "There is nothing in 'the treaty power' which intimates that treaties and laws enacted pursuant to them do not have to comply with the provisions of the Constitution." (Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 16 (1957)).

In Holden v. Joy, the Supreme Court noted "there are many authorities where it is held that a treaty may convey to a grantee a good title to (lands belonging to the United States) without an act of Congress conferring it, and that Congress has no constitutional power to settle or interfere with rights under treaties, except in cases purely political." (Holden v. Joy, 17 Wall. (84 U.S.) 211, 247 (1872)). The authorities cited by the Court for this proposition are distinguishable. More importantly, this statement of the Court was only a dictum as the Court said, "it is not necessary to decide the question in this case, as the treaty in question has been fully carried into effect, and the provisions have been repeatedly recognized by Congress as valid." (Ibid.)

I might add here that the spokesmen of both the Justice Department and the State Department readily admitted that that comment was purely dictum and nonbinding, and not to be relied upon.

In Asakura v. Seattle, 256 U.S. 332, 341 (1924), the Supreme Court said, "The treaty-making power of the United States is not limited by any express provision of the Constitution, and, though it does not extend 'so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids,' it does extend to all proper subjects of negotiation between our government and other nations." The Court also noted that the treaty in that case "operates of itself without the aid of any legislation, state or national; and it will be applied and given authoritative effect by the courts." But the treaty involved in Asakura was one recognizing the right of Japanese subjects to "carry on trade" in the United States. It did not involve in any way the power to dispose of United States property granted to Congress in Art. IV, Sec. 3, cl. 2, of the Constitution.

In Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U.S. 258 (1890), a convention with France guaranteed the right of French citizens to inherit property in the United States. The Court held that the convention prevailed over the contrary law of Maryland so as to authorize the inheritance by a French citizen of property in the District of Columbia.

"The treaty power, as expressed in the Constitution, is in terms unlimited except by those restraints which are found in that instrument against the action of the government or its departments, and those arising from the nature of the government itself and of that of the States. It would not be contended that it extends so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids, or a change in the character of the government or in that of one of the States, or a cession of any portion of the territory of the latter, without its consent. Fort Leavenworth Railroad Co., v. Lowe, 114 U.S. 525, 541. But with these exceptions, it is not perceived that there is any limit to the questions which can be adjusted touching any matter which is properly the subject of negotiation with a foreign country. Ware v. Hylton, 3 Dall. 199; Chirac v. Chirac, 2 Wheat. 259; Havenstein v. Lynham, 100 U.S. 483; 8 Opinions Attys. Gen. 417; The People v. Gerke, 5 California, 381."

However, while the convention was in effect, Congress adopted the Maryland law as the law of District of Columbia, but suspended that law insofar as it conflicted with the convention. This amounted to a clear adoption by Congress of the terms of the convention. More significantly, the Geofroy case did not involve the transfer of any property owned by the United States. The dictum—

Again, not the rule of law——

The dictum in the Geofroy case is very broad but its generalizations should be limited to the facts of that case.

While judicial decisions do not comprehensively define Congress' property disposal power in relation to the treaty power, there are several instances where the accepted practice among the Congress, the Executive and the Judiciary has supported the conclusion that Congress' power is exclusive.

Many treaties and executive agreements with Indian tribes have involved the transfer of real property. But even where the treaty or executive agreement conveyed to the Indians the land in fee simple, which is the maximum interest which has been conveyed to Indian tribes, it appears that such land was held by the Indians subject to the power of the United States to exercise eminent domain.

Incidentally, I might interpolate here that eminent domain is considerably different from the right to nationalize and expropriate, which was what my amendment yesterday involved:

In Cherokee Nation v. Southern Kansas R. Co., [135 U.S. 641 (1890)], the Supreme Court noted:

"The fact that the Cherokee Nation holds these lands in fee simple under patents from the United States, is of no consequence in the present discussion; for the United States may exercise the right of eminent domain, even within the limits of the several states, for purposes necessary to the execution of the powers granted to the general government by the Constitution.

"The lands in the Cherokee territory, like the lands held by private owners everywhere within the geographical limits of the United States, are held subject to the authority of the general government to take them for such objects as are germane to the execution of the powers granted to it; provided only, that they are not taken without just compensation being made to the owner." [135 U.S. at 656–57]

In Sioux Tribe of Indians v. United States [316 U.S. 317 (1942)], the Supreme Court ruled that the Sioux did not obtain a compensable interest in lands granted to them by executive order so as to entitle them to payment where the lands were restored to the public domain by a later executive order. The Court was of the opinion that "executive order reservations" did not grant a compensable interest to the Indians. Such an interest was granted only in reservations made by "treaty or statute." In the latter cases, the power of the Executive depended on congressional approval: "Since the Constitution places the authority to dispose of public lands exclusively in Congress, the Executive's power to convey any interest in these lands must be traced to Congressional delegation of its authority." [316 U.S. at 326]

The Indian treaties cannot be regarded as authority for the conveyance of United States property to a foreign power by treaty without Congressional authorization. Even where those treaties or agreements conveyed a fee simple interest, that interest remained subject to the United States power of eminent domain. And even the conveyance of that interest, according to the Sioux case, required a Congressional delegation of authority to the Executive. It follows that the complete and total surrender of sovereignty involved in the Panama Canal Treaty should require Congressional action even more strongly than the Indian treaties.

Another illuminating type of case from past experience is the sort of treaty involving settlement of boundary claims. For example, the Webster-Ashburton Treaty of 1842, ceded land to Great Britain which had been under dispute. [8 Stat. 572] But Congress implemented the treaty by appropriating money to carry out the terms. [See ch. 89, 5 Stat 623]

In other words, Congress played a role in it, and article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution was complied with.

The 1846 Oregon Treaty also involved the cession to Great Britain of United States claims to land then in dispute. [9 Stat. 869] Here again, Congress implemented the treaty by passing an act to organize the government of the Oregon Territory. [9 Stat. 323]

The Alaska Treaty of 1903 [32 Stat. 1961] established a tribunal to settle boundary disputes with Great Britain. The tribunal awarded some of the disputed territory to the United States and some to Great Britain. [See Bemis, A Diplomatic History of the United States (1965), 427] Congress implemented the treaty by appropriating funds to carry it out in 1903. [32 Stat. 1083]

The Chamizal Convention with Mexico in 1963 provided for the transfer of certain lands to Mexico. The convention provided:

"After this convention has entered into force and the necessary legislation has been enacted for carrying it out, the two Governments shall . . . determine the period of time appropriate for the Government of the United States to complete the following: (a) The acquisition, in conformity with its laws, of the lands to be transferred to Mexico." [15 U.S. T. 2]

Congress thereafter enacted legislation to authorize the Secretary of State "to acquire by donation, purchase, or condemnation, all lands required for transfer to Mexico as provided in said convention" and " to convey or exchange to Mexico properties acquired." [78 Stat. 184]

None of the boundary dispute treaties or agreements is authority for the proposition that the Executive has power by treaty to convey United States property without Congressional approval.

Another major point to be made about boundary dispute treaties is that they are different from the Panama Canal Treaty which does not involve disputed land. Where there is a colorable claim to full ownership and sovereignty presented by both parties to a settlement treaty, it cannot be said to involve an unambiguous transfer of "Territory or other Property belonging to the United States", within the meaning of Art. IV, Sec. 3, cl. 2. Those boundary settlement treaties, even were they found to be lacking in Congressional approval, are not controlling on the Panama Canal Treaty issue.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HATCH. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. CURTIS. First, let me commend the distinguished Senator from Utah for a very scholarly presentation and an excellent dissertation of the legal principles involved in the treaty that is before us.

My first question is this: In reference to the conveyance of property not connected with treaties, is it not true that regardless of how small the property is, or of how little value, an act of Congress is necessary to convey the title to real estate?

Mr. HATCH. I do not think there is any question about that.

Mr. CURTIS. As a matter of fact, in an examination of the calendar, a copy of which I hold here, we will find quite a number of so-called special and private bills that we are called upon in a session of Congress to act upon, that have to do with conveying maybe a few sections of land, maybe a section, maybe just an acre or a lot that adjusts a boundary or meets the convenience of a private owner or a State institution or a State agency.

Mr. HATCH. That is right.

Mr. CURTIS. And we go through the operation of passing an act to convey that land; is that not correct?

Mr. HATCH. That is correct.

Mr. CURTIS. This land that was purchased in the Canal Zone was a regular purchase of land, was it not, and conveyances were obtained and appropriately recorded?

Mr. HATCH. We can cite five different types of property interests that the United States owns. Suffice it to say, the Supreme Court acknowledged, Congress acknowledged, and everyone acknowledged that this is territory of the United States.

Mr. CURTIS. Yes. But it is supported in many instances where there was a private owner that they obtained a conveyance from him, duly executed and recorded.

Mr. HATCH. That is correct. Approximately $5.5 million, which would be in the neighborhood of $60.5 million in today's dollars, was used for exactly that purpose.

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Is it not well-established that in the absence of a treaty the power to convey real estate is absolute with the Congress; is that not right?

Mr. HATCH. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. We have never given the Postmaster General or the Secretary of Interior or anybody else——

Mr. HATCH. Or the President.

Mr. CURTIS. Or the President authority to convey real estate?

Mr. HATCH. That is right.

Mr. CURTIS. We never have.

Mr. HATCH. Not without congressional authority.

Mr. CURTIS. That is right. In other words, the only entity which can convey is the Congress; is that not right?

Mr. HATCH. That is right.

Mr. CURTIS. We pass an act that authorizes someone to sign for the United States.

Mr. HATCH. That is correct. I think the Senator is pointing this out very persuasively.

Mr. CURTIS. In reference to the treaty power, in the Senator's study of the history of the treaty power in the Constitutional Convention, in the consideration of amendments, and in the interpretation by the courts, is there any finding or credible body of opinion that says that the treaty power took away any of the power of Congress that is needed to convey land?

Mr. HATCH. Not any. The State Department and the Justice Department have had to overreach—and that is putting it mildly—to try to find any precedents.

Mr. CURTIS. Well, the State Department and the Department of Justice have a pretty long reach. When they want to overreach they reach quite a way, I notice.

Mr. HATCH. And they do it quite often.

Mr. CURTIS. They do it quite often.

Mr. HATCH. That is one of the reasons why we have the Congress to keep them in check.

Mr. CURTIS. One day the Secretary of State advised us that any amendment to the treaty means a new agreement, and it has to go back to the other country to meet its constitutional processes and requirements.

Then at a later time he came up with an opinion, if the leadership offered an amendment, why that did not apply. So I think we have to be aware of this overreaching, because they have reached so many times, and they can stretch quite a way.

Mr. HATCH. That is correct.

Mr. CURTIS. In so doing there is danger of stretching the truth.

Mr. HATCH. I think the distinguished Senator from Nebraska (Mr. CURTIS) has very aptly pointed out, I think in a very logical and clear-cut way, precisely what we are talking about here.

Mr. CURTIS. A bit ago the Senator referred to a discussion of the Attorney General concerning the treaty powers and the conveyance of land with respect to this particular treaty before us. In that statement of the Attorney General did he question at all the fact that we own the land?

Mr. HATCH. No, I do not believe he did. He did not. I do not think anybody can seriously question that this is territory of the United States which we are conveying, and transferring by virtue of the Panama Canal Treaty all jurisdiction, both civil and criminal, all plenary power that we presently have, back to Panama; I do not think that is questioned by anybody in the State Department or the Justice Department. At least, I have not heard them do it. They have questioned sovereignty, but that is not the issue here.

Mr. CURTIS. I again commend the distinguished Senator on his able presentation here. I am sorry that the Chamber is not filled with individuals not only to hear him but to challenge him and ask him questions about this.

In that connection, if the Senator will permit me and just yield a bit further, a few days ago a spokesman for the proponents of these treaties brazenly said that the reason there was not an attendance over there—over here—on the part of the proponents of the treaty was that they had all been here and heard the speeches, and it was the same speeches over and over again.

Well, that is untrue in two particulars.

Mr. HATCH. It certainly is.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator from Nebraska has been here from the first day of discussion and it has always been vacant over there for the greater part; is that not true?

Mr. HATCH. That is correct.

Mr. CURTIS. All right.

Is it not also true that there has been no repetition of arguments and amendments, offered, and the presentation of the distinguished Senator today is a good example of it.

What the Senator is saying today he has not nor has anyone else said before in reference to either one of those treaties; is that not correct?

Mr. HATCH. It is correct. This is the first time this material has been brought up here in this degree on the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. I think the general public, the listening public, the viewing public, and everybody else, should realize that it was an error for a spokesman for the proponents to say that the reason why great numbers of Senators were justified in coming in and voting to table or otherwise dispose of an amendment that they had not even heard about was that they had already been here and heard some amendments and some arguments, and it was the same thing over and over again.

It is wrong in two particulars. In the first place, they were not here in the beginning; they have not been here. They have abandoned it.

In the second place, there has been no repetition of arguments. All of the discussion I have heard here has been direct, it has been relevant, and it has pertained to an amendment before the Senate at that particular time.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the distinguished Senator from Nebraska, for whom I have a great deal of admiration and who has had one of the longest tenures in Congress, both in the House and in the Senate, of anyone sitting in the Senate today. I might add that I think he has stressed in a very significant way the importance of Senators being here to listen to the debate, especially on this issue.

I have to admit this is preliminary today. When we come back after the recess, after our recess, I intend to take the Senate Foreign Relations Committee's five-page insignificant consideration of this issue and tear it to shreds; and I personally ask the other side to try to show us where we are wrong. I do not believe they will be able to do it.

As far as today is concerned, I am making this general statement so that people in this society understand what an important issue this is.

I thank the distinguished Senator from Nebraska, because I think in his interesting questions he has pointed out perhaps better than I have how important this is, and because of his long term and experience in the Senate.

I would just like to finish the last few remarks that I have, and then yield to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, who is also tremendously concerned about this particular issue.

We are talking about some of the distinguishable things which some might try to glom upon to justify the State Department and Justice Department position in this matter, for which there is no precedent.

I have talked about a number of the boundary disputes, Indian disputes. Let us talk about the lend-lease program that was instituted in 1940. It involves the transfer of U.S. property to Great Britain:

However, Attorney General Robert Jackson, in his opinion to the President, found that there was "ample statutory authority" for the disposal. It was, therefore, unnecessary to rely on presidential authority alone.

In 1972, a treaty went into effect for the transfer from the United States to Japan of all rights and interests it had received to the Ryukyu and Daito Islands by the 1951 Treaty of Peace with Japan.

However, as Secretary of State Rogers pointed out in testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the Japanese retained under the 1951 treaty of peace "residual sovereignty."

Moreover, the transfer pursuant to that treaty seems to have been authorized by the Japan-United States Friendship Act of 1975, an Act of Congress.

In 1897, Attorney General John W. Griggs issued an opinion on the alienation by the President or Secretary of War of United States property in Puerto Rico to a private person. The Attorney General said, "there is no legislation by Congress made for or properly applicable to the public domain in Puerto Rico. The power to dispose permanently of the public lands and public property in Puerto Rico rests in Congress, and in the absence of a statute conferring such power, cannot be exercised by the Executive department of the government."

With respect to the Panama Canal Zone itself, the 1942 Congressional proceedings involving an executive agreement transferring land and property in the Canal Zone to Panama are instructive. The transfer was effected by executive agreement which was then submitted to both houses of Congress for approval. It was objected by some Senators that it should have been done by treaty. Sen. Connally, Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, responded to these objections:

"Those who are opposing the measure object because the matter is brought before the Senate in the form of a joint resolution. They say it should be in the form of a treaty.

"Mr. President, I am and have been and in the future shall continue to be ardent in my maintenance of the integrity and the rights of the Senate of the United States in all its proper functions as a branch of the Government; but the matter covered by the joint resolution has to be passed by the Congress sooner or later in some form, for the simple reason that under the Constitution of the United States, Congress alone can vest title to property which belongs to the United States. The Constitution itself confers on Congress specific authority to transfer territory or lands belonging to the United States. So, if we had a formal treaty before us and if it should be ratified, it still would be necessary for the Congress to pass an act vesting in the Republic of Panama the title to the particular tracts of land; because "the Congress" means both bodies. The House of Representatives has a right to a voice as to whether any transfer of real estate or other property shall be made either under treaty or otherwise."

I wish we had men in the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate like that today, and I think we may have one or two. I am hoping we have more than that, when it comes up for vote, who will be solicitious of protecting American property rights by having the whole Congress vote on this.

In the House of Representatives, the Committee on Foreign Affairs stated in its report:

"Congressional approval of the Executive commitments to Panama is sought in the form of legislation because there is involved (a) a disposition of property of the United States and (b) an appropriation of funds, both requiring an exercise of the legislative power, independently of the treaty-making power."

There is abundant authority that Congress' power under Art. IV, Sec. 3, cl. 2, is "without limitations" in contexts other than the present sort of treaty controversy. [Annotation, 496, Ed. 2d 1239, 1246] Nor is there any sufficient reason for treating that Congressional power as less extensive in the treaty context. Art. IV, Sec. cl. 2, represents a decision by the Constitutional Convention and the States to protect the property of the United States by ensuring that the disposition would be the prerogative of the United States government and not of the individual states. Moreover, the specific grant of that power only to Congress was not accidental. As the most broadly representative branch of government, it is appropriate that the Congress as a whole is the only body with power to alienate from the American people that which is theirs. The treaty power does not confer on the President and two-thirds of the Senate a power to change the constitutional distribution of powers in any respect. Such power is not necessary to the orderly conduct of foreign relations. And its recognition would undermine public confidence in the representative character of the United States Government. It must be remembered in this connection that Senate ratification of a treaty requires approval merely of "two-thirds of the Senators present." Executive agreements, which are very similar in power to treaties, do not require any Congressional consent at all.

I hope that the consideration of the Panama Canal treaties, including particularly the treaty providing for transfer of United States property, will provide an occasion for the reaffirmation of the Congressional power with respect to the disposition of the territory or other property of the United States. Congress' power in this area ought to be regarded as exclusive. The American people ought to be deprived of their territory and property only by action of that governmental body most responsive to public opinion. That body is the entire Congress and most especially the House of Representatives, 232 of whom have demanded the right to vote.

I yield to the distinguished Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. The distinguished Senator from Utah is making, in my judgment, a very significant contribution to the debate on the Panama Canal treaties. The points being brought out today by the able Senator from Utah, so far as I can recollect, have not been presented to the Senate before. I am much impressed with the scholarly presentation and the additional facts which the Senator from Utah is making available to the Senate today.

I was impressed with the statements which the Senator from Utah quoted from a former chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee some 25 years ago, I guess it was.

I happened to know the then chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Senator Connally of Texas, and I had not been aware, frankly, of the statements made by him in regard to that early disposition of American property, but the statement quoted by the Senator from Utah seems to me to have been typical of that former Senator from the State of Texas.

So I think the Senator from Utah is rendering a tremendous service to the Senate and to the American people in presenting to the Senate what undoubtedly has been an exhaustive research job on the part of the Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH) and his staff.

As the debate continues on this amendment, I believe it will continue for several days, because it is an extremely important amendment, I think the people of the Nation, as well as our colleagues in the Senate and the House of Representatives, will have a deeper understanding of the full implications, not only of the treaties, but of the implementing of those treaties, particularly as it concerns the giving away of American property.

Frequently we have heard, in the last few weeks or so, and the last several days, particularly—the Panama Canal treaties have now been debated for, as of today, 28 days, and the Senator is correct; this is the longest debate on any particular subject I can recall since being in the Senate.

I might say, too, that I have great admiration for the way that the majority leader handled this very difficult matter of how long and in what degree these treaties shall be debated. I think the distinguished majority leader, the Senator from West Virginia, has handled this matter with great skill, great ability, and also with great fairness and great reasonableness.

I do not agree with him, however, that this matter should be brought to a vote at an early date. I think that the amendment offered today by the Senator from Utah is a proposal that needs to be very, very carefully explored. After all, what is involved here in this treaty process is a proposal to give to a foreign country—to give to another country—property now owned by the American people with a replacement value, according to the figures submitted to the Senate by the Panama Canal Company, of almost $10 billion.

Mr. HATCH. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Now, that property is owned collectively by the American people. Does the Senate alone have the right to give away that property?

The Senator from Utah, an able lawyer, contends that the Senate alone does not have that right; that under the Constitution the House of Representatives, the legislative body of Congress which is closer to the people, must also concur in this judgment of the Senate, if property is to be given away.

The Senator from Virginia is not a lawyer. The Senator from Virginia is a newspaper editor by profession. The Senator from Virginia does not pretend to be an expert on constitutional law, but I must say that I am very much impressed with the arguments being made by the able Senator from Utah.

In any case, we are dealing with huge sums of money. Panama would benefit tremendously by what the Senate is proposing to do, if it ratifies these treaties. A few more days or even a few more weeks will not stop the wheels of government. I believe the American people want this subject thoroughly debated. After all, these treaties do not go into effect for 22 years, or parts of them do not. What is another 22 days, or another 42 days, for that matter?

Speaking of these Senate debates, if anyone will search the record I can almost guarantee that there has been no other subject which has been discussed to the time extent this subject has been discussed, where virtually every single speaker, every Member of the Senate, has stayed directly on the subject. There has been no filibuster on this. I have not been in the Chamber every minute, of course, that these treaties have been debated, but I have been here a great deal of the time. I do not recall when any extraneous matters have been brought into this debate; I do not recall when any effort has been made to filibuster these treaties.

The effort has been made, however, to bring out the facts; to let the American people know just what these treaties will do, and to let the American people know just how costly these treaties will be.

Doing that, I think, is rendering a service to the American people.

The amendments which have been offered have all been pertinent and germane, whether one favors them or whether one opposes them. I have voted against some of the amendments and I have voted for many of the amendments. In any case, I do not think anyone could realistically and properly say that the amendments which have been offered have not been germane or have not been appropriate. It could be argued that some of them were not wise, from a certain Senator's point of view, but I do not think it can be said that they were not in order or appropriate to be considered by the Senate.

I am very happy to have been in the Chamber at this particular time when the Senator from Utah made his presentation. I gather that debate on the Senator's amendment will continue for several days after we return from the recess. I believe that is all to the public good. I commend the Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. I appreciate the comments of the Senator from Virginia (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.).

I believe the Senator has highlighted some of the important considerations here. We have agreed to vote at a time certain, Wednesday, at 11 a.m., after our return. That will give us a little more than 2 days of debate, which we feel will probably be ample.

The Senator from Utah is working as hard as he can with staff members to be able to present on that Monday when we return significant legal, constitutional, and philosophical arguments which I believe will show those on the other side are not correct in this matter and are not being solicitous about the prerogatives of the Congress, about protecting our brothers in the House, whom I believe the distinguished Senator from Virginia so well characterized as being closer to the people because they are elected every 2 years, and more responsible to the people, at least from the standpoint of having to face the polls every 2 years.

I cannot help but believe that the Founding Fathers had that in mind when they wrote article IV, section 3, clause 2 into the Constitution, to make sure that an elite group of American Senators do not just transfer property merely by two-thirds vote on a resolution of ratification.

This is an important issue. My comments today have been basically short and preliminary. We intend to go into many other issues involving this one major problem: Is the separation of powers doctrine being unconstitutionally ignored by the executive branch of the Government in their zeal to have these amendments and in their fear that the House of Representatives would vote them down? Is that fear and their zeal—even if they are right that we will have difficulties in Panama if these treaties are not ratified—sufficient justification to abrogate any section of the Constitution, especially as important as this one and especially as important as the separation of powers doctrine, which has been so well elucidated in our age?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. I am delighted to again yield to the distinguished Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. One of the treaty proposals is that additional foreign aid be given to Panama to the extent of $345 million.

Mr. HATCH. That is correct.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Before that can be done, both the Senate and the House of Representatives must agree that $345 million can be taken away from the American taxpayer and given to Panama. Is that correct?

Mr. HATCH. That is partially correct. They are bypassing the Congress even there in disbursing those funds. This is another way to ignore the Congress and to give money to people. The World Bank does this quite often. They spend American money indiscriminately, any way they want to, without the consent of the Congress, which year after year consistently funds it. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. The Senator from Utah mentioned the World Bank, which is an international banking institution. I think that is an area to which the Congress should give greater consideration than it has in the past with regard to the appropriation of these huge sums of American tax dollars to these international banking institutions with the idea that those institutions, in turn, will turn the American tax funds over to foreign governments. That money comes out of the pockets of the American taxpayers.

Mr. HATCH. And they do not know where that money will go when it gets to the Bank. We have had the president of the Bank saying he does not want the Congress dictating to him as to how the money will be used. I do not like that.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Congress has no way of determining where that money will be spent, or which countries will receive how many dollars. As the Senator just pointed out, the president of the Bank complained that they do not even want Congress to know where the money goes, which I think is a very bad thing.

The point I am suggesting is that in order to appropriate money owned by the American people in the form of taxes, it takes a vote of both Houses of Congress. If it takes a vote of both Houses of Congress to appropriate money, it seems to me it would be logical that it would take both Houses of Congress to dispose of real property owned by the American taxpayers.

Mr. HATCH. I think the Senator has spoken very well on this subject. That is precisely what we are talking about. The Senator, in his characteristically intelligent way, has, I think, elucidated it enough for all of us to understand. If it is so important for us to have congressional approval with regard to appropriations, how much more important must it be before a President transfers American property?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. The U.S. taxpayers, in the past 30 years, have had $200 billion taken out of their pockets and transferred to foreign countries in the form of foreign aid. Of course, that money was appropriated by Congress, so that Congress is responsible for that vast amount of tax funds which have been utilized as foreign aid to other countries. In this case, here is another type of foreign aid, except that instead of being in the form of dollars, it is in the form of American property.

Mr. HATCH. That is right.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. It does, as the Senator from Utah has so ably stated, seem logical that the House of Representatives should have a voice in that disposal. As I understand it, more than a majority of the House of Representatives has, at this point, signed a statement asking that they be permitted to express a view on this matter.

Mr. HATCH. I am delighted to yield to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS).

Mr. HELMS. I thank my friend from Utah.

Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia introduced the general subject of foreign aid into this debate. I compliment him for doing so. He used the figure, I believe, of about $200 billion since the inception of the program. I read an analysis the other day which said that if we factor in the interest involved in the money that has been given away, it runs almost to $300 billion that it has cost the taxpayers, because, for all except two of those years, the Federal Government had to borrow the money to give it away in terms of foreign aid.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. And pay a very high interest rate in many cases, in many of those years.

Mr. HELMS. That is right. So, almost half of the Federal debt today can be chargeable to the foreign aid program.

I might say further, if the distinguished Senator from Utah will yield—

Mr. HATCH. Yes, I yield.

Mr. HELMS. I had a conversation one afternoon this week with our former distinguished colleague from North Carolina, Sam Ervin. We discussed the constitutional question of whether the House of Representatives has the responsibility of participating in this matter. He said there is no question about it.

I daresay that there is no Member of the Senate who would seriously question the constitutional wisdom of Sam Ervin. Therefore, I am proud to cosponsor the pending amendment by the Senator from Utah. I compliment the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I thank the Senator from North Carolina.

The Senator from North Carolina mentioned his former colleague, Senator Ervin. I agree with Senator HELMS that Senator Ervin is perhaps the foremost expert on constitutional law who has served in this legislative body within the last 20 years. At least, I so regard him.

Mr. HELMS. So do I.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I would be tremendously influenced by his view on this important matter. I am glad to know from the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELM) of Sam Ervin's views, because I found him to be very, very sound on virtually every subject, but especially in the field of constitutional law did I regard him as our foremost expert.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. HATCH. I would like to respond to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina by saying this: I appreciate his comments, especially his comments about Senator Ervin, of whose opinion I am aware and in whom I repose the same confidence that the distinguished Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) does.

I think it is pretty rare for a State to have two Senators of such caliber. I compliment North Carolina. I like both sitting Senators from North Carolina right now, but I will add that, on this particular issue, Senator HELMS has added, in my opinion, a great deal of enlightenment. Not just on constitutional issues, but on almost every facet of this issue, he has been on this floor debating. He has fought hard. He has brought forth good amendments. They have all been voted down, as have other amendments except the two that are leadership amendments.

I compliment the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, and want to let him know how deeply I feel about him and his care for this country, and his expertise on the issues concerning the Panama Treaty and the Neutrality Treaty, which, of course, has already been presented to the Senate.

I yield the floor at this time to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator for his comments. I know the distinguished Senator from Virginia will agree with me that the Senate is blessed by the arrival of the young and able Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH).

Mr. HATCH. I thank the Senator very much for that.

Mr. HELMS. Senator Ervin also commented in his telephone conversation on the great work of the Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN), who is sometimes overlooked in the giving of credit that is due here. The Senator from Utah knows that Senator ALLEN is here when the Senate opens and Senator ALLEN is here when it closes. He is a man of great intellect, wisdom, patience, and energy. America is blessed by having a man of JIM ALLEN's caliber in the U.S. Senate.

The Senator mentioned the plebiscite that was conducted in Panama. In a way, I would say to the Senator, the people of the United States will have an opportunity, in the coming 10 days, to participate in a sort of plebiscite of their own, because Senators will be going home for the Easter holidays or the non-legislative days, or whatever title we give the recess that begins this evening. The people of this country will have an opportunity to express personally and, in many cases, face to face, to their Senators how they feel, pro or con, about these treaties and how their Senators have voted. I hope the American people will do that, and I hope the people of North Carolina who disagree with my opposition to these treaties will speak to me about it. To the extent that time permits, I hope that I may have an opportunity to explain why I feel that it is a tragedy for these treaties to be approved by the Senate.

It is interesting, I think, that, as the Senate goes into recess this evening, there will be two amendments pending: One by the distinguished Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN) relating to the rights of the Americans in the Canal Zone, and then the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH), relating to the disposition of property belonging to the American people.

The issue of the Panama Canal, Mr. President, is one of great complexity. We have discovered that in these 28 days of debate. Factors involved include international relations, trade and commerce, and both international and national strategic goals. But the important one is the one to which the Senator from Utah has addressed himself. That is the issue of whether the dismemberment of the integrity of U.S. territory can be initiated by the executive branch without the consent of Congress.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. HELMS. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. SARBANES. As the Senator points out, the amendment of the Senator from Utah will be before us when we return from the recess. I want to make a further unanimous-consent request to follow on the setting of the voting time on that amendment for 11 a.m. on Wednesday, April 5.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday, April 3, Tuesday, April 4, and Wednesday, April 5 the time for debate on the amendment of the Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH) be equally divided between the mover of the amendment (Mr. HATCH) and the managers of the treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. I inquire of the Chair if a similar unanimous-consent agreement has been reached concerning the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SARBANES. The only agreement, I think, was that that amendment would then follow on behind the amendment of the Senator from Utah, but we have not had any discussion as to allocation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon disposition of the Hatch amendment, the question would recur on the Allen amendment, without further debate thereon in order at that time.

Mr. HELMS. The statement of the Chair was the recollection of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SARBANES. I thank the Chair.

Mr. HELMS. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Michigan.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I just want to take a few moments to straighten out the record.

We are operating under an unusual situation because our debate is being broadcast. It so happens that when I voted "No" on the Hatch amendment the other day, which was an up or down vote on the merits, there was an editorial comment on the public radio indicating that maybe I did not know how I was voting—not exactly those words, but suggesting that this was a surprise because Senator GRIFFIN is opposed to the treaty.

I want to praise national public radio for carrying these debates. They have done an outstanding service for the Senate and for the country.

Just so the record will be straight, I want to state again, as I have stated over and over again—perhaps the easiest way to do it is to read a bit from my minority views which were printed in the committee report.

I call attention to page 177 of that report where the views begin, where I said:

> Furthermore, I believe the defects are so basic and so serious that they cannot be remedied by trying to rewrite the treaties on the Senate floor.

At another point I said:

> Along with David McCullough, I believe that how we say "no" in this situation is very important in terms of our future relations with the people of Panama.
> To adopt amendments which make substantive changes in the text of the treaties is one way of saying "no." As the late Professor L. Oppenheim has pointed out: " • • • the proposal of an amendment to a proposal of a new treaty * * *"

If the Senate tries to make substantive changes in the text of the treaties—and particularly if General Torrijos should decide later to "accept" them without holding another plebiscite—the foundation would be laid for future Panamanian claims that the treaties are invalid because in their final form they were not properly ratified in accordance with Panama's constitution.

I concluded:

In my judgment, the appropriate course for the Senate is to withhold its "consent"—and instead to "advise" the President to persist in negotiations until acceptable treaties can be fashioned.

It will be recalled that prior to the vote on the first treaty, I offered amendment to the resolution of ratification which would have advised the President to resume the negotiations. It has been my pattern of voting throughout to vote against substantive amendments when they have come to a vote on the merits.

I think perhaps that the commentator on the radio is confused, like many others are, in that when there has been a procedural motion to table, I have voted against the motion to table.

Like the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. BROOKE) and a number of others, I have expressed the view that in the absence of any filibuster, in the absence of any reason to move to table, it seems to me that we ought to allow the mover of an amendment in good faith to have the opportunity to have his amendment voted upon on the merits.

So I have voted against the motions to table, indicating that I think that it ought to be the procedure of the Senate to allow the amendment to come to a vote on the merits.

Therefore, Mr. President, I once again want to indicate, as I did when the first vote occurred on a motion to table the first amendment, by the Senator from Alabama, that I was against the amendment and if it were allowed to come to a vote on its merits I would vote against it, but that I would oppose a motion to table, which is a procedural device for cutting off debate and preventing the Senate from voting on the merits.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, under the unanimous-consent agreement, I think the Senator from North Carolina was to retain the floor, was he not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan have a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. GRIFFIN. The Senator from Michigan does make that parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no such understanding in the province of the Presiding Officer. The Senator from Maryland has the floor, but that can be corrected if that is a problem.

Mr. SARBANES. I say to the Senator from Michigan that if the Senator from North Carolina should return and seek the floor, I do not think we would have any difficulty in his being able to obtain it and make further remarks.

Mr. President, it is not my intention to address at great length the initial arguments raised by the Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH) and others with respect to his amendment that is now pending before the Senate. That matter will be addressed at some great length on Monday, Tuesday, or Wednesday of the week after next. But I do want to make a couple of observations.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield?

Mr. SARBANES. I yield to the majority leader.

EXPORT-IMPORT BANK OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, if the distinguished Senator from Maryland has no objection, I would like at this time to turn to the nomination of Mr. H. K. Allen, of Texas, to be First Vice President of the Export-Import Bank of the United States. Mr. TOWER and Mr. PROXMIRE want to speak briefly on this nomination, and it would accommodate them if we could do so at this time.

I was asked earlier today if we could take this matter up during the afternoon, and I indicated that probably around 2:30 or 3 o'clock we could do so; that if that became the case, we would put in telephone calls to both of them and have them come to the floor. Apparently, there was some misunderstanding of what I had said. Both Senators are on the floor. They came here anticipating that the nomination would be called up at this time.

So, if the Senator will permit, I ask unanimous consent to proceed to the nomination of Mr. H. K. Allen, of Texas, with the understanding that upon the disposition of the nomination, Mr. SARBANES again will be given the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, I only wish to state to the majority leader that Calendar No. 101, the nomination of Mr. Allen, has been cleared for consideration on this side of the aisle, and I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the nomination, which will be stated.

The second assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of H. K. Allen, of Texas, to be First Vice President of the Export-Import Bank of the United States.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I do this with the understanding that the nomination will be taken care of during the afternoon.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I express my support of the nomination of H. K. Allen to be Vice Chairman and First Vice President of the Export-Import Bank.

Mr. Allen is a native of Texas who has spent the last 25 years of his professional career as a highly successful Texas banker.

He started out as a bookkeeper at the Temple National Bank in Temple, Tex., in 1953, and rose within the bank to become chairman of the bank's board in 1961. He has served as chairman or member of the board of several other Texas banks, reflecting the recognition he has earned as a capable and dedicated member of his profession.

Mr. Allen has served on a long list of professional and civic organizations. He has served on some of the finest and highly respected organizations in Texas, indicating a keen interest in his community and his State.

He also belongs to several organizations that are national or international in scope, indicating a genuine desire to improve conditions elsewhere.

Mr. Allen will serve on the Board of the Export-Import Bank as the Board's only professional banker with practical experience in evaluating credits. His background and experience as a professional banker will add a new dimension to the Board, which does not have as a member anyone who has practical experience in evaluating credits. The other members of the Board have excellent experience in business or international transactions, but they do not have the background and experience that Mr. Allen will bring to the Board in evaluating credit, which is a vitally important part of Ex-Im's activities.

I think Mr. Allen put it well during his appearance before the Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs when he said:

I think in the area of making loans and studying credit, of understanding the language of banking, of working with the small business person in this country, of being highly concerned about employment, about industry, coming from a banking environment and knowing what it means to start a business, to build a business, to be competitive, I think this will be a very natural thing for me to do. . . . I feel that it is extremely important at Eximbank to have people who have had credit experience.

That is a statement by Mr. Allen with which I strongly concur.

I urge my colleagues in the Senate to confirm Mr. Allen's nomination with dispatch.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I rise to give my unqualified support for Mr. H. K. Allen, who has been nominated by President Carter to be First Vice President of the Export-Import Bank of the United States.

I am very pleased that a person with Mr. Allen's education, training, and experience and the success of his career is willing to make the sacrifice that is required in order to make his services available to our Government.

I have known Mr. Allen, as a friend and a leader of the Texas banking community, for many years. There has never been an occasion when I have had reason to question his judgment, his integrity, or his ability.

If confirmed by the Senate, Mr. Allen will bring a generation of practical banking experience and achievement to his new duties at the Export-Import Bank. H. K. Allen has been chairman of the Temple National Bank in Texas for 25 years. He is also chairman of the Farmers and Merchants State Bank in Ballinger and the First State Bank of Rogers, Tex. He has also served as treasurer and councilman of the Texas Bankers Association

Mr. President, H. K. Allen knows the banking business inside and out. There is a wealth of international banking experience already represented on the Eximboard. I believe that Mr. Allen's nomination is particularly significant in that he will bring a generation of practical banking background to the Bank. He knows how to lend money; to guarantee and insure loans; how to judge the value of collateral. He knows how to get the maximum utility out of the limited resources of the Eximbank.

Educated at the University of Texas where he received degrees in business administration and law, H. K. Allen served this country in World War II and in Korea. He has long been an active participant in Texas civic and community activities where his efforts resulted in the building of a new hospital and cultural center. In recognition of his achievements, he was chosen Outstanding Citizen of Temple, Tex., in 1968 and received the Rex Braun Award from the Texas Women's Political Caucus in 1975.

Mr. President, I have no hesitation whatsoever in recommending H. K. Allen to my distinguished colleagues as an exceptionally well-qualified and competent candidate for First Vice President and Vice Chairman of the Board of the Export-Import Bank.

● Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, the Senate acts today on the nomination of Mr. H. K. Allen of Texas to be the Vice Chairman of the Export-Import Bank. I regret that I cannot support this nomination.

Mr. Allen is a successful country banker and a pleasant, agreeable man. He is a fine person, but he is not qualified to fill the position to which he has been nominated.

Mr. Allen would be the Chief Executive Officer of the Export-Import Bank, a U.S. Government agency, which, if the administration has its way, will have authority to commit up to $40 billion in support of U.S. exports.

The Eximbank is not a typical bank. Exim is a specialized institution engaged continuously since 1934 in providing credit, guarantees, and insurance for U.S. exports. Exim acts on projects running into the hundreds of millions of dollars, involving complex economic factors and delicate political negotiations.

Mr. Allen has no experience with exports, trade financing or international credit. He is totally unfamiliar with the work of the Eximbank, the risks that must be assessed, and the international issues which he would face as Vice Chairman of the Bank.

Recent Vice Chairmen of Exim have been career employees with intimate knowledge of the Bank, international finance and foreign economic, and political situations. They chaired the Board frequently, met with foreign delegations on a daily basis, and used their knowledge and experience in judging proposals to lend funds to Mexico, Brazil, Malaysia, Korea, and dozens of other nations.

Exim credits involve different risks and require different evaluation than do small business loans and home mortgages. Exim must evaluate political risks and consider the political significance of its credits, as well as analyzing the financial accounts of foreign governments.

The chief operating officer of the Eximbank—the Vice Chairman—ought to have the international experience which enables him to weigh financial, economic, and political factors. Until now that has been the case. This is the first time in my memory this position has been used for political patronage.

Mr. Allen has none of the requisite experience, notwithstanding his personal qualities. Exim is running ever larger risks around the world, as international debt multiplies and economic instability and political uncertainty spreads. Exim can ill afford the additional risk of having a novice in charge of the daily operations of the Bank. I urge my colleagues to vote against the nomination.●

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I oppose this nomination. I want to make it very clear at the beginning that I oppose the nomination, not out of any disrespect whatsoever to Mr. Allen. I consider him to be a good, decent, and honorable man, and one who I think is being treated very unfairly in being nominated to this position.

Mr. Allen does have some qualifications, I will concede. He was an early Carter supporter in Texas, worked hard for the President's campaign, and had a lot to do with it. He supported Senator TOWER for the Senate. I think that indicates a degree of good judgment in the view of many people.

He supported Senator BENTSEN. when Senator BENTSEN ran for the Senate, and he ran four small commercial banks.

Those are his qualifications, and I submit that that means this man is not qualified at all. His qualifications are zero.

Consider, to begin with, that this nominee was opposed by the chairman of the subcommittee in charge of international finance on our committee, Senator STEVENSON. Senator STEVENSON is very reluctant to oppose nominees of President Carter—he has made that clear—but he felt that, in good conscience, he had to oppose this nominee because of his total lack of qualifications.

The nomination of Mr. Allen was opposed by the ranking Republican member of the committee, Senator HEINZ, who was extremely reluctant to oppose a man supported by Senator TOWER, but he did oppose him.

Mr. President, why this opposition to Mr. Allen, and why do I say he is not qualified?

Mr. Allen would be the First Vice President, the Vice Chairman; he would be the man who would run the Bank. That has been the traditional position of the man who runs the Bank. This is a $25 to $40 billion Bank. It is a bank charged with the enormous responsibility to assist this country to finance exports, at a time when we have an adverse balance of trade of $27 billion. One of the most difficult, complicated, exacting, perplexing economic problems we face is what to do about our balance of payments and particularly our balance of trade.

What experience has this man had? Let me read from the transcript of the record. I asked him:

As Vice Chairman of the Ex-IM Bank, you would be much more than the internal administrator of the Bank. You would sit on the Loan Committee, you would be one of the five ruling members of the Board, you would chair the Board in Mr. Moore's absence on his frequent trips around the country and around the world, you would be directly and deeply involved in decisons to extend export credits and guarantees.

The previous Vice Chairman of the Bank, Mr. Walter Sauer, was a career employee of the Bank, with great knowledge of the Bank and in international finance. Mr. Sauer was Vice Chairman for 30 years, and the Bank was considered well-managed because of his long and able service.

Prior to being nominated to be Vice Chairman, have you ever done any business with the Ex-IM Bank or assisted any company in doing business with the Ex-IM Bank?

Mr. ALLEN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Had you ever visited the Bank before being nominated to a position which in effect involves running the Bank?

Mr. ALLEN. No, sir.

I then asked Mr. Allen how much export financing his bank in Texas or his banks in Texas did with the Export-Import Bank. He responded in the negative, that they did not do any. I then said:

The Ex-Im Bank's credits are extended mainly in support of big ticket capital goods exports. I have a list of the principal items for which the Bank provides export support. Will you indicate whether you have direct knowledge of such transactions based on your own banking experience?

First, nuclear power plants?

Mr. ALLEN. I doubt that there are many bankers in America that have, Mr. Chairman. I have not.

The CHAIRMAN. Large commercial jet aircraft?

Mr. ALLEN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Liquid natural gas plants?

Mr. ALLEN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Diesel locomotives?

Mr. ALLEN. (Shaking head)

The CHAIRMAN. Steel plants?

Mr. ALLEN. (Shaking head)

The CHAIRMAN. Extrusion presses?

Mr. ALLEN. (Shaking head)

The CHAIRMAN. Hydroelectric generators?

Mr. ALLEN. (Shaking head)

The CHAIRMAN. By shaking your head, I take it you mean no?

Mr. ALLEN. I beg your pardon. If there is a change, I will say yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Textile machinery?

Mr. ALLEN. (Shaking head)

The CHAIRMAN. Chemical plants?

Mr. ALLEN. (Shaking head)

Mr. President, that is 95 percent of what the bank finances. That is the business of the bank, to know something about products of that particular kind.

Mr. Allen did say that he thought he would be able, because of his experience as the head of four small banks in Texas, to influence small business to get into the export area. That is a proper and desirable attitude.

Let us see what he has done.

I said:

Now you have said you hoped to increase small business' participation in the Bank.

As a Texas banker, how many small businesses did you assist in doing business with the Ex-Im Bank? I take it from your previous answer you did not assist small businesses in that way, or did you?

He said: "That is correct."

He did not assist any small businesses to do any business with the bank.

Mr. President, we asked him a whole series of questions on bank policy and, although he has been at the bank for 3 months since his nomination, he could not answer any of them. Again, again, and again he said he was not briefed. He said he did not know. He said he would have to pass, or he gave answers that obviously indicated no knowledge whatsoever.

Mr. President, here is the man who will have to deal with the Japanese. He will have to deal with the Germans. He will have to deal with the sharpest, most experienced, most competent, most effective negotiators other countries can put into the act. It is a job that would demand the best of career people at the bank and indeed, that is exactly where appointees for this position have come from in the past.

Senator STEVENSON pointed out that in past administrations, whether it was the Nixon administration, the Ford administration, the Johnson administration, the Kennedy administration, or the Eisenhower administration, no matter how far back you go, this had never been done. Consistently, the person in this position has been a person with long experience with the Bank, a person who knew exactly how the Bank operated, a person who could step in and operate the Bank efficiently and competently, a person who understood international finance, and a person who dealt with these products which are so vital and so important.

Mr. Allen also indicated that he had no knowledge whatsoever of the economic policy of any of the foreign countries he would deal with.

So, on the one hand, he knows nothing about the products we are exporting or selling, with no experience whatsoever; on the other hand, he has no experience and knows nothing of the countries which would be buying the products.

So here is a man who, as I say, is a fine man, a decent man, a good man, but he is a man who is unfairly put in a position where he cannot possibly do the kind of job that he should be expected to do.

Mr. President, I think that Senator STEVENSON was right when he said that the Carter administration deserves blame on this. I think it does. I speak as a Democrat who has not criticized the President of the United States before. I do so today because I think President Carter was wrong in making this kind of nomination, very wrong, and I hope he will not make this kind of nomination again.

Unfortunately, we have a long tradition in the Senate—as I say it is unfortunate, though most of my colleagues apparently do not think so, but it was expressed by one member of the committee who favored the nominee—that if we do not have anything of a criminal nature against a nominee, if he has not done something wrong, if he has not gotten into some kind of very serious difficulty, we approve him; we go along with the President.

It seems to me that advise and consent should mean more. In no way would this man be hired by a very large corporation that dealt in financing exports. No way. They would not consider it. They would laugh at it.

After all, if this man is going to be representing the taxpayers of this country, if he is going to be representing this country in this very, very important area, we should insist on some kind of qualifications.

I have learned in 26 or 27 years in politics and 20 years in the Senate that it is a mistake to criticize the press. There is no way you can win if you criticize the press. You are just asking for trouble. On this I criticize the press. I do so because I think they went to sleep. They were snoring when this nomination went through. Their eyes were closed. There should have been editorials in the New York Times and in the Washington Post. There should have been a cry of outrage throughout the country, not against Mr. Allen, but against this kind of nomination. It is wrong. We are putting a man who is not competent to do this particular job in the job, and it is just as clear as it can be. If the press were not sound asleep they would have recognized that, and they would have spoken out on it and spoken out vigorously.

Mr. President, I must also say I am very disappointed with the export industry, which is a great articulate and important industry in this country and has a lot at stake here. They should have been more alert.

Senator STEVENSON pointed out that he has very grave misgivings about what the Export-Import Bank is asking Congress to do. They are asking us to increase their authorizations from $25 billion to $40 billion. Senator STEVENSON said he had great reluctance about that in view of the caliber and competence of the leadership of the Export-Import Bank that the Carter administration has now nominated. I certainly do, too, as chairman of the committee. It may well be the Senate will not care and will go ahead and authorize another $15 billion. After all, what is $15 billion? But $15 billion here and $15 billion there adds up to a little money eventually.

I think the Senate should be on notice now that the man who will be running this bank has had no experience in foreign trade, has no knowledge of other countries, and he has had no background in this area. Although he is a dear friend and good friend of my esteemed colleague Senator TOWER and supported Senator TOWER, although he is a good friend of Senator BENTSEN and supported Senator BENTSEN, although he was an early supporter of President Carter, and although he has run four banks in Texas, he just is not qualified in any way for this particular job.

For this reason, Mr. President, I must reluctantly vote against Mr. Allen's nomination.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER).

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I do not really think it is relevant who a man supported for political office when we are considering his fitness to serve as the vice chairman and first vice president of the Eximbank. Much has been made of the experience of Mr. Sauer, his predecessor. The four men who preceded Mr. Sauer in that position not only were not brought up through the ranks through Eximbank, not only were not widely experienced in international trade affairs, but none of them were even bankers.

In fact, Mr. Allen brings to the Eximbank the kind of experience it needs, and that is experience with credit. I feel that he can function in that connection very well. I think he has the background and experience that will give him the grasp to be able to move into this position comfortably and to exercise his responsibilities with good judgment.

I might note that my colleague from Wisconsin has made much of small banks. I do not really thing that we should confine our appointments to high positions in Government financial institutions in this country to only those who have had experience in the big banks. Shall our attitude be "Sorry, we don't want any people from small towns. We don't want anybody that has to be close to the small businessmen. Bring them in from Chase Manhattan or City Bank. Don't ever give the guys who have been down there with Middle America an opportunity to serve their Government and to reflect some of the views, sensitivities, and aspirations of Middle America"?

Mr. Allen is not without experience in terms of dealing with large banking institutions. Indeed, he is a director of First International Bankshares of Dallas, Tex., which is an $8 billion bank. So while he has gained much practical experience in small financial institutions dealing with the small businessman, the farmer, and the professional people, he has also been associated in a policy-making position as a director of one of the major bank holding company organizations of the United States, one of which does considerable business abroad, and I think the questions of qualification that are raised by the Senator from Wisconsin are really a little empty.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point a job description for the position that Mr. Allen would occupy at the Export-Import Bank. There is nothing in that job description that suggests to me that he is anything but qualified to move into that position.

There being no objection, the job description was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JOB DESCRIPTION FOR THE POSITION OF VICE CHAIRMAN AND FIRST VICE PRESIDENT, EXPORT-IMPORT BANK OF THE UNITED STATES

The Vice Chairman serves as a member of the Board of Directors, and thus participates in its collective credit judgments.

The Vice Chairman is also First Vice President and is thus a line officer of the Bank. In this capacity he tends to complement the Chairman's broader policy orientation by coordinating the Bank's internal management on a daily basis. Under the Chairman's direction, he gives administrative guidance to the Bank's officers and moderates their activities concerning the management of the Bank's programs and personnel. The First Vice President chairs the personnel committee, and attends meetings of the loan, ethics and senior management committees. He meets with Bank clients when the Chairman's schedule or the nature of the visit do not permit the Chairman's personal attention. Along with other officers of the Bank, his role includes liaison with domestic banking and insurance companies.

The Vice Chairman replaces the Chairman on an acting basis during his absence. The nature of the Vice Chairman's duties requires that he be compatible with the Chairman philosophically. He must have the maturity of judgment to advise the Chairman in matters of administration, personnel and Bank programs.

Mr. TOWER. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point the opening statement of Mr. Allen which he presented when he appeared before the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs. Mr. Allen pointed out in those remarks the type of credit decisions that are made by the Export-Import Bank involve the same type of procedures, information, and judgment Mr. Allen has been involved in during his entire professional career.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee: I am honored to be before you today as President Carter's nominee for the position of First Vice President and Vice Chairman of the Board of the Export-Import Bank of the United States.

The Administration, through Chairman Moore of the Export–Import Bank, has recommended a Board of Directors comprised of persons with different professional experience, so that the Board will have a broad understanding of the matters which it considers. To review the members of the Board for you, it contains a person from small business, an attorney from the international and academic scene, an engineer, and now my nomination, a banker. I will be the only person on the Board with a professional banking background.

While being briefed at the Export–Import Bank, thinking of my own experience and qualifications for this position, it became clear to me that certain parts of the language of the legislation speak directly to the banking profession.

To point out a few instances of that language, the Act says: "This agency shall be an Export–Import Bank. The objects and purposes of the Bank shall be to aid in financing and facilitate exports, to provide guarantees, insurance and extension of credit at rates and on terms and under conditions which are competitive. Loans made by the Bank shall bear interest at rates determined by the Bank's Board of Directors, taking into consideration the average cost of money to the Bank, as well as the bank's mandate to support U.S. exports at rates and on terms and conditions which are competitive. The Bank should supplement and encourage, and not compete with private capital. The bank should aid, counsel, assist and protect insofar as possible the interests of small business concerns in order to preserve free competitive enterprise. Loans shall be for specific purposes and offer reasonable assurance of repayment. The Bank shall take into account any serious adverse effects of such loan or guarantee on the competitive position of the United States industry, and availability of materials which are in short supply in the United States and employment in the United States."

The Export-Import Banks make loans in U.S. dollars and these loans should be repaid in U.S. dollars. To further define the phrase "to make loans," it means direct credits, insuring credits, and guaranteeing credits.

With the exception of government-to-government credits, the credits require those standard credit procedures, information, and judgments which I have been involved in for over 20 years.

Going along with the decision on credit is a matter of determination of interest rates and other charges on each individual loan, and on the investment portfolio as a whole, and then balancing this against the cost of funds to fund the credits, to insure an acceptable spread.

This exercise of interest rate and fees charged versus interest rate costs is an essential part of modern bank management, and one with which I am very familiar.

In the area of supplementing and encouraging but not competing with private capital, I think my years of experience in lending to private capital will be particularly helpful in defining that point beyond which private capital will not go, because of a policy consideration.

The two areas of apparent concern here are maturities and interest rates. During my banking career I have financed the starting, the growth, and the success of businesses and believe that my experience in this area will be valuable in the Export-Import bank in fulfilling the legislative requirement to aid, counsel, assist and protect, insofar as possible, the interests of small business concerns, in order to preserve free competitive enterprise.

An important factor in every credit decision is the assurance of repayment. The enacting legislation of the Export-Import Bank requires there be reasonable assurance of repayment on loans. My years of experience in working with credits and having to determine assurance of repayment will be a material aid in the loan decision process at the Export-Import Bank.

Overseeing the administration of the Export-Import Bank is a possible function that the Chairman of the Bank will ask me to perform. The bank is organized into the lending function, with the normal support areas of accounting, files, et cetera. Because of my management experience in banking, I do not anticipate any difficulty in working with the other offices of the Bank in administrative matters.

Another possible function the Chairman of the Bank may ask me to perform is liaison with banks who are participating or are considering participating with the Export-Import Bank in facilitating exports.

My understanding of banking will make me an effective spokesman for the Export-Import Bank.

Another area where my experience should be valuable for the Export-Import Bank will be in the specific program known as Cooperative Financing Facility. As I understand the program, Export-Import Bank arranges with a foreign bank or branch to make loans for the Ex-Im Bank and Ex-Im Bank looks to the bank or branch for assurance of repayment.

This means the financial condition of the bank is of paramount importance. Because of my position in banking for a number of years, I feel my examination of these bank statements will be especially helpful to the Board.

My opinion today is that the Export Import Bank of the United States can continue to play an important role in sustaining and creating jobs in this country and at the same time be a factor in helping to lessen the deficit in our balance of payments problem.

In closing, I must say that I believe strongly in the American system, the American people. We are burdened with problems, but that is not unique to this generation. Problems are an ongoing condition of humankind. The solution to our problems is within our ability. We can continue to succeed with reasonable thinking, hard work, and a good attitude.

My commitment to you is to do my best continuously. With the help and cooperation of the staff at the Ex-Im Bank, the leadership of the Administration, the counsel of Congress, the advice and consent of the Senate, and God willing, I shall not fail.

Mr. TOWER. I hope, Mr. President, we will move to speedy confirmation of this fine American.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE).

Mr. PROXMIRE. While I can agree with the last statement of the Senator from Texas, I do not hope we do, but we are going to, there is no question about it, we are going to move in a couple of minutes to the speedy confirmation of this man. I think it is a tragedy that we are.

I would like to respond very briefly to my good friend from Texas. My friend from Texas stated that who a man supports for political office is irrelevant to this. In the case of Mr. Allen, it is only relevant, because this is the only reason this man was nominated. I cannot see any other reason why he is qualified. Anyone who says the fact that Allen supported President Carter early, and supported Senator TOWER and Senator BENTSEN, and that this has nothing to do with his nomination has got to be kidding. We know that gives him an appeal and a basis for a nomination that otherwise would be very, very hard to explain and to understand.

I pointed out that the job this man is being appointed to was occupied for 30 years by Mr. Sauer, a great expert, who did a superb job, ran the bank very well, and was an experienced man from the beginning.

Senator TOWER went back before that.

Now, Mr. President, the reason why Mr. Sauer was picked for this job is exactly the reason why I am standing up now and protesting why Mr. Allen should not be appointed to it, and that is on the basis of prior experience it was discovered that they needed a career man. You needed somebody who understood the organization. You needed somebody who was thoroughly experienced in international finance and international trade in that office.

I do not mean to demean in any way appointing small bankers, people who have been in small banks and have had a position of honor and importance, to the Federal Government. Of course, they should be in Government. The Small Business Administration, the Commerce Department, any number of important jobs are jobs they could handle, and handle well. Mr. Allen could do that.

job, not with this particular bank; not a man who admits when he comes before the committee that in spite of the fact he has had several months at the Export-Import Bank he cannot answer a single question about its operation; that now tells us that as a banker he had never worked with the Export-Import Bank. He had never worked to finance trade; he had never engaged in trade in any way, shape, or form. That is the thing I mean when I say he never has had any practical experience.

Mr. President, I recognize, as I say, that unfortunately the Senate is going to approve this nomination. I do hope there will come a time at some time when the Senate will recognize that we have a responsibility to do more than just approve nominations simply because somebody does not have a record that is shameful, and that we apply the same tough standards we would if we were hiring somebody to run a corporation of which we were directors, for which we had a responsibility.

I think if we adopted those standards we might want Mr. Allen as a friend, we might value him as an associate, we might honor him as head of the kind of bank he was the head of. But we would never ever, ever hire him for this particular job. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. TOWER. I think we can bring this matter to a conclusion now, if the Senator from Wisconsin is willing. I yield to my distinguished friend from Indiana.

Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Texas.

I sat as a member of the Banking Committee listening to the testimony by the nominee, Mr. Allen, and I simply want to make these points: I appreciate the sensitivity that our chairman, Senator PROXMIRE, has brought to this discussion, although I disagree with his viewpoint. I think, in a word, the confirmation of this nominee would not be a tragedy. That overstates it by quite a bit. But I appreciate his disappointment over the situation.

I think it is important to say that the Banking Committee has taken seriously the whole prospect of these nominations and background of people involved, the cross-currents in this country that are often reflected here, and very clearly the evidence that came before the committee, the thought that Mr. Allen was an early supporter of the President, and that this may have been a prominent reason for his nomination. This was made not by a Republican but by Senator STEVENSON, who opposed the nomination and called for very high standards for the Export-Import Bank.

Senator PROXMIRE himself brought forward any number of standards that an ideal appointee might have had.

Now, having said this, I voted for the confirmation of Mr. Allen in committee, because it appeared to me he was a man of good character, and this was admitted by all of the members of the committee unanimously, and that he has had a very constructive banking career; that he has handled a great number of banking decisions; that probably they will be very useful as he tries to make certain that the Export-Import Bank is relevant to small business in this country, and that the advocacy role that the Export-Import Bank could play in terms of exports is given a higher priority. I was impressed by that situation.

Likewise, I was impressed by the personal characteristics of Mr. Allen; that he is a man of great capacity for work, of great ambition in terms of his personal career in Texas, and very eager to succeed in Government. He comes with the right attitude toward public service, even if his qualifications for the specific responsibility might be bent.

For these reasons, on balance, I support him. But, at the same time, I would underline what our distinguished chairman of the Banking Committee, Senator PROXMIRE, said, and that is Congress, and especially in our case the Senate, is going to be especially sensitive to these nominations as they flow over. They will not be taken for granted, and we are going to take a look at the qualifications and, hopefully, the President and his associates will be more sensitive to that point. So what could be a time of joy in confirmation and the sending on of somebody to do his duty will not be the time we are expressing today, in which there is a divided sentiment on our committee, and certainly I suspect in this body as a whole.

I thank the Senator from Texas.

Mr. TOWER. Vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MATSUNAGA). The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the confirmation of the nomination?

The nomination was confirmed.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the nomination was confirmed.

Mr. TOWER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

The Senate continued with the consideration of the treaty.

Mr. SARBANES. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the Senate is presently debating the amendment which has been offered by Mr. HATCH and cosponsored by Messrs. ALLEN, CURTIS, GARN, HELMS, LAXALT, MCCLURE, THURMOND, EASTLAND, and GOLDWATER.

This amendment has as its thesis the argument that under the Constitution, article 4, section 3, clause 2, only the Congress may transfer property.

Mr. President, this is a proposition that has been supported by a very eminent constitutional scholar of our own time, Mr. Raoul Berger, as was pointed out earlier by Mr. HATCH, who is a principal author of the amendment.

I recognize the expertise and profound knowledge of Raoul Berger. He was one of the preeminent constitutional scholars who spoke and wrote at great length during the period when the impeachment proceedings against former President Nixon were under way. I read at least one of his books on the subject of impeachment. So it is with great deference to Mr. Berger that I take a position today in opposition to the thesis we now discuss.

It is a theory that is as old as the Senate itself. It was argued on the Senate floor during the debate on the Jay Treaty, in 1795. One of the exponents of the theory was Thomas Jefferson, a man whom I revere. Yet, one of Jefferson's most formidable opponents in this regard was no less a constitutional authority than John Marshall, who served as a Member of Congress, Secretary of State, and Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Another very prominent constitutional scholar of an earlier day was Justice Story—who, along with John Marshall, took the position that the concept that U.S. property outside the States could only be transferred by statute was an inaccurate one.

John C. Calhoun, who served as a Member of Congress, U.S. Senator, Vice President, and Secretary of State, took the same position that John Marshall and Justice Story had taken, to wit: That U.S. property outside the States can be transferred other than by an act of Congress, and, indeed, may be transferred by treaty.

Perhaps it was John C. Calhoun who most accurately, most precisely, and cogently made the argument against what had already, in his day, become a constitutional anachronism, to wit: The argument that U.S. property outside the States can only be transferred by statute.

It is an old argument that has been pretty much laid to rest by men such as John Marshall, Justice Story, and John C. Calhoun, but also by holdings of our modern U.S. Supreme Court. These holdings indicate that the power of the United States to transfer and convey property via the treatymaking power under article II of the Constitution is concurrent—concurrent with the powers of Congress under article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution to convey and transfer property.

It is correct that property of the United States outside the States can be conveyed by statutes by the Congress pursuant to article IV, section 3, clause 2, but the Constitution does not repose in "the Congress" alone that power. The Constitution, in article II, also reposes that some power in the President, by and with the advice and consent and approval of the Senate. This is a concurrent power: A power in the Congress, which includes both Houses, and a power through the treatymaking process, which includes only the advice and consent of the Senate and the President.

Now, those who argue that U.S. properties outside the territory of the United States can only be conveyed by both Houses are arguing against the Constitution. They ignore the role of the U.S.

Senate, which has the power to approve the conveyance of U.S. property by its approval of the ratification of a treaty, as shown by a two-thirds vote of the Members thereof.

Now, Mr. President, I stand foursquare against this amendment which would denigrate the Senate's power and authority, both of which are derived from the Constitution of the United States, to act as the sole legislative organ involved in the treatymaking process.

These powers of Congress under article IV and of the Senate under the treaty clause of article II are concurrent powers.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. SARBANES. I believe it is important, since reference has been made to Prof. Raul Berger and the position he has taken, to bring to the attention of the Senate a letter we have received from 15 very distinguished law professors, leading constitutional scholars. I simply want to read their letter:

To the Congress of the United States:

We have been informed that the constitutional validity of the new Panama Canal Treaty has been questioned by several lawyers who have claimed that the United States may transfer its property only by legislation enacted by Congress and may not transfer its property by treaty.

We respectfully submit that such a claim is erroneous.

The Constitution unequivocally permits transfer by treaty of property belonging to the United States. The treaty power, and the power of Congress under Article IV, Section 3, Clause 2 of the Constitution, are concurrent powers, and either may be used to transfer property.

The treaty power extends to all proper subjects of negotiation with foreign nations; a transfer of United States property is such a subject, and accordingly may be effected by treaty.

Respectfully,

The foregoing letter was signed by the following:

Carl A. Auerbach, Dean, University of Minnesota Law School;

Paul Brest, Visiting Professor of Law University Law School;

Paul A. Freund, Professor of Law, Harvard University Law School;

Walter Gellhorn, Professor of Law, Columbia University Law School;

Louis Henkin, Professor of Law, Columbia University Law School;

Gerald Gunther, Professor of Law, Stanford University Law School;

Burke Marshall, Professor of Law, Yale University Law School;

Myres S. McDougal, Professor of Law (emeritus), Yale University Law School;

Paul Mishkin, Professor of Law, University of California (Berkeley) Law School;

Louis H. Pollak, Dean, University of Pennsylvania Law School;

Eugene V. Rostow, Professor of Law, Yale University Law School;

Joseph M. Sweeney, Dean, Tulane University Law School;

Lawrence H. Tribe, Professor of Law, Harvard University Law School;

William Van Alstyne, Professor of Law, Duke University Law School; and

Harry H. Wellington, Dean, Yale University Law School.

That is a distinguished assemblage of legal scholars to support the proposition that there are concurrent powers, either of which may be used to transfer property. The treaty power involves the President of the United States and the Senate, and requires a two-thirds vote of the Senate of the United States. Alternatively, the Congress, including both the Senate and the House, acts through legislation, which, of course, requires only a majority in each body. Legislation requires only a majority of the Senate and a majority of the House.

The treatymaking power requires two-thirds of the Senate.

In either event I think it is very important to underscore at the outset of this debate, because the argument has already been made by the supporters of this amendment, that somehow the Executive is moving to dispose of property without the involvement of the legislative branch of the Government.

That is not the case. The Executive signed a treaty but the Executive does not contend that the treaty could take effect without the involvement of the Senate and without two-thirds of the Senators advising and consenting to the treaty.

The alternative way of disposing of property, the concurrent way, is through action by the Congress; but in either event the legislative branch of our Government is involved in the process. There has been no argument made by anyone, and no effort to maintain that the Executive alone is seeking to dispose of property.

Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Maryland.

Suffice it to say that the 15 distinguished legal scholars who wrote this letter to Members of the Senate, and who have set forth their views in the letter, have supported my argument, and the arguments of those truly preeminent constitutional scholars, John Marshall, Justice Story, and John C. Calhoun. These are, indeed, preeminent men of law, constitutional scholars, who have addressed this letter to the Congress. As the distinguished Senator from Maryland pointed out, Dean Pollock, of the University of Pennsylvania Law School, along with the other signatories, are outstanding men of our own day, who have, I think, presented a fine statement in support of the position which the Senator from Maryland and I, as well as others, have taken in this regard.

I hope that their lettter will be read with more than passing interest by our colleagues.

I thank my friend from Maryland.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Will the Senator from Maryland yield?

Mr. SARBANES. I yield to the Senator from Hawaii.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the Hatch amendment. The Hatch amendment, I remind my colleagues, reads as follows:

It is expressly provided that this treaty shall, in no event, enter into force until the Congress of the United States, in accordance with the provisions of Article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution of the United States of America, shall have disposed of, or shall have authorized the disposition of, the property belonging to the United States of America, or of any of its agencies in the Panama Canal Zone, as it existed on September 7, 1977.

It is noteworthy to observe that the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, after 16 days of hearings and 3 days of markup, came forth with the following conclusion. I quote from the committee report on page 69:

The Committee finds that the constitutional text, the intent of the Framers, opinions of the Supreme Court, and historical precedent all suggest that the Panama Canal Treaty can validly transfer to Panama property belonging to the United States without a need for implementing legislation. This conclusion is in full accord with the opinion of the Attorney General that "[t]erritory or property belonging to the United States may be disposed of by action of the President and the Senate under the treaty clause."—Op. Atty. Gen.—

Mr. President, there are a great many precedents to support this proposition. Treaties with the Indian tribes, for example, definitely support the conclusion of the Foreign Relations Committee. As an example, a treaty with an Indian tribe providing for the transfer to the tribe of title to lands belonging to the United States without prior congressional authorization is the treaty with the Cherokee Nation on December 29, 1835. An example of a treaty with an Indian tribe conveying land to an individual without an act of Congress is the treaty with the Chippewa Indians of October 2, 1863.

There are many examples of decisions of the Supreme Court wherein it held that the language of article IV, section 3, clause 2 did not—did not in any way—exclude the right of the United States to convey property through a treaty. I cite the following cases of treaties with foreign nations:

A Treaty between the United States and Spain, February 22, 1819 (12 Bevans 528);

A Treaty between the United States and Great Britain, August 9, 1842 (Webster-Ashburton Treaty) (12 Bevans 82);

A Treaty between the United States and Great Britain June 15, 1846 (Oregon Boundaries) (11 Bevans 95);

A Treaty between the United States and the United Mexican States, February 1, 1933 (Rectification of the Rio Grande in El Paso-Juarez Valley) (9 Bevans 976);

A Treaty between the United States and the United Mexican States, August 29, 1963 (Solution of the Chamizal Problem) (15 U.S.T. 21);

A Treaty between the United States and the United Mexican States, November 23, 1970 (Maintenance of the Rio Grande and Colorado River as International Boundary) (23 U.S.T. 371);

A Treaty between the United States and Honduras, November 22, 1971 (Swan Islands) (23 U.S.T. 2631);

A Treaty between the United States and Japan, June 17, 1971 (Reversion of Ryukyu and Daito Islands) (23 U.S.T. 447); and

A Treaty between the United States and Panama, January 25, 1955 (Treaty of Mutual Understanding and Cooperation), Article VI and VII (6 U.S.T. 2283).

So, Mr. President, it is clear that there is truly no constitutional question involved in the treaties as now pending before the Senate. The question of its constitutionality has long been settled by history, by the intent of our forefathers—who wrote the Constitution—and by Supreme Court decisions. Why this question should now be raised is something which, perhaps, the opponents of the treaty have not given too much study to, since the weight of the argument is so much in favor and in support of the proposition that article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution in no way restricts the power of the United States by treaty to dispose of any of its property.

With that reminder to my colleagues, Mr. President, I yield back the floor to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I am going to yield to the Senator from North Carolina, because earlier, he had started to make a statement, was called from the floor, and did not have a chance to complete it. I should like to speak after he finishes. If that is agreeable to him, I yield to him whatever time now he needs to complete his statement.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I seek the floor in my own right.

Mr. SARBANES. Then I shall seek recognition later. I yield the floor to the Senator.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, as the distinguished Senator from Maryland, my friend (Mr. SARBANES), indicated, I did begin my comments earlier but I was called to the floor to greet a North Carolina friend who is handicapped and could not come to this level. So I went up to the galleries to see him. Properly, under the Senate rules, when I left the Chamber, I did lose my right to the floor, even though I had obtained unanimous consent that my right to the floor would not be inhibited by my yielding to the distinguished Senator from Michigan. That is a matter of small moment.

I listened with great interest to the comments of the distinguished majority leader in which he referred to various preeminent constitutional scholars, as he described them, and I am sure they are.

My comment to the distinguished majority leader is that in North Carolina we have a preeminent constitutional scholar who sat for 20 years in this body. His name is Sam J. Ervin, Jr.

Many times during these debates I have wished that my friend, Senator Ervin, were here. I wish he were here today, because I will put my preeminent constitutional scholar against the array of preeminent constitutional scholars cited by the other side on any occasion they wish.

As a matter of fact, I wish that Senator Ervin had been asked to come to testify on this question when the treaties were being considered in committee. But that is water over the dam. He was not invited and he did not come.

But earlier this week in a telephone conversation with Senator Ervin, he expressed himself emphatically on the precise issue now before the Senate in the form of the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH).

Mr. President, the issue of the Panama Canal is one of great complexity. Factors involved include intenrational relations, defense, commerce, and both international and national strategic goals. But the fundamental issue is the one to which the amendment of the Senator from Utah is addressed: The issue of whether the dismemberment of the integrity of U.S. territory can be initiated by the executive branch without the consent of Congress.

The framers of the Constitution wisely gave to "the Congress" the "power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belongings to the United States," in article IV, section 3. I say "wisely" advisedly because there is no issue more sacred and important to the people of a nation than the territory of the Nation itself. We all know that the idea of a nation is not necessarily defined by geography; yet the concept of the freedom and independence of nations is virtually identified with specific boundaries that can be defended against attacks of violence and other derogations of integrity.

Such is the doctrine of national sovereignty, that is, the possession of supreme and political authority. An attack upon a nation's sovereignty, whether it is a military attack or merely an erosion of authority, is an attack upon the very existence of the nation to whatever degree. Therefore, whenever proposals arise to alter national boundaries, the people themselves must be involved to the maximum degree provided by the constitutional processes.

If a nation is conquered in battle, then boundary changes can and have been imposed without the consent of the people; but a nation that is free and independent cannot permit such an imposition either by force or threat of force. The people rightly view such attempts with suspicion and hostility. I think that it is highly significant that, in the case of the Canal Zone, the overwhelming proportion of the American people are steadfastly opposed to giving up ownership and control of the Panama Canal.

Moreover, the opposition is steadily rising. The respected polling organization, Opinion Research Corp., of Princeton, N.J., took a nationwide poll a few weeks ago for the Institute of American Relations. This poll showed 72 percent of the scientific sample opposed to the giveaway. Seventy-two percent said that the United States should retain ownership and control of the canal.

This is not to say that national territory is immutable. Conceivably, there are times when the territory can be extended or diminished in the national interest. Yet the issue is so important that one man, the President of the United States, should not take upon himself the responsibility of initiating it. It is particularly important that the disposition of U.S. territory originate in Congress, not in the executive, because the interests of all the States are affected. The checks and balances which are built into the congressional system—the compromise between representation of States, and representation of population, the varying terms of office and political accountability, the interplay of political parties and philosophical coalitions—all serve to insure that a national concensus is achieved and that proper compromises are effected where necessary.

This is why article IV, section 3 says so plainly that "the Congress"—not just the Senate—shall have power to dispose of territory belonging to the United States.

That is the issue before us now in the consideration of the treaty to give away the Panama Canal. "The Congress," needless to say, includes both Houses, the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States.

This is not a matter for a President of the United States to initiate or to decide, or even for the President with the consent of the Senate alone.

For the disposition of territory and property belonging to the United States is fundamentally a domestic matter, not primarily a matter of foreign relations. In a secondary sense, it is obvious that the territory, when disposed of, will devolve upon a foreign nation. But until it is disposed of, it remains domestic territory, and Congress retains not only the power to dispose of it, but also the power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting it. Indeed, Congress functions both in theory and practice as the legislature for unincorporated territories. In this case, clearly, Congress has continually acted as the legislature for the Canal Zone.

This fact is very important when viewed in the light of article IV, section 3, the first paragraph, which immediately precedes the language we have been discussing. This states that—

> No new state shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other state; nor any state be formed by the junction of two or more states, or parts of states, without the consent of the legislatures of the states concerned.

In that sentence, the Constitution is protecting the integrity of State boundaries by forbidding changes without the consent of the legislatures involved. In the next sentence, which is the basis of this amendment now pending before the Senate, the framers applied the same principle, by analogy, to unincorporated territories. The boundaries of such territories cannot be altered or diminished, or, in the ultimate, disposed of, without the consent of the legislature involved, that is to say, Congress, and that is to say the Congress of the United States, or, specifically, both the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States. There is an obvious parallelism between the treatment of States and of territories, adapted to the specific conditions of each.

In short, article IV, section 3 is a limitation on the treatymaking power of the President. It is, of course, true that article II, section 2, says that the President "shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur." But that sentence cannot be read in a vacuum. No one imagines, for example, that the President has the power to enter into a treaty, even with the consent of the Senate, which would abridge freedom of speech, freedom of religion, or any other aspect of the Bill of Rights. It is not enough to say that the Senate would never consent; the President has a sworn duty to uphold the Constitution in all of its parts. He does not have the authority to negotiate away part of it in the hope he can induce the Senate to go along.

In the same manner, the President may not enter into negotiations that abridge the powers of the Congress. It is not just the outcome that abridges the powers of Congress; it is the very fact of entering into negotiations on matters within the powers of Congress that is an infringement on congressional authority. Any attempt to initiate the disposition of U.S. territory and property by the executive branch, without prior authorization, is an usurpation of power.

Why is it an usurpation? It is an usurpation because the executive branch is acting on a domestic matter without congressional authorization. It is an usurpation because the territory itself and the sovereignty over it would necessarily devolve upon the ratification of the treaty itself without the concurrence of the House. The House may be called upon to pass enabling legislation after the treaty is ratified; but the House would be constrained to act within the terms of the treaty. A fundamental principle which has been assumed in the negotiations is the abrogation of the 1903 treaty with its grant of sovereign powers. But sovereignty itself is a property right, and falls within the power of Congress in article IV, section 3. If a treaty were ratified by the Senate before the House acted, the House would have no opportunity to act on this transcendent question. It would be faced with an accomplished fact.

And even if the question were put to the House before the treaty were ratified by the Senate, the House would still be constrained by the overhanging treaty question. And indeed, the House could very well turn down the enabling legislation, or portions of it, only to find their action overridden by the passage of the treaty in the Senate.

Treaties ordinarily contain portions which are self-executing and portions which are not self-executing. The House would not be able to act on any item that is self-executing; and some of the fundamental issues might be considered self-executing. The House clearly would have its article IV, section 3 powers abridged; and of course if one House suffers, the whole Congress suffers in its prestige and authority. The Senate cannot smugly stand on its ratification power and imagine that its overall authority will not be derogated.

Moreover, even the Senate itself will have the fullness of its article IV, section 3 powers abridged, if it chooses to rely solely on its article II, section ratification power. For the ratification power is fundamentally different from the legislative power in article IV. It should be obvious that ratification is after the fact; the terms have been established; no fundamental changes are possible in a practical sense. Slight modifications, such as reservations or understandings, may be attached, but the effect of these in international law is dubious. The only real alternative is complete rejection, which could have severe international repercussions. The Senate could very well find itself debating to determine the lesser of two evils, neither of which represent the best interests of the United States.

But if the disposition of U.S. territory and property is treated as a legislative matter under article IV, then Congress itself sets the basic principles of negotiation. It gives the executive guidelines as to what is acceptable. It strengthens the hands of the negotiators, since the opposite parties would know the limits of the negotiable items. And if the negotiators are not able to get a detailed agreement within the terms laid down, then they can return to Congress to seek appropriate legislation to enlarge their mandate.

Moreover, the full play of the committee system can be brought into effect. If only a treaty is to be considered, only the Committee on Foreign Relations has jurisdiction. While the distinguished members of that committee are experts in foreign affairs by virtue of their experience, the disposition of property, as I have already pointed out, is fundamentally a domestic matter, not a matter for foreign relations.

It is clear, therefore, that the ratification process is no substitute for the legislative process, even so far as the powers of the Senate itself are concerned. The ratification process is a rubberstamp which can be given or withheld; the legislative process is the fullness of congressional power, allowing both Senate and House to work their separate and collective wills on shaping and developing the terms of any disposition of U.S. territory and property.

Mr. President, there is no doubt but that the Canal Zone is unincorporated territory of the United States. Our instruments under international law have given us the rights of a sovereign; and of course our domestic law has always treated the Canal Zone as U.S. territory, a fact established by the U.S. Supreme Court as early as 1907, and reaffirmed many times, including as recently as 1971 when the Court let stand a lower court decision based on the 1907 case.

Some have pointed to discrepancies between the way laws affect the 50 States and the way they affect the Canal Zone as though to imply that the zone is something less than U.S. territory. But the fact is that Congress itself is the author of those discrepancies, using its authority to make all needful rules and regulations for the territory under article IV, section 3. Moreover, the fact that the zone is and always has been a U.S. Government reservation means that special circumstances apply. The fact that certain discrepancies exist enhances the power of Congress because it shows that Congress is exercising the fullness of its article IV power. Indeed, such minor discrepancies strengthen, rather than diminish, the status of the Canal Zone as article IV territory.

It is clear, therefore, that the President and the Secretary of State are bound by oath under article VI, section 3 of the Constitution and the laws of the land, as interpreted by the U.S. Supreme Court. It should be unnecessary to make such a statement, but for 12 years the executive branch has been acting as though the power to conduct international relations superceded its obligations under domestic law.

On September 24, 1965, President Johnson announced that the Treaty of 1903 would be abrogated and that negotiations would begin on new treaties. That in itself was an unauthorized usurpation of power. Congress had in no way provided authority by legislation or by resolution which would allow President Johnson to assume article IV powers. In fact, just the opposite was the case. Numerous actions, particularly in the House of Representatives, had indicated that the sentiment was against the abrogation of the sovereignty and perpetuity clauses of the 1903 treaty.

Indeed, by the time that the treaties had been negotiated persuant to the President's announcement and initialed in 1967, the sentiment in both Houses was strongly opposed to them. In fact, the executive branch felt that the sentiment was so strong that the treaties were not even sent up to the Senate.

Nevertheless, on February 4, 1974, then Secretary of State Henry Kissinger signed a so-called agreement on basic principles with Panamanian Foreign Minister Juan Tack.

Now these basic principles were even more insidious than the straightforward announcement by President Johnson that he would seek to abrogate the 1903 treaty. For the basic principles implied without ever saying so specifically that the United States did not possess either territory or sovereign powers. Principle 4, for example, begins:

> The Panamanian territory in which the canal is situated shall be returned to the jurisdiction of the Republic of Panama. The Republic of Panama, in its capacity as territorial sovereign, shall grant to the United States of America, etc.

The Kissinger-Tack agreement put the prestige of the executive branch behind a statement that is historically untrue, profoundly unconstitutional, and an illegal usurpation of power. Whereas the Johnson announcement implied per se that the United States did have sovereign powers, and that they should be abrogated, the Kissinger statement implicitly denied that the United States had sovereign powers, and hence there was no need to speak of abrogation. This was an attempt to end-run the Constitution and the laws of the United States, and to create an accomplished fact. It amounted to a concession of the major point before the negotiations began.

The reaction in the Senate was very intense, as well as in the House. In the Senate, under the able leadership of the distinguished senior Senator from Arkansas, Mr. McClellan, and the distinguished senior Senator from South Carolina, Mr. THURMOND, 39 Senators cosponsored a resolution demanding that our sovereignty remain undiluted in the Canal Zone. As a very freshman Senator at that time, I was proud to be among that distinguished group of cosponsors.

Usurpation is a process which seem to blind the usurpers to the consequences of their actions. Now the very set of basic principles, odious as they were, were exactly the sort of thing which should have been brought to Congress for approval before they were signed. If Congress had chosen to adopt those principles as guidelines under article IV, then the negotiators could have safely assumed that they would get a treaty acceptable to the Senate and the House.

But the Secretary of State and the President were not willing to take the risk of submitting such basic principles to the Congress for fear that they would precipitate an intense debate resulting in rejection or amendment. They chose, therefore, to ignore article IV, and continue negotiations, despite the fact that a group of Senators large enough to block the treaty had declared themselves opposed to their work. They had set themselves upon a course that may well end in tragedy and disaster.

The direction of the negotiations soon became evident. In December 1975 another document emerged—so-called conceptual agreements amplifying the Kissinger-Tack principles. These went into more detail, but confirmed the worst fears of those opposed to the surrender of sovereignty. For although the American people had been promised "practical control" in lieu of sovereignty, it was plain that even practical control would vanish almost immediately upon ratification, leaving only a mixed control for approximately 3 years. More recent news accounts confirm the extent to which the conceptual agreement has been carried out in the present negotiations.

Mr. President, on December 4, 1975, in a statement on the Senate floor, I made an extensive analysis of the hitherto "secret" conceptual agreements, and I ask unanimous consent that it be made part of my testimony today. It will make very interesting reading, I believe, when final drafts of the new treaty become available.

Nothing, however, seemed to deter the Department of State, not even the change of administrations in the beginning of this year. The appointment of Ambassador Sol Linowitz as conegotiator is a case in point. Ambassador Linowitz was not an impartial and professional negotiator. He has long been an advocate of surrendering the canal to Panama, and his business interests coincide with that advocacy. Unfortunately, the administration once again chose to avoid debate in the Senate by appointing him only to a 6-month term—a legal subterfuge which enabled him to bypass the confirmation process.

If the State Department had really been interested in consulting with the Senate, they would have used the opportunity to put their positions on the line. But instead they chose the bypass route. And as a result of avoiding the advice-and-consent procedures of article II, a great embarrassment was created to the U.S. Government and to the State Department itself.

For after a Senate speech in which I pointed out that Ambassador Linowitz was on the board of directors of Pan American Airways, and on the board of directors of the Marine Midland Bank, and on its executive committee—both of which had extensive interests in Panama and needed to curry favor with the regime to maintain those interests—the Ambassador was forced to resign from at least one of them.

What all this shows, Mr. President, is that encroachment follows upon encroachment. The failure of the Executive to abide by article IV, section 3 leads to the failure of the Executive to abide by the spirit of article II, section 2. What kind of a ratification process is it, when the Executive bypasses an essential part of it, namely, the advice and consent to Ambassadors about to undertake a major negotiation? This is the only opportunity the Senate gets before a negotiation to officially instruct a negotiator on its views before a treaty is locked in; yet the State Department bypassed even that by nominating a candidate who proved to be unsuitable for that particular post.

As I indicated before, usurpation and irresponsibility lead to seizure of power and tragedy. For 14 years the State Department has been unconstitutionally raising the aspirations of the Panamanians, acting wantonly and without authority. If this treaty fails—and there are good reasons why it should—the blame will lie entirely with the executive branch, which has constantly refused to abide by its constitutional authority, and has failed to take the Congress into its confidence about actions which are solely in the field of congressional prerogative anyway. Unfortunately, it will be the Nation, and the American people, who have to suffer the consequences.

I would like to close, therefore, with the very blunt warning of George Washington in the Farewell Address:

> It is important, likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government a real despotism. If in the opinion of the people the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this in one instance may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly over-balance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use at any time yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I think debate for today is drawing toward a close with respect to the amendment which has been laid down by the distinguished Senator from Utah and which will be before us for a vote when the Senate returns into session a week from this coming Monday, with the vote now scheduled for Wednesday, the 15th, at 11 a.m.

The amendment of the Senator from Utah would require, for the disposition of property, action by Congress—meaning both the House and the Senate—and of course the issue before us is whether that is constitutionally compelled. It is our position that it is not constitutionally compelled—that is, that there are two ways in which the United States can transfer or dispose of property. One is by legislative action by Congress, majority votes in both Houses, and the other is through the treatymaking power, which of course requires two-thirds approval by the Senate of the United States.

The Attorney General was asked to render an opinion on this question, first by the Secretary of State—in other words, an internal communication within the executive branch of the Government—and then when he appeared before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, during the course of the hearings concerning the Panama Canal treaties.

In the course of his prepared statement before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the Attorney General stated as follows:

> Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to appear before your committee to testify on and discuss with you a problem arising in connection with the Panama Canal Treaty. This question is whether the treatymaking power of the United States vested by the Constitution in the President, by and with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate can dispose of the proprietary interests of the United States in the Panama Canal Zone by treaty alone, or whether such action requires in addition legislation authorizing, approving, or actually effectuating such transfer.

So at the outset of his prepared statement, the Attorney General set out the question. He then went on to discuss in great detail the treatymaking power. He discussed, first, the particular provisions of the Constitution which, upon analysis, support the view that there is a concurrent authority to transfer property—on the one hand by treaty, and on the other hand by legislation. Both of those methods require the participation of the legislative branch of the Government—in one instance, the Senate alone but requiring the extraordinary margin of two-thirds approval. That is the treatymaking route. The other method, by legislation, requires a majority in each House of Congress.

After analyzing the text and a very careful analysis of the history, the Attorney General concluded:

> The text of the Constitution and its history thus support the proposition that a treaty disposing of the territory and property belonging to the United States can be self-executing.

In other words, a treaty itself can dispose of territory and property belonging to the United States.

The Attorney General then went on to say the following:

I am aware of a number of decisions of the Supreme Court holding that Article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution is of an exclusive nature, and that some have argued from those decisons that treaties disposing of property of the United States must be implemented by legislation enacted under that clause of the Constitution. It should be noted, however, that the decisions declaring Article IV, section 3, clause 2 to be exclusive related to the authority of the Executive and Judicial branches to dispose of the territory or property of the United States.

Let me repeat that:

It should be noted, however, that the decisions declaring Article IV, section 3, clause 2 to be exclusive related to the authority of the Executive and Judicial branches to dispose of the territory or property of the United States.

None of them dealt with the question here involved, the power of the treatymaking authority to make such disposition. To the contrary, as shown in my opinion, there is a substantial body of Supreme Court decisions dealing with Indian treaties which holds that a treaty may dispose of territory belonging to the United States without implementing congressional legislation under Article IV, section 3, clause 2.

The Attorney General concludes his statement by stating:

In conclusion, the text and history of the Constitution, as well as the decisions of the Supreme Court and historical treaty practice all support the opinion I recently rendered that property of the United States may be transferred by treaty absent statutory authorization.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire text of the Attorney General's statement on this matter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to appear before your committee to testify on and discuss with you a problem arising in connection with the Panama Canal Treaty. The question is whether the treatymaking power of the United States vested by the Constitution in the President, by and with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate, can dispose of the proprietary interests of the United States in the Panama Canal Zone by treaty alone, or whether such action requires in addition legislation authorizing, approving, or actually effectuating such transfer.

The principal provisions governing the rights of the United States in the Panama Canal Zone are to be found in articles II and III of the Hay-Bunau Varilla Treaty of 1903. Pursuant to those articles, the Republic of Panama granted to the United States—

"* * * in perpetuity the use, occupation and control of a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation and protection of said Canal of the width of ten miles extending to the distance of five miles on each side of the center line of the route of the Canal to be constructed." Art. II.

And—

"* * * all the rights, power and authority within the zone mentioned and described in Article II of this agreement and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and waters mentioned and described in said Article II which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power or authority." Art. III.

Additional provisions relating to the interests of the United States in the Canal Zone are to be found in Articles VI, VIII and XXII of the 1903 Treaty which concerns the rights of private landholders in the area granted to the United States by the Republic of Panama, and the property of the Panama Railroad Company and the New Panama Canal Company.

It is recognized that under these provisions the Republic of Panama retained titular sovereignty over the Canal Zone. The United States is not the sovereign, but it has jurisdiction over the Canal Zone, that is to say that the United States has all the rights, power, and authority which it would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the Canal Zone. In addition, the United States has title to substantial lands, buildings, and facilities in the Zone.

According to Article II, section 2, clause 2 of the Constitution, the President has the power to make treaties by and with the advice and consent of the Senate provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur, and Article VI, clause 2 provides that such treaties shall be the supreme law of the land. It has been established since Foster v. Nielson, 2 Pet. 253, 314 (1829), that whenever a treaty operates of itself and does not merely constitute an undertaking to enact legislation it is the equivalent of an act of the legislature.

Geofroy v. Riggs. 133 U.S. 258, 266–267 (1890), and Asakura v. Seattle, 265 U.S. 332, 341 (1924), have taught that the treaty-making power of the United States extends "to all proper subjects of negotiation between our government and other nations * * *," although it does not extend "so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids." To the same effect are United States v. Curtiss-Wright Corp., 299 U.S. 304, 320 (1936); Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 5–10, 16–19 (1957). Foremost, among those consitutional provisions are those designed to protect rights of citizens from encroachment by the Government (Reid v. Covert, supra).

The question raised in the present context is whether a treaty would do something "prohibited by the Constitution" if it seeks to be self-executing in an area in which Congress has legislative jurisdiction. Here the problem posed is whether a treaty can dispose of the territory and property of the United States in the face of Article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution which gives the Congress power to do so.

Even brief reflection shows that the application of the supreme law of the land clause in Article VI to treaties would be extremely limited, if it were restricted to those areas in which Congress did not have power to legislate. The courts have concluded that this is not so and that the mere existence of a Congressional power to legislate in the field does not preclude a treaty from being self-executing. Foster v. Nielson, supra, recognized this by equating a treaty to an act of the legislature. The courts have given self-executing effect to a number of treaties which dealt with matters over which Congress has legislative jurisdiction under Article I, section 8, such as claims against the United States, customs inspection, and trademarks.

On the other hand, it is generally assumed that the specific powers granted to the House of Representatives and the Congress in fiscal matters (Article I, section 7, clause 1 and Article I, section 9, clause 7, money bills and appropriation power) preclude making treaties self-executing to the extent that they involve the raising of revenue or the expenditures of funds. Were it otherwise, President and Senate could bypass the power of Congress and in particular of the House of Representatives over the pursestrings.

It is our conclusion that this consideration does not apply to Article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution. In other words the power of Congress to dispose of the territory and property of the United States does not have the same unique and prominent status as the fiscal powers of Congress.

To begin with, Article IV, section 3, clause 2 uses the same phraseology "Congress shall have power" as does Article I, section 8, and we have shown above that the legislative powers vested in Congress under that section do not preclude the making of self-executing treaties. The conclusion that this clause is not designed to foreclose the conclusion of self-executing treaties disposing of the territory and property of the United States gains strong support from the records of the proceedings of the Constitutional Convention. The pertinent debates indicate that the members of the convention were fully aware of the possibility that a treaty might dispose of the territory or property of the United States. Much of the opposition to the treaty power of the United States and the requirement of a two-thirds majority in the Senate were based on fears that the Senate might give away territorial rights of the United States.

I wish to mention a few of the pertinent remarks. Thus, Col. Mason observed "that the Senate by means of a treaty might alienate territory, etc., without legislative sanction." Farrand, Records of the Federal Convention, Vol. 2, p. 297. Later, Messrs. Williamson and Speight moved "that no Treaty of Peace affecting Territorial rights should be made without the concurrence of two-thirds of the [members of the Senate present]." Id. at p. 543. Mr. Gerry felt that—

"* * * in treaties of peace, a greater rather than less proportion of votes was necessary than in other treaties. In treaties of peace, the dearest interests will be at stake, as the fisheries, territories, etc. and there is more danger to the extremities of the Continent of being sacrificed than in any other occasions." Warren, The Making of the Constitution 656.

Sherman and Morris proposed but did not formally move the following proviso:

"But no treaty (of peace) shall be made without the concurrence of the House of Representatives, by which the territorial boundaries of the U.S. may be contracted, or by which the common rights of navigation or fishery recognized to the United States by the late treaty of peace, or accruing to them by virtue of the laws of nations may be abridged," Warren, op. cit. p. 657, Farrand, op. cit. Vol. 4, p. 58.

The awareness of the Founding Fathers that the Constitution authorizes self-executing treaties disposing of the territory and property of the United States also appears from the following amendment to the Constitution proposed by the Ratifying Convention of Virginia:

"7th. That no commercial treaty shall be ratified without the concurrence of two-thirds of the whole number of the members of the Senate; and no treaty ceding, contracting, restraining, or suspending, the territorial rights or claims of the United States, or any of them, on their, or any of their rights or claims to fishing in the American seas, or navigating the American rivers, shall be made, but in cases of the most urgent and extreme necessity; nor shall any such treaty be ratified without the concurrence of three-fourths of the whole number of the members of both houses respectively." Elliott, Debates on the Federal Constitution Vol. 3, p. 660.

A letter from Hugh Williamson, a delegate to the Convention from North Carolina dated June 2, 1788, reminded James Madison of the background of the treaty clause and the requirement of a two-thirds majority in the Senate:

"* * * It is said that some antifed in Maryland on the last Winter fastened on the Ear of Genl. Wilkinson who was accidentally there and persuaded him that in case of a new government the Navigation of the Mississippi would infallibly be given up. Your Recollection must certainly enable you to say that there is a Proviso in the new Sistem which was inserted for the express purpose of preventing a majority of the Senate or of the States which is considered as the same thing from giving up the Mississippi. It is provided that two thirds of the Members present in the Senate shall be required to concur in making Treaties and if the southern states attend to their Duty, this will imply ⅔ of the States in the Union together with the President, a security rather better than the present 9 States especially as Vermont & the Province of Main may be added to the Eastern Interest and you may recollect that when a Member, Mr. Willson objected to this Proviso, saying that in all Govts. the Majority should govern it was replyed that the Navigation of the Mississippi after what had already happened in Congress was not to be risqued in the Hands of a meer Majority and the Objection was withdrawn." Farrand. op. cit., vol. 3, p. 306–307.

The text of the Constitution and its history thus support the proposition that a treaty disposing of the territory and property belonging to the United States can be self-executing.

I am aware of a number of decisions of the Supreme Court holding that Article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution is of an exclusive nature, and that some have argued from those decisions that treaties disposing of property of the United States must be implemented by legislation enacted under that clause of the Constitution. It should be noted, however, that the decisions declaring Article IV, section 3, clause 2 to be exclusive related to the authority of the Executive and Judicial branches to dispose of the territory or property of the United States. None of them dealt with the question here involved, the power of the treaty-making authority to make such disposition. To the contrary, as shown in my opinion, there is a substantial body of Supreme Court decisions dealing with Indian treaties which holds that a treaty may dispose of territory belonging to the United States without implementing congressional legislation under Article IV, section 3, clause 2.

Of those cases, Holden v. Joy, 17 Wall. 211 (1872), appears the only one in which the question was raised whether Article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution precludes such a treaty from being self-executing. The Court conceded that the question was immaterial in the case at bar because Congress had actually implemented and ratified that particular treaty. Nevertheless, it rendered the following strong dictum:

"* * * [S]till it is insisted that the President and Senate, in concluding such at treaty, could not lawfully covenant that a patent should issue to convey lands which belonged to the United States without the consent of Congress, which cannot be admitted. On the contrary, there are many authorities where it is held that a treaty may convey to a grantee a good title to such lands without an act of Congress conferring it, and that Congress has no constitutional power to settle or interfere with rights under treaties, except in cases purely political. Much reason exists in view of those authorities and others which might be referred to, for holding that the objection of the appellant is not well founded, but it is not necessary to decide the question in this case, as the treaty in question has been fully carried into effect, and its provisions have been repeatedly recognized by Congress as valid." At 247.

In addition to the Indian treaty cases, in United States v. Percheman, 7 Pet. 51, 88–89 (1833), the Court held self-executing certain clauses of the Florida Treaty with Spain which related to the regulation of property rights in newly acquired territory. Those provisions of the treaty thus came within that part of Article IV, section 3, clause 2 which gives Congress power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territory of the United States. If a treaty which deals with that part of Article IV, section 3, clause 2 can be self-executing, the same reasoning applies to a treaty coming with another part of that clause.

The final point which I wish to make is that throughout our history Presidents acting with the advice and consent of the Senate have made numerous self-executing treaties transferring territory or property belonging to or claimed by the United States. One example, cited in the Opinion, is the 1819 Florida Treaty with Spain. Under that treaty the United States ceded all its territory beyond the Sabine River in Texas to Spain in return for the cession of the Spanish territories of East and West Florida. While there had been some dispute over some of the relevant boundaries, the congressional debates, as well as President Monroe's annual message to Congress, make it clear that many considered the action to be an outright cession of American territory in exchange for Spanish territory. 36 Annals of Congress 1719–38, 1743–81; 2 J. Richards, Messages and Papers of the Presidents 55 (1896). There was no statute authorizing this cession of American territory. There have been numerous other treaties which have transferred U.S. territory or compromised U.S. claims. See, e.g., United States-Great Britain Treaty of 1842 (Webster-Ashburton), 8 Stat. 572, T.S. No. 119; United States-Great Britain Treaty in regard to limits westward of the Rocky Mountains of 1846 (Oregon Treaty), 9 Stat. 869, T.S. No. 120.

In conclusion, the text and history of the Constitution, as well as the decisions of the Supreme Court and historical treaty practice all support the opinion I recently rendered that property of the United States may be transferred by treaty absent statutory authorization.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. If you or the members of this Committee have any questions, I shall be pleased to answer them.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I want to note that this conclusion is in harmony or in agreement with the substance of the letter from the group of distinguished legal scholars to which reference has heretofore been made, which states:

We have been informed that the constitutional validity of the new Panama Canal Treaty has been questioned by several lawyers who have claimed that the United States may transfer its property only by legislation enacted by Congress and may not transfer its property by treaty.

We respectfully submit that such a claim is erroneous.

The Constitution unequivocally permits transfer by treaty of property belonging to the United States. The treaty power, and the power of Congress under Article IV, Section 3, Clause 2 of the Constitution, are concurrent powers, and either may be used to transfer property.

The treaty power extends to all proper subjects of negotiation with foreign nations; a transfer of United States property is such a subject, and accordingly may be effected by treaty.

Mr. President, I know that when the debate resumes after the nonlegislative work period, this amendment will be addressed again in further detail. But I think it is important at least today to sketch out this constitutional view, which I submit is the one we have operated under since the early days of the Republic, with respect to the powers encompassed in the treaty-making power and the ability, through the treaty power, which of course involves the legislative branch of the Government—it involves the Senate and requires a two-thirds vote in the Senate—to dispose of property.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator withhold his request?

Mr. SARBANES. I withhold my request, and I yield to the Senator from Hawaii.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I thank the Senator from Maryland for yielding.

Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina is absent from the floor at the moment. He seemed to indicate that the framers of the Constitution intended that only Congress, meaning the Senate and the House, was possessed of the power of disposal of U.S. property.

The history of the Constitution fully confirms the construction that article IV, section 3 of the Constitution does not in any way restrict the power of the United States to dispose of any territory or properties by treaty. The debate is the Constitutional Convention of 1787 and of the Virginia Convention of 1788, on the ratification of the Constitution, show beyond doubt that the framers paid particular attention to treaties ceding territory and did not require congressional—when I say "congressional," I mean both the House and the Senate—congressional authorization for such treaties.

The debates in the Constitutional Convention are reported in the Journal of the Convention and in Madison's Notes, which were published by Dr. Farrand as Records of the Federal Convention. The debates of the Virginia Convention are published in Elliot's Debates in the Several State Conventions, volume 3.

The final debates on the treaty power followed the adoption of article IV which had occurred only a week before. Certainly, the framers of the Constitution must have had that action in mind. Yet, there was no reference to that article IV, at that time numbered as article number XVII, even when treaties of cession were debated. It was moved at the beginning of the debate on treaties that advice and consent of the Senate and the House of Representatives should be required but the motion was defeated and advice and consent of the Senate alone was approved.

This shows that the power to cede territory and property of the United States was intended by the framers of the Constitution to be vested in the Senate and the Executive concurrently, and there was no intended requirement that the House of Representatives must concur with the Senate.

I thank the Senator from Maryland for yielding.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SARBANES. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I thank the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. President, the debate today has focused on whether or not there is a constitutional requirement that the House of Representatives must join in any disposition of property by the United States, and I think it is a very interesting debate and argument that has been argued, as the distinguished majority leader indicated, throughout the history of Congress. It has a long history, and goes back to the Jay Treaty.

The fact is, as much as I respect the arguments of the Senator from Hawaii, I cannot agree with him that all of the authority is on his side. There clearly are eminent authorities on both sides of this constitutional question.

Of course, Prof. Raul Berger has been mentioned and he stated before one of the committees of the Senate:

In my view, any attempt of disposition without getting the concurrence of the Congress including the House would be void.

Senator HATCH said that is a strong statement and Professor Berger said:

If I am right, if there is no concurrent jurisdiction to dispose of property in the executive branch; if that power is exclusively in the Congress and the President oversteps his bounds, that is unconstitutional and if it is unconstitutional it is void.

There has been reference also made to the view of the distinguished former Senator from North Carolina, Senator Ervin, whose opinion certainly is not to be taken lightly, and some reference was made to Justice Story, the distinguished author of commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, and who is quoted as saying:

The power of Congress over the public territory is clearly exclusive.

I do not rise, really, to pursue that line of argument. I am willing to concede that there are eminent scholars and eminent authorities on both sides, but I rise to ask the question: Should this be decided on the basis of whether or not it is constitutionally required that the House of Representatives join in? What about just good commonsense and good policy? Perhaps it is the better part of wisdom, particularly when there is this serious and deep question and particularly when this treaty, of such great significance to the country, will require the enactment of implementing legislation that certainly must include the participation of the House of Representatives. Would it not make sense, particularly if there is concurrent authority, if we concede that for the purposes of argument, and would it not be good policy at this point, through a resolution or by withholding the resolution of ratification until there were an opportunity for the House of Representatives by resolution to give its consent and its concurrence with respect to the disposition of property, and also to indicate that it will follow on through with the implementing legislation that will be required?

I have spoken about the implementing legislation before. One of the very first things, of course, that will have to be done once the treaty is ratified will be to establish the new Panama Canal corporation that will be required, with a board of directors with five members appointed by the United States and four members appointed by the Republic of Panama. This is an entirely new entity. It could only be established by statute. It would have to be approved and passed by the House of Representatives.

If the House of Representatives does not do that, of course, the treaty would be of very little force and effect.

So, I have made this suggestion in the Committee on Foreign Relations and I make it again to the Senate: that it makes a great deal of good sense to me to provide in some way for the concurrence of the House of Representatives. Whether or not it is constitutionally required, it certainly is permitted. It certainly is allowed. There would be nothing wrong with it. And it would certainly strengthen the hand of the President, following the ratification of the treaties, if that should be the judgment of the Senate.

I thank the distinguished Senator from Maryland for yielding.

Mr. ALLEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MATSUNAGA). The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I had not intended to go into this matter at this time, as we are prepared to recess until April 3. But I was interested in the fact that the distinguished Senator from Maryland (Mr. SARBANES) was reading from an opinion of the Attorney General, Judge Griffin Bell, certainly an eminent jurist and the present Attorney General of the United States, and he had printed in the RECORD Judge Bell's testimony before one of the committees.

I am reminded that Mr. Justice Jackson of the United States Supreme Court, who had previously served as Attorney General, in deciding a case before the Supreme Court, had cited to him an opinion on the very same point that he had rendered while serving as Attorney General, and Mr. Justice Jackson stated that he would assign no importance to an opinion by the Attorney General of the United States, even though it were his own, that he would assign no importance to it because it was an opinion rendered by an employee of the Government and that for that reason it could not be an unbiased opinion.

The Attorney General, working for the Government, might issue one opinion, but the former Attorney General, Mr. Justice Jackson, would attach no importance to it even though it were his own because he was just, in effect, an employee of the Government and his opinion on a particular case that the Government was interested in might not have the same importance or the same standing as if it had been issued by someone who did not have an interest as an employee.

The Subcommittee on the Separation of Powers had before it many eminent legal authorities, one of whom was a nationally recognized authority on the Constitution, Dr. Raoul Berger, well-known throughout the country as being a great constitutional authority, who at one time was a professor of constitutional law at Harvard.

I would like to read from the testimony that Dr. Berger gave before the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers. He is quoting what he calls a settled rule of law:

In other words, "a broad statutory provision will not apply to a matter specifically dealt with in another part of the same act."[4] Restated in terms of the present issue—

That is, whether the Senate and the President can circumvent the Congress by treaty power; and if you would believe the distinguished Senator from Maryland, the Senate and the President could give away all of the property of the United States by the treaty process, and the House would not have anything to do with it.

I want to be cited the section of the Constitution that says that property of the United States can be transferred by treaty. That is the very point. The right is given, the power is given, to Congress to dispose of the property of the United States, and there is no concurrent power placed in the executive branch or the executive branch plus the Senate. It is the Congress, which is the House and the Senate, with, of course, approval by the President to be a congressional act, that has the power to dispose of the territory or other property of the United States, and nothing short of an act of Congress will authorize the disposition of property of the United States.

So where the power is given expressly to one branch of the Government, and no alternate power is given to another branch of the Government, that power becomes exclusive in the Congress to dispose of property.

I recall one disposition of property there in the Canal Zone itself. Panama wanted some property, I believe, in the canal zone for an embassy, and it took an act of Congress to dispose of this property there in the canal zone itself.

To continue reading from the testimony of Dr. Berger—

the specific power of disposition, in which the House of Representatives must concur, governs the general provision authorizing the President and the Senate to make treaties.

Well, making treaties does not necessarily imply giving property away or disposing of property.

Continuing, Dr. Berger said:

Second, there is the canon that express mention signifies implied exclusion, which the Supreme Court has employed again and again: "When a statute limits a thing to be done in a particular mode, it includes the negative of any other mode."[5] The grant of the disposition power to Congress, in other words, excludes its exercise by Senate and President. The rule was invoked by the Founders; for example, Egbert Benson said in the First Congress, in which sat many Framers and Ratifiers, that "it cannot be rationally intended that all offices should be held during good behavior, because the Constitution has declared [only] one office to be held by this tenure."[6] Under these rules it is of no moment that Article IV contains no express exclusion of "concurrent jurisdiction" under the treaty power. Having given Congress the power to dispose of public property, it follows that the President and Senate were impliedly excluded therefrom. Although this particular exclusion was not before the Court, it tacitly ratified the application of the foregoing rules of construction when it stated that Article IV "implies an exclusion of all other authority over the property which could interfere with this right . . ." [7]

So the power to dispose of property is given to Congress, and that power negates or excludes any other conferring of that power. This expression will be argued in full when we come back from the recess, and it ought to offset the opinion rendered by the distinguished Attorney General, which is of another view. I ask unanimous consent that the statement of Dr. Raoul Berger given before the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers of the Judiciary Committee, appearing and starting at page 77 of the staff draft of the subcommittee report, of the congressional power to dispose of U.S. property be printed in the RECORD in full:

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY RAOUL BERGER BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE OF MERCHANT MARINE AND THE COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

HEARINGS ON THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES, WASHINGTON, D.C., JANUARY 18,1978

You have invited me to comment on the relation between the Article IV, § 3(2) power of Congress to dispose of property of the United States and the treaty power. Although I am in favor of the Panama Canal Treaty, I share your solitude for the preservation of constitutional boundaries and your concern lest the function committed to Congress be diminished. I have long held the conviction that all agents of the United States, be they Justices, Members of Congress, or the President, must respect those boundaries. No agent of the people may overleap the bounds of delegated power, or encroach on power granted to another. That is the essence of constitutional government and of our democratic system.

The effect of these hearings ranges beyond the Panama Treaty, for the Panama cession will constitute a landmark which, should the State Department prevail, will be cited down the years for "concurrent jurisdiction" of the President in the disposition of United States property. For it needs constantly to be remembered that a succession of Presidents have circumvented Senate participation in treaties of gravest import by resort to Executive Agreements. Acquiesence in such claims spells progressive attrition of Congressional powers. Your insistence on respect for constitutional boundaries will warn the Executive against encroachments on the powers of Congress; it will alert foreign nations to the fact that treaties for the cession of United States property must be subject to the consent of the House as well as the Senate.

The President, "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate", may make treaties. But Article IV, § 3(2) provides that "the Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States." How are the two provisions to be accommodated? For present purposes the question whether the United States has "sovereignty" over the Panama Canal need not detain us because, in my judgment, the grant of "use and occupation . . . in perpetuity" constitutes "property" no less than the familiar lease of realty for 99 years. Then there are the installations that cost billions of dollars. Disposition of these no less requires the consent of Congress than does that of territory. In 1942, the President, by Executive Agreement, promised to return certain installations to Panama subject, however, to Congressional approval.[1] A similar provision is to be found in the Treaty of 1955.[2] These executive constructions are confirmed by established canons of interpretation.

"First, there is the settled rule that where there is in an act a specific provision relating to a particular subject, that provision must govern in respect to that subject as against general provisions in other parts of the act, although the latter, standing alone, would be broad enough to include the subject to which the more particular provision relates." [3]

In other words, "a broad statutory provision will not apply to a matter specifically dealt with in another part of the same act." [4] Restated in terms of the present issue, the specific power of disposition, in which the House of Representatives must concur, governs the general provision authorizing the President and the Senate to make treaties.

Second, there is the canon that express mention signifies implied exclusion, which the Supreme Court has employed again and again: "When a statute limits a thing to be done in a particular mode, it includes the negative of any other mode." [5] The grant of the disposition power to Congress, in other words, excludes its exercise by Senate and President. The rule was invoked by the Founders; for example, Egbert Benson said in the First Congress, in which sat many Framers and Ratifiers, that "it cannot be rationally intended that all offices should be held during good behavior, because the Constitution has declared [only] one office to be held by this tenure." [6] Under these rules it is of no moment that Article IV contains no express exclusion of "concurrent jurisdiction" under the treaty power. Having given Congress the power to dispose of public property, it follows that the President and Senate were impliedly excluded therefrom. Although this particular exclusion was not before the Court, it tacitly ratified the application of the foregoing rules of construction when it stated that Article IV "implies an exclusion of all other authority over the property which could interfere with this right . . ." [7]

Attorney-General Griffin B. Bell conceded in his statement before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, September 25, 1977 (hereafter cited as A.G.), that "the specific powers granted to the House of Representatives and Congress in fiscal matters (Article I, section 7, clause 1 and Article I, section 9, clause 7, money bills and appropriations power) preclude making treaties self-executing to the extent that they involve the raising of revenue or the expenditure of funds. Were it otherwise, President and Senate could bypass the power of Congress and in particular of the House of Representatives over the purse strings." A.G. 4–5.

Now sections 9 and 7 are couched in quite dissimilar terms. Section 9(7) is framed in terms of flat prohibition: "No money shall be withdrawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law. . . ." Section 7(1), however, merely provides that "All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House." Yet the Attorney General reads § 7 to preclude the President and Senate from "bypass[ing] the power of Congress and in particular of the House of Representatives over the purse strings." What is there that distinquishes "All bills . . . shall originate in the House" from "The Congress shall have power to dispose . . ."? The impalpability of the distinction is underlined by the State Department's concession that "treaties may [not] impose taxes." [8] Nothing in the Article I, § 8(1) "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes" distinguishes it from the Article IV "The Congress shall have power to dispose."

If the President may not by treaty "bypass" the power of the House to originate revenue-raising bills, or the power of Congress to tax, no more may he "bypass" its "power to dispose" of the property of the United States.

In their testimony before the Congress, Herbert J. Hansell, Legal Advisor, Department of State,[9] and Ralph E. Erickson, Deputy Assistant Attorney General,[10] cited a string of cases in support of "The power to dispose of public land . . . by treaty." [11] For the most part they fall under boundary treaties or treaties with Indian tribes which, as will appear, turn on circumstances peculiar to themselves. Preliminarily consider Hansell's citation of Missouri v. Holland, 252 U.S. 416 (1920). It arose out of a State challenge to the treaty with Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds which annually traversed parts of the United States and Canada. Justice Holmes, addressing the argument that the treaty infringed powers reserved to the States by the Tenth Amendment, stated:

"Wild birds are not in the possession of any one, and possession is the beginning of ownership. The whole foundation of the States' rights is the presence within their jurisdiction of birds that yesterday had not arrived, tomorrow may be in another State, and in a week a thousand miles away." [12]

Consequently, the State could assert no "title" in migratory birds. By the same token, the United States also could not lay claim to "ownership" of the birds, the Missouri v. Holland is therefore wholly irrelevant to the power by treaty to dispose of property belonging to the United States.

The Indian treaty cases constitute one of the pillars of the argument for "concurrent power"; and Attorney General Griffin B. Bell referred to them as "a substantial body of Supreme Court decisions dealing with Indian tribes which holds that a treaty may dispose of property belonging to the United States without implementing legislation under Article IV, section 3, clause 2." [13]

To begin with Jones v. Meehan, 175 U.S. 1 (1889), both Hansell and Erickson quote, "It is well settled that a good title to parts of the lands of an Indian tribe may be granted to individuals by a treaty between the United States and the tribe, without any act of Congress, or any patent from the Executive authority of the United States." [14] This was because the treaty merely reserved certain individual tracts from the cession to the United States. It "set apart from the tract hereby ceded [by the tribe] a reservation of six hundred and forty acres" for an individual Indian, and the issue was what kind of title did he take. The Court quoted from an opinion of Attorney General Taney, destined before long to succeed Chief Justice Marshall: "these reservations are expected out of the grant made by the treaty, and did not therefore pass with it; consequently the title remains as it was before the treaty; that is to say, the lands reserved are still held under the original Indian Title." [15]

The Court held that "the reservation, unless accompanied by words limiting its effect, is equivalent to a present grant of complete title in fee simple." [16] That explanation presumably responded to the fact that tribal lands were generally held in common; individual titles were all but unknown, so that such title had to be secured to an individual through the machinery of the treaty. But that is far from a disposition of government land because, as Taney explained, the "reserved" title remained in the Indians. Many, if not most, of the Indian treaty cases involve just such "reserve" provisions.

We might dismiss Holden v. Joy, 84 U.S. 211 (1872) because, as Attorney General Bell noted, "The Court conceded that the question was immaterial in the case at bar because Congress had actually implemented and ratified that particular treaty." A.G. 9. Nevertheless, the Court, in what it terms a "strong dictum", stated that "there are many authorities where it is held that a treaty may convey to a grantee a good title to such lands without an Act of Congress conferring it. . . ." [17] I was at pains to study each of the cases cited by the Court for this assertion, and abstracted them in an appendix attached to my statement before the Senate Subcommittee on Separation of Powers. There you may see for yourself that half of the cases thus cited are entirely irrelevant, and that the rest concern "reserves" under which, as Taney observed, no title had passed to the United States but remained in the given Indian. In considering such dicta, it is well to bear in mind Chief Justice Taney's statement that the Court's "opinion upon the construction of the Constitution is always open to discussion when it is supposed to have been founded in error, and that its judicial authority should thereafter depend althogether on the force of the reasoning by which it is supported." [18]

As to other treaties, Hansell tells us, "the precedents supporting the power to dispose of property by treaty alone can be found in the boundary treaties with neighboring powers, especially in the treaties between the United States and Great Britain in 1842 and 1846 for the location of our northeast and northwest boundaries. . . ." [19] Settlements of boundary disputes are not really cessions of United States property. The Oregon boundary dispute proceeded from an extravagant claim: "Fifty-Four Forty or Fight"; the British, on the other hand, claimed land down to the forty-second parallel. Only when the dispute was settled by negotiation at 49 degrees could either party confidently assert that it had title. As a respected commentator, Samuel Crandall, observed, "a treaty for the determination of a disputed line operates not as a treaty of cession, but of recognition." [20]

Among other examples of alleged treaty transfers of property, Hansell instances the return to Japan of the Ryukyu Islands.[21] By Article III of the 1951 Treaty of Peace with Japan, the United States received the right to exercise "all and any powers of administration, legislation and jurisdiction over the territory and inhabitants of those islands . . ." While Japan renounced in Article II "all right, title and claim" to various territories, it made no similar renunciation with respect to the Ryukyus.[22] Quoting the Legal Advisor of the State Department, that "sovereignty over the Ryukyu Islands . . . remains in Japan," a District Court stated that sovereignty over a territory may be transferred by an agreement of cession," but it concluded that there had been no cession.[23] The Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals quoted a statement by Ambassador John Foster Dulles, a delegate to the Japanese Peace Conference, that the aim was "to permit Japan to retain residual sovereignty," and it held that the treaty did not make "the island a part of the United States, and it remains a foreign country for purposes of the Federal Tort Claims Act.[24]

In sum, Messrs. Hansel and Erickson have failed to make out a case for the President's "concurrent jurisdiction" with Congress in the disposition of United States property.

It remains to consider the arguments advanced by Attorney General Bell before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. He cited United States v. Percheman, 32 U.S. (7 Pet.) 51, 88–89 (1833) to prove that "the Court held self-executing certain clauses of the Florida Treaty with Spain which related to the regulation of property rights in newly acquired territory." A.G. 10. At the cited page it appears that Article 8 of the treaty provided, "all the grants of land made before the 24th of January, 1818, by his Catholic Majesty . . . in said territory ceded by His Majesty to the United States, shall be ratified and confirmed to the persons in possession of the lands. . . ."

This article, Chief Justice Marshall held, "must be intended to stipulate for that security of private property which the laws and usages of nations would, without express stipulation, have conferred."

In other words, the treaty provided that prior Spanish grants to private persons should be ratified and confirmed, a provision far removed from presidential "regulation" of public territory. Such regulation is confined to Congress, as Foster v. Neilson, 27 U.S. (2 Pet.) 253, 314–315 (1829) held with respect to the self-same provision: "the ratification and confirmation which are promised must be by the Act of the Legislature," i.e., Congress.

REMARKS IN THE LEGISLATIVE HISTORY OF THE TREATY POWER

Before discussing the legislative history adduced by the Attorney General, permit me a few words of explanation and apology. When his statement before the Senate Committee reached me late of a Saturday afternoon, as appears on my own Senate statement, I had only about two days to prepare my comments before having them typed and forwarded to the Senate Committee. Pressure of time conduces to oversights, and I was mistaken respecting a time sequence, and in following the Attorney General's erroneous identification of a motion made by Williamson and Spaight with one he attributed to Sherman and Morris. Leisure for reflection and further research has since enabled me to correct such inaccuracies and to sharpen my analysis. And it has strengthened my conviction that the treaty power was not designed to diminish the Article IV power of Congress.

For the most part the Attorney General's citations have reference to settlement of boundary disputes by treaties of peace which, as we have seen, do not involve cessions. He begins with a remark of George Mason in the Constitutional Convention, an in terrorem statement during a debate on whether the Senate could share in originating revenue-raising bills. Speaking for exclusion of the Senate, Mason stated that the Senate "could already sell the whole country by means of treaties," and then toned down this extravagant overstatement to that quoted by the Attorney General: "The Senate by means of a treaty might alienate territory, etc., without legislative sanction." A.G. 6, 2 Farrand 297. Mason spoke before the Article IV progenitor was even proposed and referred to the Committee on Detail (2 Farrand 321, 324, and of course before the resultant "disposition" provision was debated, id. 466. Manifestly his earlier remark hardly expressed the view that the treaty power overrode the as yet unborn "power to dispose."

The Attorney General's other citations will be considered seriatim.

(1) The remarks of Gerry, and of Williamson and Spaight, cited A.G.6., were made after Madison's motion to "except treaties of peace" from the two-thirds vote requirement had been agreed to by unanimous consent. 2 Farrand 540. Gerry protested "that in treaties of peace a greater rather than a lesser proportion of votes was necessary than in other treaties. In treaties of peace the dearest interests will be at stake, as the fisheries, territory, etc. In treaties of peace also there is more danger to the extremities of the Continent, of being sacrificed, than on any other occasions." Id. 541.

The "extremities" patently refer to boundary disputes. Notwithstanding, Madison's "exception" was again approved by a vote of 8 to 3. Now Williamson and Spaight took up the opposition and "moved that no Treaty of Peace affecting territorial rights should be made without the concurrence of two thirds of the [members of the Senate present.]" id. 543.[25] In short, they sought to exclude treaties of peace "affecting territorial rights" from the Madison "exception." A note added to Madison's records recites that "The subject was then debated, but the motion does not appear to have been made." 4 Farrand 58. On the following day, Sherman and Morris spoke "agst leaving the rights, established by the Treaty of Peace, to the Senate, & moved to annex a 'proviso that no such rights shd be ceded without the sanction of the Legislature,' ", id. 548,[26] a clear reference to boundary disputes. The matter was resolved by striking Madison's exception. 2 Farrand 548–549. Throughout all that was under discussion was the performance of the Senate's own "advice and consent" function, without a hint of desire to curtail the House function under Article IV. The Convention's overnight reversal of its approval of Madison's motion testifies how fluid were its views in this area, arguing against giving the remarks of Gerry et al preponderant weight.

(2) Of the same order is a letter by Hugh Williamson, a delegate to the Convention, written to Madison some nine months after its close, to recall to him "a Proviso in the new Sistem which was inserted for the express purpose of preventing a majority of the Senate . . . from giving up the Mississippi. It is provided that two-thirds of the members present in the Senate shall be required in making treaties." A.G.7–8; 3 Farrand 306–307.

As the Attorney General's fuller quotation shows, Williamson feared that General Wilkinson might be led to give up "the Navigation of the Mississippi," and recalled that "the Navigation of the Mississippi . . . was not to be risqued in the Hands of a meer Majority." A cession of territory was not therefore involved, but rather claims to rights of navigation. At best, the Mississippi issue was a boundary claim finally settled by the Louisiana Purchase. Nor was that issue the sole motivation for insistence on a two-thirds requirement. George Mason explained in the Virginia Ratification Convention that because of their concern about the Newfoundland fisheries, "The eastern states therefore agreed at length that treaties should require the consent of two-thirds of the members present in the Senate." 3 Farrand 335. Such diverse motives counsel against reading the several "two-thirds" remarks as evidencing an intent to diminish the role of the House under Article IV. It was one thing to insist that the Senate, in the performance of its own function, must act by a two-thirds vote, and something else again to court the wrath of the democratically minded, who placed their faith in the House and were already disgruntled by the exclusion of the House from the negotiation and making of treaties, by further reducing the role of the House under Article IV.

(3) The Attorney General also cites an amendment proposed by the Virginia Convention as exhibiting the awareness of the Founding Fathers that the Constitution authorizes self-executing treaties disposing of the territory and property of the United States: "no commercial treaty shall be ratified without the concurrence of the members of the Senate (not merely of those present); and no treaty ceding, contracting . . . the territorial rights or claims of the United States . . . shall be made, but in cases of extreme necessity; nor shall any treaty be ratified without the concurrence of three-fourths of the whole number of the members of both Houses respectively." (Emphasis added.) A.G. 7; 3 Elliot, Debates on the Federal Constitution 600.

From this attempt to bring the House into treaty ratification the Attorney General would infer that it could be excluded from the Article IV "disposition" of territory. It is simpler to read it as a renewal of the struggle for House participation in treaty-making. In any event, he proves too much. The Virginia Convention likewise recommended "That the legislative, executive and judicial powers should be separate and distinct," that the right to challenge jurors should not be restrained. 3 Elliott 657–658.[27] Do these proposals prove that the separation of powers therefore is not a fundamental principle of the Constitution, or that it does not guarantee the rights to challenge jurors? When implicit rights are not thus negatived, how much stronger is the case for giving effect to the express Article IV grant to Congress despite such proposals. Like the earlier remarks, the Virginia amendment testifies to the importance the Founders attached to the disposition of territory—no cession except "in cases of extreme necessity"—and suggests, as in the proposal to spell out the right of challenge, that the Virginians were merely seeking to make assurance doubly sure.

Our guide is furnished by Pierson v. Ray, 386 U.S. 547, 554–555 (1967). There the Court declared with respect to the common law immunity of judges from suit for acts performed in their official capacity.

"We do not believe that this settled principle was abolished by § 1983, which makes liable "every person" who under color of law deprives another of his civil rights . . . we presume that Congress would have specifically so provided had it wished to abolish the doctrine."

Thus the all-inclusive "every person" was held not to curtail an existing common law immunity in the absence of a specific provision. The more equivocal treaty-making power demands an even more exacting standard. Before it be concluded that it in any way diminishes the explicit grant to Congress of "power to dispose" of territory and property, a clearly expressed intention to do so should be required. That requirement is not satisfied by the random remarks collected by the Attorney General.

In my judgment, the Panama Treaty should contain a provision making it subject to approval of the Congress.

Mr. ALLEN. The full argument of this issue will be made when we come back from our recess.

● Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, we have just this past Friday begun our consideration of the Panama Canal Treaty. Accordingly, I feel it helpful that we pause for a moment to consider what we have accomplished. As I see them, the major issues of the past week have concerned the Carter-Torrijos letters, the Dole and Wallop amendments, and stonewalling.

CARTER-TORRIJOS LETTER

Apparently on March 15, the day prior to the final vote on the Neutrality Treaty, there occurred an exchange of letters between President Carter and General Torrijos concerning certain reservations which the Senate was about to add to the Neutrality Treaty, principally that proposed by my friend from Arizona. Mr. DECONCINI. Because these letters followed a telephone conversation, we really do not know all that transpired between the two leaders on this subject.

But this much is clear: In his letter, President Carter attempted to minimize the significance of the DeConcini and other reservations. General Torrijos understood the President to say that these reservations accomplished no significant change over and above the so-called leadership amendments.

To quote from the General's letter directly:

In your letter and conversation you informed me that the Senate will introduce some reservations, but that they will not alter nor detract from the content of what was agreed upon in the Neutrality Treaty and in our declaration of October 14, 1977.

Mr. President, I repeat the words of the General: "not alter nor detract from." Clearly, in the General's view, President Carter assured him that the action soon to be taken by the Senate in approving the DeConcini resolution did not materially affect the Neutrality Treaty as amended by the statement of mutual understanding of October 14. The chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, the distinguished Senator from Alabama, concurred in this assessment when he said in referring to the DeConcini resolution, "It made no major changes. It was a clarification."

Personally, I voted against this resolution. I, too, believe it to be essentially devoid of substance. But, I am concerned that our President, would, on the one hand, use its purported importance to persuade undecided Senators to vote for the Neutrality Treaty while, on the other, assure the Panamanian dictator of its inconsequential nature. Perhaps this is the kind of ambiguity which is the essence of international diplomacy. I am certainly not a foreign affairs expert. But I am an attorney of some experience in contract work and I have long believed that a viable agreement depends on a clear understanding by both sides as to just what is expected of them under the agreement.

The only clear aspect of the Carter-Torrijos exchange of letters is its ambiguity. One must assume that those 75 Senators who voted to add the DeConcini reservation to the Neutrality Treaty did so because they believed it to be a substantial improvement. And, yet, it is clear from the text of General Torrijos' letter that he was assured by President Carter that the DeConcini amendment was of no substantive consequence.

Presumably, as a legal matter, the DeConcini reservation is either meaningful or it is not. As a practical proposition, however, assurances from the President of the United States that a reservation of a possibly unpleasant nature to Panama is of no substantive importance can only serve to muddy what is already by all accounts a highly ambiguous document.

A second issue surrounding the exchange of letters concerns the timing. The letters were exchanged March 15. The Neutrality Treaty was finally approved, as was the DeConcini reservation, on March 16. Consequently, it appears as though certain Senators, a number of whom were previously undecided, agreed to support the Neutrality Treaty on the basis of a reservation which President Carter, unbeknownst to them had already assured General Torrijos to be essentially meaningless.

DOLE AND WALLOP

The first two amendments to the canal treaty were offered and defeated on Monday, March 20. The first to be voted on was a Wallop unprinted amendment (unprinted amendment number 13). That amendment would have restored the Panama treaties of 1903, 1936, and 1955 in the event Panama abrogated any provision of the current Panama Treaty or treaty on neutrality.

In my view, the Wallop amendment was highly meritorious. The United States has never spelled out what it considers its rights or obligations if Panama abrogates the 1977 treaties. It is unclear what action the United States could legally take should that event occur. In the words of Senator WALLOP, ". . . in my trip to Panama, not only Panamanians but Zonians and American businessmen in Panama and other places, consistently told me that they expected this to be but the first of perhaps three treaties between now and the year 2000 * * *." This amendment would have assured that this would not be the case. It would have provided another incentive to the Panamanians to follow the 1977 treaty terms and not to merely use it as a stepping stone for further requests or gains. It would not have added a crippling amendment to the treaty—on the contrary, if Panama intends to follow the terms of the 1977 treaty, this amendment would never go into effect.

If the United States was ever to abrogate the treaty, the rights of Panama would be protected since it has been given sovereign right over the zone. This amendment would have the United States a legal and moral foothold in the case of a unilateral abrogation by Panama. It would have spelled out the standard to which we would return in case of an abrogation and would have given fair notice to both. Nevertheless, the Wallop amendment was tabled by a vote of 50 to 37.

The second amendment offered Monday was the Dole amendment (No. 69), which stated that for the duration of the main treaty only the military forces, defense sites, or military installations of the Republic of Panama or the United States of America may be maintained in the national territory of the Republic of Panama. This amendment would have guaranteed that Panama could not invite or allow foreign troops into Panama during the period of the Panama Canal Treaty. In particular, the amendment was designed to prevent the stationing of Soviet or Cuban forces or the forces of any other nation within Panamanian territory. In view of recent Soviet and Cuban expansionism, it seems to me that the need for such an amendment should have been obvious on its face.

It is both practical and reasonable to ask this assurance from Panama. The Panamanian Government has already given a similar assurance under Article V of the Neutrality Treaty. Such a guarantee could not seriously have challenged Panama's sovereignty or it never would have agreed to it in the Neutrality Treaty. In fact, a clear statement that Panama had no intention cf allowing foreign nations to base troops on its territory would actually have strengthened Panamanian sovereignty.

But more importantly, the Dole amendment would have given needed assurances for the protection of U.S. interests in safeguarding the canal. As the treaty now stands, we will give substantial portions of land over to Panama upon ratification. Without this amendment, 1 week later the Panamanians could invite Cuban or Russian troops into Panama and, in some places, literally right up to the canal's edge. Although Panama is free to invite foreign troops in today, those troops would be kept away from the canal by the 5-mile-wide buffer zone we now control. In short, without the Dole amendment, American security interests would be seriously impaired by the 1977 treaties. To justify the surrender of the 5-mile buffer zone, Panama should have been asked to assure us that no hostile troops will ever be stationed in Panama.

My friend from Kansas put it best when he said, "I defy anybody who opposes this amendment to tell us what they are going to do if Cuban troops are invited into Panama * * *." The amendment had one purpose—to insure that no foreign military presence other than that of the United States will be established within Panama between now and the year 2000. Yet, it was still defeated by a vote of 45 to 39.

THE STONEWALLING ISSUE

Consideration of the Dole and Wallop amendments witnessed a display of unpleasantness which can only reflect unfavorably upon the Senate's standing in the eyes of the American people and which I sincerely hope will not reoccur. As one who has been active among the leaders of the opposition, I find such displays unfortunate.

But, the issue which so raised Senatorial tempers is fundamental. Does this Senate, as an institution, have an active role in considering treaties? Or, must we stand aside and passively accept or reject en bloc whatever is presented to us by the executive branch?

To me, the advice and consent function clearly requires that the Senate play an active role. Our duty goes beyond that of a rubber stamp marked "yes" or "no." We have the right and, indeed, the obligation to insist upon constructive changes whether or not they are convenient for the executive, our negotiating partners, or even our own leadership.

In No. 64 of the Federalist, John Jay discusses the treatymaking process of the new Federal Constitution. He touches on the need for secrecy and dispatch in the conduct of negotiations by the President, but devotes most of the paper to the virtues of mature reflection and improvement of the negotiated product afforded by providing the advice and consent function to the Senate. In the very last lines, he underscores his conception of the importance of the role to be played by the Senate in the treatymaking process by saying:

With respect to their responsibility, it is difficult to conceive of how it could be increased. Every consideration that can influence the human mind, such as honor, oaths, reputations, conscience, the love of country and family affections and attachments, afford for their fidelity. In short, as the Constitution has taken the utmost care that they be men of talents and integrity, we have reason to be persuaded that the treaties they make will be as advantageous as all circumstances could be.

Thus, the Founding Fathers also conceived of the Senate as an active participant in treatymaking. Allowed more than a mere approval or disapproval function, the Senate to them was to have the same active role in the fashioning of the end product, which I believe it now should have. In fact, in our deliberations on the Panama Canal treaties, I believe we owe it to ourselves and our constituents not to settle for anything less.

Mr. President, for the information of my colleagues, I ask that the full text of Federalist No. 64 be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

No. 64: JAY

It is a just and not a new observation that enemies to particular persons, and opponents to particular measures, seldom confine their censures to such things only, in either, as are worthy of blame. Unless, on this principle, it is difficult to explain the motives of their conduct, who condemn the proposed Constitution in the aggregate and treat with severity some of the most unexceptionable articles in it.

The second section gives power to the President, "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur."

The power of making treaties is an important one, especially as it relates to war, peace, and commerce; and it should not be delegated but in such a mode, and with such precautions, as will afford the highest security that it will be exercised by men the best qualified for the purpose, and in the manner most conducive to the public good. The convention appears to have been attentive to both these points; they have directed the President to be chosen by select bodies of electors to be deputed by the people for that express purpose; and they have committed the appointment of senators to the State legislatures. This mode has, in such cases, vastly the advantage of elections by the people in their collective capacity where the activity of party zeal, taking advantage of the supineness, the ignorance, and the hopes and fears of the unwary and interested, often places men in office by the votes of a small proportion of the electors.

As the select assemblies for choosing the President, as well as the State legislatures who appoint the senators, will in general be composed of the most enlightened and respectable citizens, there is reason to presume that their attention and their votes will be directed to those men only who have become the most distinguished by their abilities and virtue, and in whom the people perceive just grounds for confidence. The Constitution manifests very particular attention to this object. By excluding men under thirty-five from the first office, and those under thirty from the second, it confines the electors to men of whom the people have had time to form a judgment, and with respect to whom they will not be liable to be deceived by those brilliant appearances of genius and patriotism which, like transient meteors, sometimes mislead as well as dazzle. If the observation be well founded that wise kings will always be served by able ministers it is fair to argue that as an assembly of select electors possess, in a greater degree than kings, the means of extensive and accurate information relative to men and characters, so will their appointments bear at least equal marks of discretion and discernment. The inference which naturally results from these considerations is this, that the President and senators so chosen will always be of the number of those who best understand our national interests, whether considered in relation to the several States or to foreign nations, who are best able to promote those interests, and whose reputation for integrity inspires and merits confidence. With such men the power of making treaties may be safely lodged.

Although the absolute necessity of system, in the conduct of any business, is universally known and acknowledged, yet the high importance of it in national affairs has not yet become sufficiently impressed on the public mind. They who wish to commit the power under consideration to a popular assembly composed of members constantly coming and going in quick succession seem not to recollect that such a body must necessarily be inadequate to the attainment of those great objects which require to be steadily contemplated in all their relations and circumstances, and which can only be approached and achieved by measures which not only talents, but also exact information, and often much time, are necessary to concert and to execute. It was wise, therefore, in the convention, to provide not only that the power of making treaties should be committed to able and honest men, but also that they should continue in place a sufficient time to become perfectly acquainted with our national concerns, and to form and introduce a system for the management of them. The duration prescribed is such as will give them an opportunity of greatly extending their political informations, and of rendering their accumulating experience more and more beneficial to their country. Nor has the convention discovered less prudence in providing for the frequent elections of senators in such a way as to obviate the inconvenience of periodically transferring those great affairs entirely to new men; for by leaving a considerable residue of the old ones in place, uniformity and order, as well as a constant succession of official information, will be preserved.

There are few who will not admit that the affairs of trade and navigation should be regulated by a system cautiously formed and steadily pursued; and that both our treaties and our laws should correspond with and be made to promote it. It is of much consequence that this correspondence and conformity be carefully maintained; and they who assent to the truth of this position will see and confess that it is well provided for by making the concurrence of the Senate necessary both to treaties and to laws.

It seldom happens in the negotiation of treaties, of whatever nature, but that perfect secrecy and immediate dispatch are sometimes requisite. There are cases where the most useful intelligence may be obtained, if the persons possessing it can be relieved from apprehensions of discovery. Those apprehensions will operate on those persons whether they are actuated by mercenary or friendly motives; and there doubtless are many of both descriptions who would rely on the secrecy of the President, but who would not confide in that of the Senate, and still less in that of a large popular assembly. The convention have done well, therefore, in so disposing of the power of making treaties that although the President must, in forming them, act by the advice and consent of the Senate, yet he will be able to manage the business of intelligence in such manner as prudence may suggest.

They who have turned their attention to the affairs of men must have perceived that there are tides in them; tides very irregular in their duration, strength, and direction, and seldom found to run twice exactly in the same manner or measure. To discern and to profit by these tides in national affairs is the business of those who preside over them; and they who have had much experience on this head inform us that there frequently are occasions when days, nay, even when hours, are precious. The loss of a battle, the death of a prince, the removal of a minister, or other circumstances intervening to change the present posture and aspect of affairs may turn the most favorable tide into a course opposite to our wishes. As in the field, so in the cabinet, there are moments to be seized as they pass, and they who preside in either should be left in capacity to improve them so often and so essentially have we heretofore suffered from the want of secrecy and dispatch that the Constitution would have been inexcusably defective if no attention had been paid to those objects. Those matters which in negotiations usually require the most secrecy and the most dispatch are those preparatory and auxiliary measures which are not otherwise important in a national view, than as they tend to facilitate the attainment of the objects of the negotiation. For these the President will find no difficulty to provide; and should any circumstance occur which requires the advice and consent of the Senate, he may at any time convene them. Thus we see that the Constitution provides that our negotiations for treaties shall have every advantage which can be derived from talents, information, integrity, and deliberate investigations, on the one hand, and from secrecy and dispatch on the other.

But to this plan, as to most others that have ever appeared, objections are contrived and urged.

Some are displeased with it, not on account of any errors or defects in it, but because, as the treaties, when made, are to have the force of laws, they should be made only by men invested with legislative authority. These gentlemen seem not to consider that the judgments of our courts, and the commissions constitutionally given by our governor, are as valid and as binding on all persons whom they concern as the laws passed by our legislature. All constitutional acts of power, whether in the executive or in the judicial department, have as much legal validity and obligation as if they proceeded from the legislature; and therefore, whatever name be given to the power of making treaties, or however obligatory they may be when made, certain it is that the people may, with much propriety, commit the power to a distinct body from the legislature, the executive, or the judicial. It surely does not follow that because they have given the power of making laws to the legislature, that therefore they should likewise give them power, to do every other act of sovereignty by which the citizens are to be bound and affected.

Others, though content that treaties should be made in the mode proposed, are averse to their being the supreme laws of the land. They insist, and profess to believe, that treaties, like acts of assembly, should be repealable at pleasure. This idea seems to be new and peculiar to this country, but new errors, as well as new truths, often appear. These gentlemen would do well to reflect that a treaty is only another name for a bargain, and that it would be impossible to find a nation who would make any bargain with us, which should be binding on them absolutely, but on us only so long and so far as we may think proper to be bound by it. They who make laws may, without doubt, amend or repeal them; and it will not be disputed that they who make treaties may alter or cancel them; but still let us not forget that treaties are made, not by only one of the contracting parties, but by both, and consequently, that as the consent of both was essential to their formation at first, so must it ever afterwards be to alter or cancel them. The proposed Constitution, therefore, has not in the least extended the obligation of treaties. They are just as binding and just as far beyond the lawful reach of legislative acts now as they will be at any future period, or under any form of government.

However useful jealousy may be in republics, yet when like bile in the natural it abounds too much in the body politic, the eyes of both become very liable to be deceived by the delusive appearances which that malady casts on surrounding objects. From this cause, probably, proceed the fears and apprehensions of some, that the President and Senate may make treaties without an equal eye to the interests of all the States. Others suspect that the two thirds will oppress the remaining third, and ask whether those gentlemen are made sufficiently responsible for their conduct; whether, if they act corruptly, they can be punished; and if they make disadvantageous treaties, how are we to get rid of those treaties?

As all the States are equally represented in the Senate, and by men the most able and the most willing to promote the interests of their constituents, they will all have an equal degree of influence in that body, especially while they continue to be careful in appointing proper persons, and to insist on their punctual attendance. In proportion as the United States assumes a national form and a national character, so will the good of the whole be more and more an object of attention, and the government must be a weak one indeed if it should forget that the good of the whole can only be promoted by advancing the good of each of the parts or members which compose the whole. It will not be in the power of the President and Senate to make any treaties by which they and their families and estates will not be equally bound and affected with the rest of the community; and, having no private interests distinct from that of the nation, they will be under no temptations to neglect the latter.

As to corruption, the case is not supposable. He must either have been very unfortunate in his intercourse with the world, or possess a heart very susceptible of such impressions, who can think it probable that the President and two thirds of the Senate will ever be capable of such unworthy conduct. The idea is too gross and too invidious to be entertained. But in such a case, if it should ever happen, the treaty so obtained from us would, like all other fraudulent contracts, be null and void by the laws of nations.

With respect to their responsibility, it is difficult to conceive how it could be increased. Every consideration that can influence the human mind, such as honor, oaths, reputations, conscience, the love of country, and family affections and attachments, afford security for their fidelity. In short, as the Constitution has taken the utmost care that they shall be men of talents, and integrity, we have reason to be persuaded that the treaties they make will be as advantageous as, all circumstances considered, could be made; and so far as the fear of punishment and disgrace can operate, that motive to good behavior is amply afforded by the article on the subject of impeachments.●

● Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, on March 16 the Senate gave its consent to the ratification of the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal. After more than 20 days of debate and discussion of the many aspects of both the Neutrality Treaty and the Panama Canal Treaty, the Senate adopted important amendments and reservations which I supported and cosponsored designed to safeguard future U.S. security interests and assure the continued availability of the Panama Canal to the shipping of all nations.

On this latter point, I think it is important to pause a moment and consider just what the position is of those who must depend upon the continued efficient operation of the canal on a day-to-day basis. It would seem reasonable to any rational person that those who use the canal most frequently probably have the greatest stake in seeing that the canal is operated most efficiently and on a nondiscriminatory basis. For this reason, Mr. President, I think it is important to note that the principal user of the canal, United Brands Inc., enthusiastically endorses the treaty before us today.

It has been pointed out to me that United Brands made nearly 400 transits of the Panama Canal during 1977 averaging 33 trips per month. Approximately $3 million in tolls were paid. The company also acted as agents for vessels that made an additional 513 transits last year. In addition, United Brands maintains operations and offices in the Canal Zone itself. One division of United Brands, the United Fruit Company, is engaged in the production and distribution of tropical agricultural products. Surely such produce could ill-afford delay in transiting the canal. Yet United Brands supports the treaties and refuses to accept the arguments that the treaties will result in irregular operations, uncertain access, or closure, or that the canal could become a major theater of military operations.

Nor is United Brands alone in this opinion. On March 15 I received a letter from the chairman of the board of Corning Glass Works, Mr. Amory Houghton, Jr. Corning is a major employer in the State of Indiana. Mr. Houghton pointed out to me that 24 percent of Corning's exports pass through the canal. Mr. President. Mr. Houghton supports the treaties and points out that—

> Our interest is to assure the open and neutral operation of the Canal. Personally, I believe the best way is through new treaties that provide for an orderly assumption of control by Panama.

As my colleagues know, the Council of the Americas is composed of 230 major U.S. corporations and accounts for more than 90 percent of U.S. private investment in Latin America. This organization has gone on record in strong support of the Panama Canal treaties. Even those concerned about the prospect of increased tolls on traffic through the canal such as Mr. James J. Reynolds, president of the American Institute of Merchant Shipping, stated in response to a question about treaty rejection during his appearance before the Foreign Relations Committee that—

> . . . any thoughtful American has to come to the conclusion that to reject this treaty would be a devastatingly improper thing to do.

I could go on to develop this point further, but I believe we have had enough repetition of argument in this Chamber about these treaties already.

Mr. President, I hope that the Senate can move with all deliberate speed to approve the Panama Canal Treaty. Once approval of these agreements is completed, we can then turn to the pressing domestic issues which we can ill afford to defer much longer.

The alternative before us, Mr. President is not the status quo as some of my colleagues and constituents sincerely believe. It is the certainty of uncertainty and a decline of U.S. credibility in all of Latin America. It would be ironic and tragic if the treaties were rejected, and American troops someday fight and die defending a canal which we may still "own" but are no longer able to operate and which is not used by merchant shipping. Mr. President we simply can not permit this to happen.●

EMPLOYEE PROTECTION—THE LABOR RIGHTS AMENDMENT

● Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, one amendment I will offer can be truly classified as a labor rights amendment—American human rights for a change. I believe when I explain this amendment and the need for it, I doubt whether any member of this body will vote to reject it. Such amendment has already been filed as printed amendment No. 82.

In the event that the treaties are ratified, which I hope they will not be, they contain absolutely no guarantees for the workers in the Canal Zone other than a vague statement by the U.S. Government assuring that things will be OK for them. What has been said is that, "they will be provided for." Union and civic leaders have repeatedly asked Government officials, Members of Congress, and the treaty negotiators themselves to elaborate on and clarify this statement. Their requests have been either ignored or answered with similar ambiguous statements and half truths.

They are tired of being brushed aside and they are fed up with this kind of treatment. It is shabby treatment for this Government to pull the rug out from under them and to make no firm commitment to them. My amendent seeks nothing more than fair and equitable treatment for them by guaranteeing them a job opportunity in the United States for any eligible employee who elects to leave the Canal Zone.

The employees have been told that they will be given job placement priority in the civil service system if their jobs are abolished. It has been reported by several employees to me that the Civil Service Commission in Miami and New York have been instructed not to hire Panama Canal employees even though jobs were available in those cities. It is obvious that the Carter administration is trying to prevent them from leaving unless they want them to, unless the employees are willing to terminate their civil service careers. If these tactics are being used now, before the treaties are ratified, it is obvious that the U.S. employee will have no priority placement after the treaties are implemented, and when living and working conditions in the Canal Zone are bound to worsen.

As for those U.S. employees who do not lose their jobs, they will become virtual prisoners with no avenue of escape other than termination of their civil service careers.

If ever there were a group of Federal employees in need of such a guarantee, it is these. Supposedly hired with the protections of title V civil service provisions, the number of American employees in the Canal Zone will undergo a forced 20-percent drop within 5 years of the effectiveness of the treaty. The remainder will gradually be phased out by a discriminatory system of preferential hiring. American nationals will be subject to forced rotation into less preferable jobs, and are given no guarantee of nondiscriminatory assignment or promotion. As a shrinking minority of American employees become a vestige in the eyes of the Panamanians of what they perceive to be U.S. imperialism, pressures to force these civil servants out of their jobs will become greater and greater.

The supposed quid pro quo is a promise by the United States to act as a placement service "to the maximum extent feasible." Reports that the Civil Service Commission officers in Miami and New York have been instructed not to hire Canal Zone employees should suggest that this commitment is meaningless.

Hollow assurance is not justice and fairness to those Americans who are victimized by ratification of these treaties.

My amendment would add teeth to our commitment to the Zonians. It would have the benefit of providing undecided Members with crucial assurances while there is still time to reconsider the treaty package. However, because it would be unilaterally binding on the United States, it would not require another plebiscite.

My amendment tracks similar guarantees for super-level civil servants contained in the Ribicoff-Percy-Sasser-Javits civil service reform bill. If we can make job guarantees to GS–18's situated comfortably in Washington, surely we can make the same commitment to Americans abroad who find their jobs hostage to the exigencies of American foreign policy.

Equity and fair treatment demand no less. I recommend the adoption of my amendment.

Mr. President, I ask that the amendment be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

After paragraph 10 of Article X, insert the following new paragraph:

11. In order to fulfill the prior assurances by the Government of the United States respecting the economic well-being and job security of any United States national employee of the Panama Canal Company, United States nationals who are employees of the Panama Canal Company or of another instrumentality of the Government of the United States in the Canal Zone prior to the entry into force of this Treaty and who subsequently after ratification of this Treaty elect to leave the Zone or are removed from such employment for reasons other than misconduct, neglect of duty, or malfeasance shall have the right to job placement with no reduction in grade or step in a Federal position with the Government of the United States within the continental United States subject to the provisions of subchapter II of chapter 57, of title 5 of the United States Code.●

LOAN TO ZAMBIA BY THE INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, on March 17, the AP wire carried a report with a Lusaka, Zambia dateline. It said that Zambia's two major copper mining companies N'Changa Consolidated Copper Mines and Roan Copper Mines "have been saved from shut down by a $322.6 million loan from the International Monetary Fund." The announcement was made by the Zambian Minister of Finance.

The IMF loan was made necessary by the lowest world copper prices in 25 years. These prices were brought on in large part by the failure of the government-owned mines in Zambia, Zaire, and Chile to respond to world overproduction of copper. The Government of Zambia led in totally undermining the copper market. Now Zambia's access to foreign currency has led to a crisis with its balance-of-payments deficit. Zambia is reported to be very close to defaulting on its international debts and in effect declaring international bankruptcy.

Well, we have a big problem in my own State of Montana where these same depressed copper prices have also led to a crisis resulting in mine closings and thousands of people unemployed. The only difference is that the International Monetary Fund will not pick up the tab in Montana. We just pay our taxes so the IMF can give a transfusion to Zambia after they have cut our throats while, incidentally, also cutting their own throat.

When the IMF was set up in 1962, the United States underwrote it to the tune of $2 billion, and currently supplies about one-third of the Fund's capital. Last year the United States provided $670 million and will be asked for more this year. Are we in the ridiculous situation where the U.S. taxpayer is subsidizing foreign government-owned copper mines so that they can continue producing copper that will further depress world copper prices, thus possibly putting more thousands of American copper miners out of work?

In the past when the mines in Zambia, Zaire, Chile, Peru, and so on were privately owned, production was reduced in times of recession along with the cutbacks in our domestic U.S. mines. Now, the U.S. mines are forced to absorb all of the cutbacks and layoffs because the foreign government-owned mines do not respond to the copper market.

If the nation of Zambia had done what American Copper producers—Anaconda, Phelps-Dodge, Inspiration, Ranchers, ASARCO, Cyprus, Duval—have had to do in cutting back production, the case might be made for some limited assistance. In the case of my own State of Montana, the underground mine at Butte has been closed; the Arbiter smelter at Anaconda has been shut down and work at Great Falls curtailed. Employment at Butte, Anaconda, and Great Falls has been reduced by the loss of over 2,000 jobs. Nationally, over 5,000 copper employees have been certified by the Labor Department as available for Federal relief under the Trade Act because of being hurt by the copper imports from Zambia and other nations.

Why should Zambia be immunized from the world markets by being propped up with the help of the U.S. taxpayers when American mines must shut down their operations?

If we here in America do not get back to tending our own domestic flock, there will not be anyone left to pay the U.S. taxes.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 5 minutes, as in legislative session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Without objection, it is so ordered.

S. 2808—TAX RELIEF FROM THE SOCIAL SECURITY TAX BITE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation today to provide tax relief from the social security tax bite.

Last December the Democratic leadership of both Houses of Congress proclaimed a victory upon the passage of the social security financing amendments. However, it seems that those who supported the tax increase are now the biggest advocates of tax relief.

The Senator from Kansas expressed serious doubts about the social security legislation that would raise $227 billion in new social security taxes in the next 10 years. I felt, as I do now, that the action taken was hasty and ill conceived.

SOCIAL SECURITY TAX CREDITS

The social security tax is intolerable. I believe that Americans need and deserve a tax cut.

My proposal will, if enacted, grant a 20-percent refundable tax credit on the social security employee and self-employed contribution paid. The legislation will grant tax relief to Americans inflicted with the burdensome social security tax without endangering the integrity of the social security trust fund. It avoids the perils of general revenue financing by retaining the requirement that Congress cannot indiscriminately raise social security benefits without increasing social security taxes to pay for the benefits. My proposal, unlike general revenue finance or social security tax rollback will keep the social security trust fund actuarially sound.

Mr. President, social security taxes are scheduled to dramatically increase over the next few years. However, the administration tax proposal fails to adequately address this problem. Under the administration's tax plan, millions of Americans would experience tax increases as early as 1979, largely due to inflation and the increased social security taxes.

TAX RELIEF

Mr. President, there is no question that Americans need tax relief. In fact, the average American must now work until May 15 every year just to pay his taxes. Recent figures compiled by the Treasury Department show that those American households with incomes of $17,000 a year or higher pay 70 percent of all personal income tax. Even more startling is the fact that about half of the American households pay 94 percent of all personal taxes.

The 20 percent refundable tax credit on social security taxes would cost $11 billion in calendar year 1979. My proposal extended to railroad retirement payments would increase the cost by $800 million. More than 58 percent of the relief would go to American families earning less than $20,000 per year and more than 87 percent would go to families earning less than $30,000 per year.

MEASURING STICK

The President is calling for a net tax cut in the neighborhood of $25 billion. The cost of my proposal allows sufficient flexibility to enact tax relief to those Americans not in the social security system and flexibility to design a package of business incentives.

The Senator from Kansas supports tax reduction and relief from social security taxes. However, the Congress must be careful in designing the tax package. The tax credit—using social security contributions as a measuring stick—is both sensible and equitable.

I ask unanimous consent that the accompanying charts and the text of my bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the tables and bill were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"Sec. 44C. Social security tax credit.".

SEC. 2. (a) The amendments made by this Act shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1977.

S. 2809—CHILD CARE FOOD PROGRAM

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, today I take pleasure in introducing legislation to extend and strengthen the child care food program (CCFP), a nationwide effort which helps child care centers as well as family and group day care homes serve high quality and well-balanced meals. The goal of this program is to improve the diets of children by providing the nutrients they need for optimal growth and development.

Eligible institutions include settlement houses, neighborhood centers, Head Start centers, afterschool recreational centers, and institutions providing day care services for handicapped children. The CCFP aids in several ways: first, technical assistance and guidance on food service operations, program management, and recordkeeping; second, a variety of food commodities or cash in lieu; and three, reimbursement for breakfast, lunch, supper, and snacks served which meet meal pattern requirements set by the Department of Agriculture.

The bill I am introducing extends the program for 4 years, simplifies the administration, and at the same time retains accountability. In introducing this bill, let me point out that there are provisions to which I am not totally wedded; and I am continuing to seek the advice and counsel of persons with more expertise in this field. Early next month we are holding hearings, where many provisions of the bill will be aired further. In addition, I am asking a number of people from around the country who work with the CCFP every day to react to this document before final markup.

One such provision is the question of eligibility to participate in the program. I believe strongly that all centers and homes providing care to children should meet standards which ensure that the child will be cared for in a safe, healthy, and wholesome environment. At the same time I am also aware that licensing and other approval mechanisms do sometimes hinder participation.

It is clear from available statistics that most child care is not provided in licensed facilities, however the supply of licensed care has been increasing rapidly in recent years. There has been considerable activity on the part of States to increase thir child care licensing and monitoring activities and to review and revise their requirements. I find this encouraging—along with the move to provide comprehensive or total care for the child along with the food program.

There are many administrative pluses in this bill with which I am proud to be associated.

USE OF COMMODITIES

One is the use of more domestic commodities in the meals. Current law allows each State agency to request, on behalf of all child care sponsors in its State, receipt of commodities or cash in lieu of these foods. My bill provides more flexibility in the use of domestic commodities by allowing the centers themselves to choose between the commodities or cash.

STREAMLINED RECORDKEEPING

Probably one of the most significant improvements in this bill is streamlining the recordkeeping, along with a substantial reduction in paperwork. Last August I heard much testimony in my home State of Kansas which pointed out that one of the largest stumbling blocks to fuller participation and ultimate program benefit is the burden of paperwork. Well, we are seeking to streamline the recordkeeping in this bill, and this is a move in the right direction.

MEAL REIMBURSEMENT

Third, this bill provides subsidy for all children in the program, whether they fall into the free, reduced prices, or paid meal categories. The President's budget request anticipated the passage of legislation to be submitted later this year which would eliminate all reimbursement for meals served to paying children in this program. This is not the case with this piece of legislation—subsidies are provided for all children.

Earlier this month the Senate Agriculture Committee endorsed a budget authority of $18 million above the administration's current services estimate of $146 million for the CCFP, or $164 million, to allow for the passage of this bill.

WORKING PARENTS

Finally, I feel a word about the relief this bill provides working parents is in order. Knowing that a child is enrolled in a child care facility and receiving well-prepared, well-served, and well-balanced meals is an enormous relief for any employed mother and father.

Of late the care of children while their parents are working has been a subject of increasing concern to many of us; one reason being the growth in the number of children whose mothers are in the labor force. Recent statistics of the Department of Labor show that 48 percent of the children under 18 years of age had mothers in the labor force in March 1977, up from 39 percent in 1970. Among pre-school-age children, the proportion whose mothers worked or looked for work rose from 29 percent to 38 percent between 1970 and 1977.

I am proud to sponsor this bill which contains provisions directly responsive to the needs of child care programs, and was shaped by comments and suggestions from child care sponsors. One such sponsor—a constituent of mine—Ms. Sharon Hixson, director of Thomas County Day Care in Colby, Kans., states:

> The benefit of the child care food program is immeasurable. The food program does much good in respect to improving nutrition and developing good food habits for children in our care. Children are "guaranteed" nutritious breakfasts, snacks and lunches, and in return for our commitment to meet the program's regulations, the center is assured some financial support for the effort. Everyone benefits.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2809

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SEC. 2. Effective October 1, 1978, section 17 of the National School Lunch Act is amended to read as follows:

"CHILD CARE FOOD PROGRAM

"SEC. 17. (a) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as are necessary for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, and for each succeeding fiscal year through the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982, to enable the Secretary to formulate and carry out a program to assist States through grants-in-aid and other means to initiate, maintain and expand non-profit food service programs for children in day care provided by any eligible sponsor that applies to initiate, maintain, or expand such a food service program.

"(b)(1) 'Sponsor' means any public or private non-profit organization which is administratively responsible for the food service of children in care in one or more non-residential sites.

"(2) 'Site' includes, but is not limited to, public or private non-profit day care centers, settlement houses, recreation centers, family day care homes, Headstart centers and sites providing day care services for handicapped children: Provided, that family day care homes shall be deemed to meet the requirements of this subsection through compliance with subsection (c)(2).

"(3) 'Adjusted semi-annually' means adjustments to payments for costs associated with meal service and commodities to the nearest one-fourth cent, effective every January 1 and July 1 of each fiscal year, to reflect cost changes in the series of food away from home of the Consumer Price Index for the most recent 6-month period ending in November and May, respectively, of each fiscal year.

"(c)(1) No site shall be eligible to participate in this program unless: (a) it has local, State or Federal licensing or approval or is reasonably complying with appropriate renewal procedures; or (b) its sponsor accepts referrals for placement from State or local agencies or (c) its sponsor accepts Federal, State or local governmental funds for program activities, including but not limited to funds under title XX, Headstart, Child Abuse Acts, or the Juvenile Protection Act, or (d) where State or local licensing or approval is unavailable, its sponsor can satisfy the Secretary that it has approved sites in accordance with the standards of its State. Where State standards are not available, those requirements established by the Secretary shall be met.

"(2) Family and group day care homes, at their option, may be administered by a sponsor which may be approved for funding under this section only if, under conditions established by the Secretary, such sponsor is in, or is moving toward, compliance with the requirements for tax exempt status under the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, or is currently operating, or is part of, a federally funded program requiring nonprofit status. Any eligible sponsor shall receive the child care food program upon its request.

"(3) A sponsor shall be notified in writing of approval or disapproval within 30 days after the date a completed application is filed with the designated State agency. If a sponsor submits an incomplete application, the State agency shall provide technical assistance to the institution for the purpose of assisting the sponsor in completing its application. The State agency shall provide, in accordance with regulations issued by the Secretary, a standard form of agreement for use between each sponsor, and its sites, specifying the rights and responsibilities of each party, and including cause for termination of agreement

"(4) The State agency shall provide, in accordance with regulations issued by the Secretary, for the granting of a fair hearing and a prompt determination to any sponsor or site aggrieved by the action of the State agency as it affects the participation of such sponsor or site in the program authorized by this section.

"(d)(1) For each fiscal year beginning with the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, the Secretary shall make child care food payments no less frequently than on a monthly basis to each State agency in an amount no less than the sum of the products obtained by multiplying the number of breakfasts, lunches, suppers, and snacks served to children in care by the payment rates for each meal type established by this Act to which the site or sponsor is determined to be eligible, which rates shall be adjusted semi-annually.

"(2) The rate of reimbursement each sponsor or site shall be entitled to receive shall be determined by the number of its participating children from families whose incomes meet the eligibility requirements for free and reduced-price meals, pursuant to section 9 of this Act. Where two-thirds or more of the participating children of a sponsor are eligible for free or reduced-price meals, the sponsor shall be reimbursed for each meal type served at the national average payment rates established for free meals; where one-third or more of the participating children are eligible for free or reduced-price meals, the sponsor shall be reimbursed for each meal type served at the national average payment rates established for reduced-price meals; where less than one-third of the participating children are eligible for free or reduced-price meals, the sponsor shall be reimbursed for each meal type served at the basic national average payment rate, Provided, That such sponsor may elect to claim reimbursement in accordance with the eligibility for free and reduced-price meals of each participating child. Reimbursement for meals provided under this section shall not be dependent upon the collection of moneys from participating children.

"(3) In lieu of maintaining records on the actual cost of the meal service, sponsors may elect, for all family and group day care homes under their jurisdiction, to utilize the flat cost of food service rates established by the Secretary, as adjusted semi-annually, or the appropriate national average payment rate, whichever is the lesser.

"(4) Sponsors which administer family and group day care homes shall receive, in addition, an amount for the cost of administering the program which amount shall be determined by the Secretary, taking into account the number of sites.

"(e) Meals served by sponsors participating in the program under this section shall consist of a combination of foods and shall meet requirements prescribed by the Secretary in accordance with section 9 of this Act. No sponsor shall be prohibited from serving a breakfast, lunch, dinner and/or snacks to each eligible child at appropriate times each full day.

"(f)(1) Funds paid to any State under this section shall be disbursed by the State agency to sponsors approved for participation on a non-discriminating basis to reimburse such institution for these costs in connection with food service operations, including labor and administrative claims.

"(2) Not later than the 1st day of each month the State agency shall forward advance program payments to each approved sponsor, who so requests, in the amount of 80% of the amount established by the State to be needed by such institution for meals to be served that month. The State agency shall forward any remaining payment due within 30 days following receipt of a valid claim. If the State agency has reason to believe that the claim is invalid, it shall so notify the sponsor within 10 working days after receipt. If the State has reason to believe that a service institution will not be able to submit a valid claim for reimbursement covering the period for which an advance payment has been made, the subsequent month's advance project payment shall be withheld until such time as the State has received a valid claim. Program payments advanced to sponsors that are not subsequently deducted from a valid claim for reimbursement shall be repaid upon demand by the State.

"(3) To improve program planning and expand participation, the State agency shall make available funds to sponsors in an amount prescribed by the Secretary in consideration of the size and type of program. Such funds shall not exceed three months', nor be less than one month's, anticipated administrative costs for the purpose of pre-implementation administrative activities. To receive such funds a potential sponsor must submit a preliminary application whose approval establishes sponsor's non-profit status, the anticipated number of children to be served, and the anticipated date of program implementation.

"(g) Irrespective of the amount of funds allocated under this section, foods available under section 416 of the Agricultural Act of 1949 (7 U.S.C. 1493) or purchased under section 32 of the Act of August 24, 1935 (7 U.S.C. 612c), or section 709 of the Food and Agriculture Act of 1965 (7 U.S.C. 1446a-1), shall be donated by the Secretary to sponsors participating in the child care food program in accordance with the needs as determined by authorities of these institutions for utilization in their feeding programs. The amount of such commodities (or, upon the application of a participating sponsor, cash in lieu of commodities, in such amounts as may be provided in appropriations Acts) donated to each State for each fiscal year shall be, at a minimum, the amount obtained by multiplying the number of lunches and suppers served by participating sponsors during the fiscal year by the rate for commodities and cash in lieu thereof established for that fiscal year in accordance with the provisions of section 6 (e) of this Act: Provided, That where a sponsor receives a flat cost of food service rate, the provisions of this subsection shall apply.

"(h) If in a State the State agency is not permitted by law or is otherwise unable to disburse the funds paid to it under this section to any sponsor in the State, or does not operate the program in accordance with the requirements of this section, the Secretary shall disburse the funds so withheld directly to sponsors in the State for the same purpose and subject to the same conditions as are required of a State agency disbursing funds made available under this section.

"(i)(1) Of the sums allocated for any fiscal year pursuant to the authorization contained in this section, $6,000,000 shall be available to the Secretary for the purposes of providing, during each such fiscal year, non-food assistance to enable sponsors to purchase or repair equipment, other than land and buildings, for the storage, preparation, transportation and serving of food to enable such sponsors to establish, maintain, and expand the child care food program. The Secretary shall apportion among the States during each fiscal year the aforesaid sum of $6,000,000. Provided, that such an apportionment shall be made according to the relative population among the States of the number of children below age 6, from households under 195% of the Secretary's poverty guidelines. The Secretary shall promulgate regulations authorizing the payment of monies pursuant to this subsection directly to the supplier in those instances where a sponsor has met all requirements for approval or licensing except for the food service equipment required by such licensing provision.

"(2) If any State cannot utilize all of the funds apportioned to it under the provisions of this section, the Secretary shall make further apportionments to the remaining States. Payments to any State of funds apportioned under the provisions of this subsection for any fiscal year shall be made upon condition that at least one-fourth of the cost of equipment financed under this section shall be borne by funds from sources within the State, except that such conditions shall not apply with respect to funds used under this section to assist sponsors determined by the State to be especially needy.

"(3) Each State agency shall establish eligibility criteria determining these sponsors which are especially needy for purposes of this section and shall make available those criteria to all sponsors within the State. Such eligibility criteria shall be submitted to the Secretary for approval and included in the State plan of child nutrition operation required by section 11 of this Act.

"(4) Within 30 days of notification by the Secretary to the State agency of the amount of funds available under this subsection, the State agency shall notify sponsors of the availability of such funds. The State agency shall act upon requests for funds under this subsection within 30 days of receipt of a completed request, and shall forward such funds within 30 days of approval.

"(j) State agencies participating in the program under this section shall provide sufficient training, technical assistance and monitoring to facilitate expansion and effective operation of programs under this section, and shall take affirmative action to expand the availability of benefits under this section. Such action, at a minimum, shall include notification to each non-participating licensed or approved sponsor annually within the State of the availability of the program, the requirements for participation and for receipt of food service equipment funds, and the procedures to be followed for application. The Secretary shall assist the States in the development of information and the provision of technical assistance necessary to fulfill the purposes of this section.

"(k) State agencies participating in the child care food program shall include in the State Plan of Child Nutrition Operations required by section 11 of this Act, (A) a listing of (i) the number of licensed, approved or registered day care centers, group homes or family day care homes within the State and the number of those receiving benefits under this section, or (if the State has no licensing or approval standards for day care centers or group and family day care homes), (ii) the number of such centers or homes meeting the Federal Interagency Day Care Requirements and the number of those receiving benefits under this section;

"(B) the number of day care centers or homes within the State receiving funds under Title XX of the Social Security Act and the number of those receiving benefits under this section ;(C) a narrative concerning the schedule of direct outreach, technical assistance and informational work that will be undertaken by State personnel to aid family and group day care homes to obtain sponsors and a narrative concerning the schedule of direct outreach, technical assistance and informational work that will be undertaken by State personnel to encourage day care centers and sponsors to obtain assistance pursuant to this section. Such direct outreach, technical assistance and informational work to be undertaken so that, to the maximum extent practicable, the child care food program reaches needy children in impoverished communities. The State agency shall certify that the names and addresses of day care centers, family day care homes, and sponsors are available for review in the office of the State agency.

"(l) An amount equal to one-half of one percent of program funds, in addition to program funds authorized under this section, shall be available to the Secretary for the purpose of conducting, on a trial basis in six States, pilot or experimental projects designed to: (1) identify the nature of licensing problems within States: (2) test alternative implementation mechanisms for licensure of eligible sponsors and sites; and (3) study the need for additional funds for State licensing purposes.

"(m) The value of assistance to children under this Act shall not be considered to be income or resources for any purpose under any Federal or State laws including, but not limited to, laws relating to taxation, welfare, and public assistance programs. Expenditures of funds from State and local sources for the maintenance of food programs for children shall not be diminished as a result of funds received under this Act.

"(n) The regulations issued by the Secretary to carry out this section shall be issued and become effective not later than 90 days after the date of enactment of this Act."

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be a brief period for the transaction of routine morning business at this time, with statements therein limited to 10 minutes, the period for routine morning business not to exceed beyond 5 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Chirdon, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Presiding Officer laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the appropriate committees.

REPORT ON PROGRESS TOWARD A NEGOTIATED SETTLEMENT ON CYPRUS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM158

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Congress of the United States:

As required by Public Law 94-104, this report describes the progress that has been made during the past sixty days toward a negotiated settlement on Cyprus.

In my last such report to the Congress, submitted on January 20, I outlined the continuing efforts that we and other nations have been making, in both bilateral and international meetings, to promote an early resumption of productive negotiations between the two Cypriot communities. I stressed that resolute action was still required, but still expressed the belief that we were moving in the right direction.

Since that time there have been developments of potential significance for Cyprus. Very shortly after his assumption of office on January 5, Turkish Prime Minister Ecevit publicly announced his intention to deal promptly and decisively with the outstanding foreign policy issues confronting his nation, prime among them being Cyprus. Ecevit acknowledged that a Cyprus settlement would be in Turkey's own best interests. "We want to see a rapid solution in Cyprus," he declared in a January 9 interview, "not because the U.S. or other friendly countries want it, but because it will be for the benefit of all Cyprus and for the benefit of peace in the region." Subsequently, in both public statements and private conversations, Prime Minister Ecevit said that he hoped negotiations between the communities would soon resume, and he declared that the Turkish side would submit concrete proposals on both the constitutional and territorial aspects of the issue.

United Nations Secretary General Waldheim visited Ankara, Athens, and Nicosia between January 8 and 18. The Secretary General was apparently encouraged by his conversations with President Kyprianou, Prime Ministers Ecevit and Caramanlis, and Turkish Cypriot leader Denktash, and afterwards said that it might be possible to reconvene the stalled Cyprus intercommunal talks sometime early in the spring.

My Administration has welcomed Prime Minister Ecevit's declared intention to move forward on the Cyprus issue, and we have expressed our readiness to give full support to the initiatives of the Secretary General. Secretary Vance stopped in Ankara and Athens on January 20–22, following a visit to the Middle East, and held very useful discussions on a number of subjects, including Cyprus. The Secretary returned from these discussions convinced that both the governments of Turkey and Greece earnestly desired to work toward a Cyprus settlement.

The Turkish Cypriots, assisted by the Government of Turkey, are now preparing detailed constitutional and territorial proposals that could serve as a basis for resumed intercommunal negotiations. Our understanding is that these proposals may be completed sometime in March, and that negotiations between the two communities could be resumed by the Secretary General sometime thereafter. Toward that end, the Administration has recently urged the Turkish Cypriot leadership and the government of Turkey to develop proposals that are sufficiently substantive and forthcoming to form a basis for genuine negotiation. We have at the same time encouraged the Government of Cyprus to regard the new Turkish proposals, together with the proposals tabled by President Makarios last year, as a basis for initiating a round of intensive, good-faith negotiations which can lead to a narrowing of differences.

I strongly hope that productive Cyprus negotiations will be reconvened very soon. I am sure that all who wish to see peace, justice, and stability in Cyprus and in the eastern Mediterranean share this hope.

JIMMY CARTER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 23, 1978.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL

A message from the President of the United States stated that on March 21, 1978, he had approved and signed the following act:

PETITIONS

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following petitions, which were referred as indicated:

POM–542. A joint memorial adopted by the Legislature of the State of Idaho; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry:

"SENATE JOINT MEMORIAL NO. 115

"Whereas, gasohol is a fuel mixture of 10 percent anhydros ethanol and 90 percent unleaded gasoline, and is currently in developmental stages; and

"Whereas, tests have shown that this mixture is capable of increasing the octane rating of the original gasoline, increasing the volume, increasing the mileage compared to the original unleaded fuel, and emitting fewer pollutants when in use; and

"Whereas, gasohol is produced through the use of wheat, barely, potatoes, sugar beets, wood and wood by-products, and tests have shown that the process works equally well even when such products are wet, mouldy, distressed or of low grade; and

"Whereas, valuable by-products of the gasohol process include extracts of food protein which may be developed for human consumption; and

"Whereas, gasohol represents a unique opportunity for an agricultural economy such as the State of Idaho to develop a viable alternative to increasing dependence upon foreign oil; and

"Whereas, a federal test program is now under consideration by the Congress of the United States, and it is in the best interests of the citizens of the State of Idaho that the State should be considered for participation in such a program.

"Now, therefore, be it resolved by the members of the Second Regular Session of the Forty-fourth Idaho Legislature, the Senate and the House of Representatives concurring therein, that, acting on behalf of the people of the State of Idaho, we endorse the concept of further development of gasohol, and submit that the State of Idaho should be actively considered in the placement of future pilot gasohol projects. Such a program is ideally designed for a state such as Idaho, and this is an opportunity for the State to assist in development of a product for the benefit of all citizens of this nation.

"Be it further resolved that the Secretary of the Senate be, and she is hereby authorized and directed to forward copies of this Memorial to Robert S. Bergland, Secretary of the Department of Agriculture, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of Congress, and the honorable congressional delegation representing the State of Idaho in the Congress of the United States."

POM–543. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wyoming; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry:

"ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION NO. 4

"Whereas, American family farmers and ranchers have historically been and are today the most efficient food and fiber producers in the world; and

"Whereas, American farmers have lost equity and enormous sums of money in the last four (4) years due to depressed prices for agricultural products; and

"Whereas, more than twenty-five percent (25%) of American farmers will be forced to either liquidate or to refinance in the year 1978; and

"Whereas, as American farmers are forced to liquidate, ownership of agricultural land thereby jeopardizing the future of the American family farm system; and

"Whereas, parity pricing does not mean a guaranteed income but rather a fair price against which all of the risks and costs of food production will still apply; and

"Whereas, the American family farm system faces an economic crisis unprecedented in American history; and

"Whereas, the agricultural community represents less than four percent (4%) of the nation's population and Wyoming is a rural state in whose best interest it is to have a strong, stable agricultural economy; and

"Whereas, the Governor of Wyoming recognizes the economic disaster engulfing agricultural free enterprise.

"Now therefore, be it resolved by the legislature of the State of Wyoming, that this Legislature supports agriculture;

"It is further resolved that all agricultural products produced for national and international use or food reserves be contracted at a level of commodity pricing that will provide American agricultural producers a reasonable opportunity to maintain a viable, economic enterprise;

"It is further resolved that an Agricultural Policy Advisory Committee be created representing a cross-section of American agricultural producers which will participate in the formulation of policies that affect agriculture;

"It is further resolved that a national policy be developed that will discourage the use of imported agricultural products until the price of agricultural products in the United States reaches a level of commodity pricing that will provide American agricultural producers a reasonable opportunity to maintain a viable, economic enterprise and that subsequent imports be limited only to the amount that American producers cannot supply;

"It is further resolved that copies of this resolution be transmitted by the Secretary of State to the President of the United States, to the United States Secretary of Agriculture and to the presiding officers of each House of the Congress of the United States and to each Senator and Representative of the state of Wyoming."

POM–544. A resolution adopted by the City Council of the City of Stow, Ohio, urging Senate approval of a $250,000,000 appropriation from the Federal Highway Trust Fund; to the Committee on Appropriations.

POM–545. A concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Kentucky; to the Committee on Armed Services:

"CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

"Whereas, according to the present military code, medical and dental benefits for retired military personnel and their families are not required but instead permitted, upon request and subject to the availability of space and facilities and the capabilities of the medical and dental staff; and

"Whereas, military personnel are under a false conception concerning medical and dental benefits, after the time of retirement; and

"Whereas, present monetary compensation and promotion are not sufficient incentive to attract adequate medical personnel toward military service;

"Now, therefore, be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, the Senate concurring therein:

"SECTION 1. That the Congress of the United States is hereby respectfully requested to enact legislation which will require and regulate medical and dental benefits for retired military personnel and their families.

"SEC. 2. That champus benefits be raised to cover one hundred percent (100%) of medical and dental expenditures of both active and retired members of military service.

"SEC. 3. That the Congress of the United States deregulate promotions of medical oriented personnel in order to induce voluntary service.

"SEC. 4. That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be and hereby is directed to send a copy of this resolution to each member of the Kentucky Congressional delegation and to the appropriate authorities in the U.S. House of Representatives and Senate."

POM–546. A concurrent memorial adopted by the Legislature of the State of Arizona; to the Committee an Armed Services:

"HOUSE CONCURRENT MEMORIAL 2002

"Whereas, the depressed copper market situation in Arizona has resulted in widespread layoffs in this State, reaching a peak of approximately eight thousand workers in September 1977; and

"Whereas, it is estimated that two thousand to three thousand of these workers will not be recalled at all; and

"Whereas, some three thousand five hundred additional jobs linked to the copper layoffs and delayed mine openings could also be lost; and

"Whereas, the projected loss of personal income in this State resulting from the copper crisis could reach over one hundred million dollars; and

"Whereas, the loss of personal income adversely affects retail trade and tax revenues in this State; and

"Whereas, the closure of mining activities and the layoff of thousands of copper industry employees constitute a serious threat to the local economies of several Arizona communities; and

"Whereas, the degree to which the towns will be able to weather the crisis depends on how quickly the mines recover; and

"Whereas, the mining industry has often been called the workhorse of the Arizona economy; and

"Whereas, Arizona alone supplies over half of the newly mined copper in the United States annually; and

"Whereas, the United States copper industry is facing increasing competition from foreign producers who often operate on government subsidies; and

"Whereas, the demand for copper on the world market has fallen sharply; and

"Whereas, environmental regulations in the United States add significantly to the costs of operating the mines in Arizona. Wherefore your memorialist, the House of Representatives of the State of Arizona, the Senate concurring, prays:

"1. That the President and the Congress of the United States authorize and implement the purchase and stockpiling of sufficient quantities of copper to remedy the current situation.

"2. That the President and the Congress of the United States consider the imposition of an environmental tariff on foreign producers who are not required to meet high pollution control standards and attendant costs.

"3. That the President and the Congress of the United States take all other appropriate and necessary steps to restore economic health to the ailing copper industry.

"4. That the Secretary of State of the State of Arizona transmit copies of this Memorial to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States and to each Member of the Arizona Congressional Delegation."

POM–547. A resolution adopted by the City Council of the City of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, urging funds to the Philadelphia Housing Authority sufficient to bring the Housing Authority projects in Philadelphia up to acceptable housing and living standards; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

POM–548. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Connecticut; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation:

"SENATE RESOLUTION NO. 12

"Whereas, the National Weather Service has proposed closing down the Stratford Weather Station at Sikorsky Airport; and

"Whereas, when the New Haven weather bureau was shut down, despite strong objections from the public, the Service assured community leaders that the Long Island Sound region would be more than adequately served by the Stratford Station; and

"Whereas, it is crucial for navigators on Long Island Sound to be able to rely on accurate weather information, considering that the many sudden changes in New England weather can mean destruction for small boats, and that neither the Bradley Station in Windsor Locks nor the Kennedy Station in New York City can adequately do the job; and

"Whereas, New England weather, including Connecticut's, in a phenomenon unmatched in most regions in the United States, changes drastically within short distances, making it necessary for fuel dealers in making their deliveries to be able to measure degree days in small areas; and

"Whereas, abandoning those who depend upon accurate weather information in the Long Island Sound region is not justified by an annual savings of $173,170.00;

"Now, therefore, be it resolved, that the members of this Senate unite in requesting the Congress of the United States to continue to fund and maintain the Stratford Weather Station at Sikorsky Airport in Stratford, Connecticut.

"Be it further resolved, that the Clerk of the Senate shall cause a copy of this resolution to be sent to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, the President of the United States Senate and to the President of the United States of America."

POM–549. A petition from the Village of Riverside, Illinois, regarding the joint House-Senate negotiations involving the preparation of federal legislation regarding the elimination of gas lights throughout the country; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

POM–550. A concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Indiana; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works:

"HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION NO. 16

"Whereas, the State of Indiana and the Federal Highway Administration entered into three agreements during the early 1960's that public funds would be used to build three toll road interchanges built in connection with the construction of the Interstate Highway System and that the toll road would become a free road when the last toll road bond, in existence of that time, is redeemed; and

"Whereas, The toll road bonds may be redeemed as early as 1984 which would require the toll road to become a part of the Interstate Highway System and a part of the state highway system free of all tolls; and

"Whereas, The cost of bringing the toll road up to federal standards for the Interstate Highway System and the cost of maintaining the 157 miles of toll road will reduce the amount of money available to the Highway Commission to maintain and operate the existing 12,000 miles of state highways; and

"Whereas, Current trust agreements entered into between the Toll Road Commission and the Trustees for the Bondholders make it impossible to construct a significant number of new interchanges needed to provide Indiana highway users with access to the toll road prior to the abandonment of the toll road facility to the state; and

"Whereas, Congress must take action before steps can be taken by the State of Indiana to retain tolls as a means of financing improvements to and maintenance of this 157-mile superhighway which provides the nation with a vital link between Chicago and the eastern seaboard states: Therefore, Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, the Senate concurring:

"SECTION 1. That the United States Congress is memorialized to enact legislation which will permit the Indiana Toll Road to continue to collect a level of tolls adequate to bring the toll road up to current Interstate Highway System standards, to construct additional interchanges to make the highway more useful to the citizens of Indiana, and to maintain the toll road facility in a condition that will properly serve the transportation needs of the nation in moving persons and goods through America's east and west corridors.

SEC. 2. That the Principal Clerk of the House of Representatives is directed to transmit immediately, copies of this resolution to the presiding officers of the Congress of the United States and to the members of Congress elected to serve the citizens of the State of Indiana."

POM-551. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of New York; to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

"LEGISLATIVE RESOLUTION—SENATE No. 95

"Whereas, The New York State Legislature by Chapter 701 of the Laws of 1974 directed the St. Lawrence-Eastern Ontario Commission to analyze the problem of controlling the water levels of Lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence River; and

"Whereas, The St. Lawrence-Eastern Ontario Commission has forwarded to the Legislature a report which contains the following major findings:

"That criteria established by the International Joint Commission in their Orders of Approval dated October twenty-ninth, nineteen hundred fifty-two, as amended, should be reexamined in the light of the passage of time and changes in Great Lakes Basin precipitation rates experienced over the past twenty-five years.

"That lack of implementation of flood plan management techniques has allowed development in areas considered hazardous with or without lake level regulation, and in consequence substantial and widespread losses of developed properties have been experienced.

"That many reparian developments and productive natural resource areas of the New York portion of the Lake Ontario shoreline do not lend themselves to protection by structural measures alone; and

"Whereas, Serious questions have been raised relative to the equity of the current method of implementing the control plan for the Great Lakes Basin System; the representation on the board setting control policy; and the technical soundness of the control plan itself; and

"Whereas, Flood plan management has not been effectively implemented in the past as evidenced by the twenty-five million dollars damage reported on the United States portion of Lake Ontario during the storm of March eighteenth and nineteenth, nineteen hundred seventy-three; and

"Whereas, Of the twenty-five million dollars in damages, approximately nineteen million dollars was reimbursed to riparian interests by the Small Business Administration in the form of nonrepayable loans (public funds); and

"Whereas, Official projections indicate that the water level of Lake Ontario will exceed the highest planned level under plan 1958-d by June of nineteen hundred seventy-eight; and

"Whereas, In the past this level, in concert with storm surges, has produced major damage to the shorelines of Lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence River; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be and hereby is respectfully memorialized to enact legislation and do all of the things necessary to (a) initiate joint efforts between the United States and Canada to determine more satisfactory ways to manage the combined flow of the St. Lawrence and Ottawa Rivers to afford protection to the Lake Ontario-St. Lawrence shoreline; (b) place representation of riparian owners on the International St. Lawrence River Board of Control; (c) provide funds to the International Joint Commission to promote a program of data collection and analysis and to reevaluate plan 1958-d and the criteria underlying it in terms of providing additional flexibilities of the plan's operation in order that damages sustained may be reduced; and (d) initiate studies to evaluate the social costs and benefits of alternatives to structural protection to include but not be limited to:

"(1) purchase of hazardous areas and/or development easements on such areas by governmental agencies; and (2) relocation of existing development to complement the objectives of the existing flood insurance program; and be it further

"Resolved, That suitably engrossed copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the Senate of the United States, to the President Pro Tempore of the Senate of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each Member of the Congress of the United States from the State of New York."

POM-552. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Virginia; to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION No. 78

"Whereas, for over six decades through two world wars and an intense civil war to hold back communism, Greece has been a fighting ally and friend of the United States, and is now an indispensable ally and the symbol of democratic government in Eastern Europe; and

"Whereas, Greece is essential to the security of the United States and the Free World in the Mediterranean area and is essential for the safeguarding of the American Sixth Fleet in the Mediterranean; and

"Whereas, Turkey has attacked, seized and continues to occupy the independent island nation of Cyprus, by illegal use of United States supplied military weapons in violation of the United States Foreign Military Assistance and Sales Acts, and in violation of the Charter of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and in repeated and flagrant violation of four United Nation Resolutions; and

"Whereas, the humanitarian crisis on Cyprus, involving two hundred thousand Cypriot refugees, grows increasingly more desperate, as the prospects for a negotiated settlement dim; and

"Whereas, President Carter has declared that United States foreign policy shall be committed to the protection of human rights; and

"Whereas, the President has proceeded to withdraw United States aid from nations, such as Turkey, which have persisted in violations of human rights; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of Virginia, the House of Delegates concurring, That the General Assembly of Virginia urges the President and the Congress of the United States to exert their best efforts towards a just resolution of the Cyprus conflict, to effectuate a removal of all foreign troops from Cyprus, to restore the two hundred thousand suffering Cypriot refugees to their homes, and to restore to the people of Cyprus the right of self-determination; and, be it

"Resolved further, That the General Assembly of Virginia urges the President and the Congress of the United States to give generous support to the Cypriot refugees, and to continue to support Greece by annual aid authorizations and to continue the embargo on arms to Turkey until such time as Turkey acts to resolve the Cyprus conflict; and, be it.

"Resolved finally, That the Clerk of the Senate is hereby instructed to send copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, to the presiding officer of each House of Congress of the United States and to each Senator and Representative from Virginia in the Congress of the United States that they may be apprised of the sense of this body."

POM-553. A joint memorial adopted by the Legislature of the State of Idaho; to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

"SENATE JOINT MEMORIAL No. 116

We, your Memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Idaho assembled in the Second Regular Session of the Forty-fourth Idaho Legislature, do hereby respectfully represent that:

"Whereas, the Republic of China was a founding member of the United Nations and has always been a law abiding member of the community of nations; and

"Whereas, the people of the Republic of China have built a successful, prosperous, free economy out of the ashes of a half century of revolution, invasion and civil war and now serve as an important trading partner of the American people: and

"Whereas, the Republic of China is of great strategic importance in the defense of east Asia and the Pacific and had always utilized its military power in the interests of the free world; and

"Whereas, the people of the Republic of China have been among the most trusted friends and allies of the people of the United States since the founding of the Chinese Republic in 1912; and

"Whereas, President Jimmy Carter has repeatedly stated that he will pursue an open and just foreign policy, based on morality; and

"Whereas, President Jimmy Carter has also repeatedly stated that he will not compromise the freedom and security of the people of the Republic of China and will stand by the United States commitments to that country.

"Now, therefore, be it resolved by the members of the Second Regular Session of the Forty-fourth Idaho Legislature, the Senate and the House of Representatives concurring therein, that this body strongly endorses the positions of President Jimmy Carter as stated above.

"Be it further resolved that the Government of the United States and the Congress are strongly urged to maintain diplomatic relations and the mutual defense treaty with the Republic of China.

"Be it further resolved that the Secretary of the Senate be, and she is hereby authorized and directed to forward copies of this Memorial to the President of the United States, Jimmy Carter, Secretary of State, Cyrus R. Vance, the Ambassador of the Republic of China to the United States, and to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of Congress, and the honorable congressional delegation representing the State of Idaho in the Congress of the United States."

POM-554. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of New York; to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

"LEGISLATIVE RESOLUTION—SENATE No. 95

"Whereas, The New York State Legislature by Chapter 701 of the Laws of 1974 directed the St. Lawrence-Eastern Ontario Commission to analyze the problem of controlling the water levels of Lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence River; and

"Whereas, The St. Lawrence-Eastern Ontario Commission has forwarded to the Legislature a report which contains the following major findings:

"That criteria established by the International Joint Commission in their Orders of Approval dated October twenty-ninth, nineteen hundred fifty-two, as amended, should be reexamined in the light of the passage of time and changes in Great Lakes Basin precipitation rates experienced over the past twenty-five years.

"That lack of implementation of flood plan management techniques has allowed development in areas considered hazardous with or without lake level regulation, and in consequence substantial and widespread losses of developed properties have been experienced.

"That many riparian developments and productive natural resource areas of the New York portion of the Lake Ontario shoreline do not lend themselves to protection by structural measures alone; and

"Whereas, Serious questions have been raised relative to the equity of the current method of implementing the control plan for the Great Lakes Basin System; the representation on the board setting control policy; and the technical soundness of the control plan itself; and

"Whereas, Flood plan management has not been effectively implemented in the past as evidenced by the twenty-five million dollars damage reported on the United States portion of Lake Ontario during the storm of March eighteenth and nineteenth, nineteen hundred seventy-three; and

"Whereas, Of the twenty-five million dollars in damages, approximately nineteen million dollars was reimbursed to riparian interests by the Small Business Administration in the form of nonrepayable loans (public funds); and

"Whereas, Official projections indicate that the water level of Lake Ontario will exceed the highest planned level under plan 1958–d by June of nineteen hundred seventy-eight; and

"Whereas, In the past this level, in concert with storm surges, has produced major damage to the shorelines of Lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence River; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be and hereby is respectfully memorialized to enact legislation and do all of the things necessary to (a) initiate joint efforts between the United States and Canada to determine more satisfactory ways to manage the combined flow of the St. Lawrence and Ottawa Rivers to afford protection to the Lake Ontario-St. Lawrence shoreline; (b) place representation of riparian owners on the International St. Lawrence River Board of Control; (c) provide funds to the International Joint Commission to promote a program of data collection and analysis and to reevaluate plan 1958–d and the criteria underlying it in terms of providing additional flexibilities of the plan's operation in order that damages sustained may be reduced; and (d) initiate studies to evaluate the social costs and benefits of alternatives to structural protection to include but not be limited to:

"(1) purchase of hazardous areas and/or development easements on such areas by governmental agencies; and (2) relocation of existing development to complement the objectives of the existing flood insurance program; and be it further

"Resolved, That suitably engrossed copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the Senate of the United States, to the President Pro Tempore of the Senate of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each Member of the Congress of the United States from the State of New York."

POM–555. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of New York; to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

"LEGISLATIVE RESOLUTION—SENATE No. 83, ASSEMBLY No. 73

"Whereas, it is the avowed foreign policy of the United States of America to encourage worldwide respect for the human rights of all citizens of the world; and

"Whereas, the Government of the United Kingdom has been found guilty of repeated violations of the human rights of Irish political prisoners in its occupation of northeastern Ireland by the European Commission on Human Rights at Strasbourg; and

"Whereas, the continuing tragic conflict in those six of divide Ulster's nine counties known as "Northern Ireland" poses an undeniable threat to the peace, stability, and security of the North Atlantic community of nations as well as being a continuous source of complaints regarding the violation of basic human rights; and

"Whereas, The Congress and Government of the United States of America, in keeping with the expressed goals of American foreign policy, have a lawful need to be apprised of all facts attendant upon alleged instances of human rights violations; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That this Legislative Body does hereby memorialize the Congress of the United States to hold forthwith formal legislative and investigative hearings on the subject of alleged human rights violations in British-occupied northeastern Ireland; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution, suitably engrossed, be transmitted to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, the President pro tempore of the United States Senate, the Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the Chairman of the House Committee on International Relations, and to the Members of the United States Senate and the House of Representatives from the State of New York."

POM–556. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of New York; to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

"LEGISLATIVE RESOLUTION—SENATE No. 116

"Whereas, President Jimmy Carter during his 1976 campaign for the Presidency uttered scathing attacks against then-President Ford's alleged lack of full support for Israel and vowed that, if elected, he would exert the influence of his office and his personal and full support and effort to the survival and perpetuation of the democratic Government of Israel; and

"Whereas, President Carter, at this point in time, apparently marches to a different drummer as manifested by his recent decision to sell fifty short-range fighters to Egypt and sixty F–15 fighters to Saudi Arabia which decision is an affront, indeed, to the principle that Israel's integrity as a free democratic nation must not be imperiled; and

"Whereas, This paradoxical decision of the President, a chilling one, indeed, bodes no good for the nations of the Middle East, particularly Israel and is an embarrassment which will outrage a large proportion of the people of this State of every political persuasion; and

"Whereas, It is the sense of this Legislative Body that it ought to express its outrage at this decision of President Carter which this Body feels is an expression of the mind of the great majority of the people of this State and urge the President to overrule his judgment in making such an improvident and dangerous decision to arm the avowed and ancient enemies of a friendly nation; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That this Legislative Body memorializes the Congress of the United States to veto the decision of President Carter to sell fifty short-range fighter planes to Egypt and sixty F–15 fighters to Saudi Arabia thereby eliminating the clear and present danger that this decision creates to the sovereign State of Israel; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution, suitably engrossed, be transmitted to the President Pro Tempore of the Senate of the United States; to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States; and to each member of the Congress of the United States from the State of New York."

POM–557. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of New York; to the Select Committee on Indian Affairs:

"LEGISLATIVE RESOLUTION—SENATE No. 78, ASSEMBLY No. 72

"Whereas, The claims of aboriginal title of the Cayuga, Oneida, and St. Regis Mohawk Indians in New York State encompass 300,000 acres of privately owned and public lands in the counties of Seneca, Cayuga, Madison, Oneida, Franklin and Clinton; and

"Whereas, These claims are based on the federal Non-Intercourse Act of 1790, which legislation should not be considered as reasonable or just criteria for the dispossession of land settled and held in title by thousands of New York State residents for almost two centuries; and

"Whereas, the State of New York made agreements and treaties with the Indian nations of New York State after 1790 in good faith, acting according to sovereignty granted under their colonial charters and later according to well-established federal policy of moving the Indians westward; and

"Whereas, During the period 1781–1794, the State of New York issued parcels of what is now disputed land to Revolutionary War soldiers in the form of Land Bounty Rights as payment for service in the Revolutionary War, this land being subsequently settled and in some cases sold by these men and their families in good faith as to their title; and

"Whereas, Throughout the history of New York State the welfare of the Indian nations of New York has been actively and willingly supported through State funds for education, social services, health and other benefits; and

"Whereas, New York State settled the land claims of the Cayuga nation in 1930 by an agreement made by then Governor Franklin D. Roosevelt with the Cayuga nation, whereby the Indians would receive an annual payment of five percent interest on a principal amount of $145,121.66 for the relinquishment of their claims to lands; and

"Whereas, If Indian land claims are left unsettled, serious economic ramifications could result in the counties affected; and

"Whereas, If Indian land claims are left to long-term litigation, there may be a negative impact on residents in the affected areas because of their inability to sell, mortgage, devise and lease real property and the expenses of litigation; and

"Whereas, The relinquishment of title to the Indians of New York State's public land within the claims area would deny New York residents the collective enjoyment of these lands and also may call into question areas designated as forever wild by the State Constitution; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That this Legislative Body hereby memorializes the President and the Congress, of the United States, to provide relief to the private landowners and the people of the State who enjoy the use of public lands of the State; and be it further

"Resolved, That this Legislative Body urges the President and the Congress, of the United States, to act in a speedy manner to develop, draft and effect a legislative settlement of the Indian land claims agreeable to all parties as an alternative to litigation; and be it further Resolved, That copies of this resolution, suitably engrossed, be transmitted to the President of the United States, the President Pro Tempore of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to each member of Congress of the United States from the State of New York."

POM–558. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wyoming; to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION No. 3

"Whereas, on September 25, 1789 the Congress of the United States offered to the states for ratification a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States to require an intervening election of Representatives before any increase in compensation accrues to Senators or Representatives; and

"Whereas, the Congress of the United States, upon proposing that amendment, did not place any time limitation on its final adoption; and

"Whereas, in view of recent pay increases for Congressmen, which were effected without a vote of the Congress and provided immediate benefits; and

"Whereas, in view of recent increases in pension benefits for members of the United States Home of Representatives retiring this year, which was authorized with no debate and no record vote; and

"Whereas, the percentage increase in direct compensation and benefits was at such a high level, as to set a bad example to the general population at a time when there is a prospect of a renewal of double-digit inflation; and

"Whereas, increases in compensation and benefits to most citizens of the United States are far behind these increases to their elected Representatives; and

"Whereas, the states of Delaware, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, Vermont and Virginia have already voted for ratification of this amendment.

"'Joint resolution resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, (Two-thirds of both Houses deeming it necessary), that the following articles be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, when ratified by three-fourths of said Legislatures, to be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the said Constitution.

"'ARTICLE

"'SECTION 1. No law varying the compensation for the services of Senators and Representatives shall take effect until an election of Representatives shall have intervened.'

"Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Wyoming, a majority of all members of the two houses, voting separately, concurring therein:

"SECTION 1. That the above proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America is ratified by the Legislature of the State of Wyoming.

"SEC. 2. That certified copies of this Resolution be forwarded by the Governor of Wyoming to the Administrator of General Services, Washington, D.C., and the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States."

POM–559. A concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Kentucky; to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, the Senate concurring therein:

"SECTION 1. That the Congress of the United States be, and hereby is, requested to call a convention for the sole purpose of proposing the following article as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States:

"ARTICLE

"Section 1. With respect to the right to life, the word person as used in this article and in the Fifth and Fourteenth Articles of Amendment to this Constitution applies to all human beings irrespective of age, health, function, or condition of dependency, including their unborn offspring at every stage of their biological development.

"Section 2. No unborn person shall be deprived of life by any person, provided, however, that nothing in this article shall prohibit a law permitting only those medical procedures required to prevent the death of the mother.

"Section 3. The Congress and the several states shall have the power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

"SECTION 2. That this application by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky constitutes a continuing application, in accordance with Article V of the Constitution of the United States, until at least two-thirds of the legislatures of the several states have made similar applications.

"SECTION 3. That a duly attested copy of this resolution be immediately transmitted by the Clerk of the House of Representatives to the Secretary of the Senate of the United States, the Clerk of the House of Representatives, to each member of Congress from this Commonwealth, and to each house of each state legislature in the United States."

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. STEVENS (for himself and Mr. WALLOP):

S. 27.93. A bill to provide for appellate rewiew of decisions of the High Court of American Samoa; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(The remarks of Mr. STEVENS when he introduced the bill appear earlier in today's proceedings.)

By Mr. HATHAWAY:

S. 2795. A bill to establish a set-aside program for potatoes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

POTATO PRODUCTION REFORM ACT OF 1978

● Mr. HATHAWAY. Mr. President, on March 13, the Department of Agriculture released its Potato Stocks report of levels of potatoes as of March 1.

The Department estimates that the fall producing States have 121.3 million hundredweight of potatoes on hand at this time. That is 6 percent higher than last year at this time; and it is 17 percent higher than in 1976.

Regionally, the eight Eastern States are up 19 percent over a year ago. Maine alone shows up as being about 25 percent over 1977. In the eight Central States, stocks are 44 percent above last year. Only the eight Western States, where stocks are down 3 percent from last year, come in at anywhere near last year's levels at this time.

Assuming these figures are accurate, it is time to consider the establishment of a set-aside program tailored to the needs of potato producers.

It makes good business sense to do this. We provide a system of credit which enables many farmers to buy real estate and obtain production loans. But it also enables farmers, in times of abundance, to find themselves face to face with large debts to service and repay, potato houses full of potatoes, and low prices. In order to break out of this destructive situation, we ought to consider a set-aside for potatoes.

Accordingly, I am introducing today the Potato Production Reform Act of 1978. It is an approach to the problem of too many potatoes and distress prices. And, it is an option which the farmers who raise potatoes ought to have available, just like wheat, soybean, feed grain and cotton producers.

This legislation gives the Secretary the authority for the Department of Agriculture to create a potato set-aside. The Secretary would have the discretion to make payments to farmers contracting with the Secretary to set aside acreage. The bill gives the Secretary broad discretion to determine how much acreage to set aside and how to pay farmers to do so.

The bill requires the Secretary to limit the acreage set aside in a given locality so as to avoid damage to local economies.

Mr. President, we have not had any program of this sort for the potato industry since the early 1950's. I very much hope that the Senate Committee on Agriculture will be able to hold hearings on this measure in the near future.●

By Mr. FORD (for himself and Mr. MAGNUSON):

S. 2796. A bill to amend the Consumer Product Safety Act to extend the authorization of appropriations, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

CONSUMER PRODUCT SAFETY AUTHORIZATION ACT OF 1978

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I am introducing today a bill amending the Consumer Product Safety Act to authorize appropriations for fiscal years 1979, 1980 and 1981. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point:

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Consumer Product Safety Act Authorization Act of 1978".

SEC. 2. Section 32(a) of the Consumer Product Safety Act (15 U.S.C. 2081) is amended by (1) striking out "and" at the end of phrase (3); (2) striking out "1978." and inserting in lieu thereof "1978;"; and (3) inserting the following at the end thereof:

"(5) $55,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979;

"(6) $60,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1980; and

"(7) $65,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1981.".

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, as chairman of the Consumer Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, I held hearings on several occasions during the past year in an attempt to improve the lackluster performance of the CPSC. During its first 5 years, the Commission has been frequently criticized for a lack of leadership, the slow pace of standard development, an inability to set and follow realistic priorities, and a failure to properly utilize limited resources to meet its primary congressional mandate: To reduce the incidents of product related deaths and injuries in the marketplace. Although the Commission has a long way to go, I am confident that recent events justify my belief that the CPSC is on the verge of making real progress toward fulfilling the high expectations of Congress, consumers and manufacturers that led to the creation of this agency.

Several months ago, President Carter submitted the names of three highly qualified individuals, R. David Pittle, Susan Bennett King, and Edith Barksdale Sloan, to serve as members of the Commission. The Consumer Subcommittee carefully scrutinized the qualifications of these individuals before recommending that each be confirmed. In addition, with the announced resignation of S. John Byington on June 30, 1978, the President will have an opportunity to designate a new chairman.

The Consumer Subcommittee will hold reauthorization hearings on the Consumer Product Safety Act on April 4, 5, and 6 of this year. In the course of those hearings, I hope that consumer groups, voluntary standard organizations, trade associations, and individual manufacturers will provide us with a wide range of suggestions on how we might further improve the Commission's future performance. Two specific areas that I hope to discuss in the course of those hearings are the following:

First. Standard development: The Commission has been frequently criticized for developing only three mandatory product safety standards utilizing its section 7 "offeror" process. The most recent example of how this provision has unduly burdened the Commission's ability to develop standards expeditiously is in the area of cellulose insulation. I believe the Commission must have greater flexibility to develop its own mandatory standards when the public interest would be served. At the same time, due care must be given to providing a high level of public participation in the development of those standards. Additionally, I believe that section 7(c) of the Consumer Product Safety Act may have served as an impediment to the Commission's promulgation of existing voluntary standards. I will welcome suggestions from our witnesses on how we might provide the Commission greater flexibility in this area as well.

Second. Chronic hazards: Because the Federal Government's involvement in the area of chronic hazards cuts across the jurisdictions of numerous Federal agencies, I believe a clear understanding is needed concerning the part CPSC is to play in protecting the American public from those long range health and safety hazards that exist in the marketplace. Because the CPSC is a relatively small regulatory body, I believe it is appropriate for us to discuss at this time what the Commission's future role should be in the area of chronic hazards.

Mr. President, as my colleagues are well aware, congressional oversight of Federal regulatory agencies can be a time consuming and often frustrating experience. As chairman of the Consumer Subcommittee, I have frequently criticized the Commission's performance during the past year. Because the CPSC is the only Federal agency charged with the responsibility of helping American consumers protect themselves from those product hazards encountered in the home environment, I believe it is essential that vigorous oversight continue. The Consumer Product Safety Commission is no longer a new agency. The next several years will be crucial to the direction and future of the Federal Government's involvement in monitoring the safety of consumer products, and in providing a forum where manufacturers and consumers can work together toward a common objective. In the upcoming months I will continue to carefully monitor the performance of the Commission in meeting its congressional mandate. I look forward to advising my colleagues on the results of our upcoming reauthorization hearings.

By Mr. BROOKE:

URBAN AGENDA FOR 1978

● Mr. BROOKE. Mr. President, for the past year, the Carter administration has been promising to develop an urban policy—a comprehensive framework for dealing with the complex problems of our financially distressed cities and people in need. I welcome the administration's effort because I believe that it will focus the Nation's attention on our most urgent urban needs. But we must recall that March 15 was the date originally scheduled for a major Presidential announcement on urban policy. And highlights of this plan were supposed to be included in the President's State of the Union message to Congress on January 19, 1978.

Sadly, both of these deadlines were not met by the Carter administration. And I do not believe that the President's urban and regional policy group realized the magnitude of their task or the diversity of views within the administration when the six Cabinet departments began to meet to develop an urban policy last March.

The administration has not yet indicated whether it intends to propose additional funding—for programs in housing, community development, or mass transit—as part of its urban policy. And frankly, I think, that posed a serious problem for our authorizing committees as they met last week to make recommendations to the Budget Committee on the first concurrent budget resolution. It was unfortunate that we made those recommendations without the benefits of the administration's views.

But we could not afford to wait for the President to develop and articulate his urban strategy. We must deal with the immediate and urgent needs of our distressed cities and poor people in this year's budget. And as I said at housing authorization and urban mass transit hearings before the Banking Committee earlier this year, the administration's fiscal year 1979 budget in these areas is woefuly inadequate to meet those national needs.

For that reason, on March 15 at a Banking Committee meeting to discuss recommendations to the Budget Committee I proposed an "Urban Agenda for 1978"—a series of achieveable legislative proposals which should be passed before this Congress adjourns in the fall. And I succeeded in including authorization levels sufficient to fund these programs in the Banking Committee's letter to the Budget Committee.

At that time, I briefly outlined those proposals which I intend to offer in the Banking Committee this year to provide remedies to the problems which affect our cities and people in need.

Mr. President, these recommendations are not intended as a substitute for an urban policy. They are a series of actions which will use largely tested mechanisms and programs to deal with our urban problems.

There are seven elements of my urban agenda:

First. Sufficient contract authority and budget authority for 500,000 units of HUD-assisted housing for low and moderate income families and elderly—100,000 more new and substantially rehabilitated units than proposed by the administration.

Second. A $5 billion standby authorization of GNMA tandem or so-called "Brooke-Cranston" authority which provides for 7½ percent interest rate mortgages to encourage housing construction.

Third. A twenty percent tax credit for contributions to an Individual Housing Account—a new savings account for first-time homebuyers to accumulate equity for the downpayment on a home. The Individual Housing Account portion of my Young Families Housing Act. (S. 2050) is currently before the Finance Committee. And I regard the individual housing account as an integral part of a strategy to assist our young families in purchasing a home.

Fourth. Adequate funding for management and maintenance of existing public housing stock, including an authorization of $800 million for public housing operating subsidies, $50 million for public housing modernization, and $10 million for security programs in public housing projects.

Fifth. A comprehensive program to assist financially trouble FHA-insured multifamily housing projects, including operating subsidies, rent supplement assistance for very low income tenants, criteria for selection of managers and owners of projects. and specific options for disposition of HUD-owned properties such as sales at reduced price to nonprofit cooperatives.

Sixth. A homeownership rehabilitation program to assist existing homeowners to make repairs and modest rehabilitation of their homes. Lower income homeowners would be given section 8 assistance payments to cover the cost of rehabilitation loans if their total housing costs exceed 25 percent of income.

Seventh. An expense-based operating assistance program for urban mass transit which would assist our older, mass transit dependent cities and our newer cities which are developing new mass transit systems. This proposal was introduced as S. 2574 on February 23, 1978. A $1.3 billion authorization is proposed for operating assistance and a $2.5 billion authorization is proposed for new capital commitments to mass transit.

I am introducing today three bills and amendments to S. 2637 which will implement the first, second, fourth, fifth and sixth elements of the urban agenda.

I am proposing amendments to S. 2637 to provide increased authorizations for basic housing programs:

First, sufficient funding is provided for 500,000 units of HUD-assisted housing for low- and moderate-income families and the elderly.

This represents an additional 100,000 new and substantially rehabilitated housing units over the 400,000 level in the HUD budget. The HUD budget would do little more than to maintain the assisted housing program at present levels. I believe that this is not adequate to meet the critical housing needs of our low-income people. As the AFL–CIO recognized in its executive council meeting last month, "low-income households, which cannot afford decent housing under current market conditions, are suffering the most." I need not repeat the statistics from HUD's latest annual housing survey or the recent study by the Harvard-MIT Joint Center on the Nation's Housing. We should all be well aware of the substantial unmet need and demand for housing, the low vacancy rate nationwide in rental units, and the number of units lacking in plumbing facilities or overcrowded. There is an urgent need to support the construction of more than the 180,000 new and substantially rehabilitated rental units provided for in the fiscal year 1979 HUD budget. And I believe that HUD has the capability of producing these units because HUD itself recommended a 600,000 unit level in its budget request to OMB earlier this year.

Second, a $5 billion standby authorization of GNMA tandem or so-called "Brooke-Cranston" authority is provided to encourage new housing construction. This would provide for 7½ percent mortgages for FHA-insured mortgages as authorized by the Emergency Home Purchase Assistance Act.

This year, HUD began to realize the importance of GNMA tandem funds to the development of privately constructed section 8 housing. And HUD has proposed the use of additional $1.5 billion in GNMA authority for section 8 projects in fiscal year 1979. As a countercyclical tool, I believe that additional funds should be authorized for unsubsidized and middle income multifamily construction if needed. Some observers of our mortgage credit markets believe that the indicators of a tightening credit market are already apparent and that there is a need for additional mortgage financing at interest rates which make projects feasible.

The vacancy rate in rental housing has continued to drop to about 5 percent in 1977, while interest rates for new multifamily construction have continued to rise. New inflow of funds into thrift institutions has been about one-half the levels of 1 year ago. And if these trends continue, there is likely to be less money available for mortgage financing and increased upward pressure on interst rates. The Brooke-Cranston program has been a highly effective countercyclical mechanism in the past few years. I believe that we should assure that these funds are available as they are needed in order to maintain a reasonable level of housing construction activity.

Third, an $800 million authorization is provided for operating subsidies for public housing projects. This level of funding should provide asequate allocations under the performance funding system—PFS—and would allow for a special fund to meet needs not provided for in the PFS. These include security, liability insurance, tenant services and deferred maintenance.

As in past years, HUD has not requested sufficient funding for operating subsidies for local housing authorities in fiscal year 1979. This provision would increase those subsidies to an adequate level so that our financially pressed housing authorities and tenants may be assured of funds for essential housing services. This funding represents a prudent investment in management and maintenance of our existing public housing stock and will protect the $19 billion Federal Capital investment in public housing units which provide shelter to almost 2 million people.

Fourth, a $50 million authorization is provided for modernization of public housing projects. The public housing modernization program must also be be viewed as an essential component of our national effort to maintain and upgrade existing public housing. Modernization is a sensible investment of funds which seeks to finance capital improvements in order to improve living conditions and achieve operating efficiency in public housing projects. These funds will also be used in fiscal year 1979 for energy conservation and to provide accessibility for the handicapped in public housing. Incredibly, with a substantial backlog of unfunded modernization needs and two new major functions of the program, HUD requested a decrease in funding in its fiscal year 1979 budget. My bill would provide a $7.5 million increase over funding for modernization in fiscal year 1978. It would continue our effort to meet the substantial backlog in unfunded modernization needs and meet newer needs in energy conservation and accessibility for the handicapped in public housing.

The second element of the urban agenda is a bill to provide a comprehensive program to assist tenants and owners of FHA-insured multifamily housing projects. The principle of preservation of existing housing must extend to the stock of multifamily subsidized housing built under the section 221(d)(3) and section 236 programs. On a national basis, there are some 1,400 multifamily subsidized projects which are now in financial difficulty. At least 150,000 families live in these troubled projects, which are located in nearly every State but are concentrated in the central city neighborhoods of Boston, Chicago, Newark, New York, Washington, D.C., Detroit, San Francisco, Cincinnati, and Los Angeles.

These projects are in various stages of financial distress, but over 200 projects are currently owned by HUD and 950 projects are in the process of foreclosure. A HUD study has concluded that if present trends continue, the HUD inventory of troubled projects could reach more than 3,000 projects by 1982. And HUD could be the owner of about 1,300 of these projects, with about 150,000 units.

It has become clear that some action must be taken this year to protect the interests of the low- and moderate-income families living in troubled multifamily housing and to insure that these housing developments become financially viable as decent housing at rents which the tenants can afford. Part of the problem has been that tenant incomes have not kept pace with increasing costs of operating these projects. But an equally important problem has been the shockingly inadequate management of HUD-owned properties and poor on-site management in many other projects.

In addition, HUD has proposed no legislation which will deal with the serious management and maintenance problems in HUD-owned properties. Surprisingly, no new proposals have been offered by HUD regarding disposition of HUD-owned properties and section 8 appears to be HUD's primary tool for disposition.

This bill provides for additional relief to owners and tenants in these financially troubled projects, including an operating subsidy based upon increases in taxes, utilities, and fuel as well as rent supplement assistance for very low income tenant. It provides a mechanism to insure fiscal responsibility in the management of these projects and to protect the interests of tenants living in these projects. It also provides criteria for selection of managers and owners of these projects and requirements for management and maintenance of HUD-owned projects.

A variety of options are proposed for disposition of HUD-owned projects including sale at reduced prices to nonprofit cooperatives and other nonprofit organizations, and continued HUD ownership with the possibility of eventual ownership by a nonprofit cooperative. I believe that our national investment in subsidized housing is too substantial and the need for decent housing for lower-income families is too great for HUD and the Congress to allow this urgent problem to continue unchecked.

The third proposal I am introducing today is "The Public Housing Security Demonstration Act of 1978," a bill to authorize the Secretary of HUD to implement a national public housing security demonstration program using innovative security methods, concepts and techniques to mitigate the crime and vandalism in public housing projects. In selecting proposals for funding, the Secretary would be required to give priority to proposals submitted by public housing authorities which provide for the restoration of abondoned dwelling units, for coordination between public housing management and local government entities in providing increased security and social services to the projects and tenants, and for maximum involvement of tenants in the program.

While these proposals would be tailored to the particular needs of the projects, it is anticipated that they would include protective hardware security devices and structural modifications related to security, as well as "software" items such as security patrols, tenant awareness programs, management improvements, and social services.

The demonstration program would be the first step toward the development of a comprehensive plan for reducing crime and vandalism in federally assisted housing. My bill would direct the Secretary to conduct a survey of crime in public housing and require a report by HUD on the results of the survey within 18 months. The report would evaluate the levels of crime and vandalism in public housing and make preliminary findings of various methods of reducing the level of crime based upon the demonstration program to be conducted during fiscal year 1979.

The Secretary would also make recommendations, if appropriate, for a comprehensive program to upgrade physical security and reduce the level of crime in all public housing projects and the estimated costs of such a nationwide program.

Mr. President, I fear that unless residential security is provided as an essential component of public housing operation, the trend of abandonment and fear on the part of residents will eventually lead to a reduction in the available public housing stock at a time when the demand for public housing is increasing. We can ill afford to let this enormous resource be lost because we just cannot build enough comparable decent, safe, and sanitary dwellings to replace units which are abandoned. What is needed is a strategy to salvage existing housing and insure a secure environment for elderly and low income families. And a responsible security program may well lead to the preservation of an entire neighborhood. I believe that this bill will allow our local housing authorities and tenants to initiate the vigorous action needed to attack the problem of crime in public housing.

The final bill I am introducing today is the "Homeowners Rehabilitation Assistance Act of 1978" which will help lower-income homeowners afford and finance the rehabilitation of their homes in locally designated rehabilitation neighborhoods.

A major resource of our Nation's cities that has generally been neglected in Federal aid efforts is the stock of homes owned by millions of low and moderate income city residents. Key elements in any strategy to preserve neighborhoods must be maintaining and upgrading the private homes that are the principal capital resource of city neighborhoods.

Homeowners are the majority of residents in most cities and yet current housing subsidy programs are directed almost exclusively toward helping renters. Renters are generally more in need of Federal housing assistance, but we must recognize that nearly half of the low and moderate income households were homeowners in 1976. Close to 9 million lower-income homeowners live in metropolitan areas and nearly half have excessive housing costs that exceed 25 percent of their incomes. They need resources and access to loan funds to help them maintain their homes and thus exercise their pride of ownership and direct personal interest in upgrading their living environment. In 1976, 4.5 million poorer city homeowners were elderly and living on relatively fixed incomes. They cannot afford to prevent the inevitable decline in the quality of their homes. I think it is entirely appropriate to provide an incentive for poorer homeowners to maintain private investment in city homes.

My proposal will help city homeowners upgrade and improve their homes if their housing costs are too high or their incomes too low to afford the additional investment in their own homes. The homeowners rehabilitation assistance program will directly stimulate improvements in housing quality, encourage private lenders to assist in inner city revitalization, and build on administrative procedures and standards in the current section 8 housing programs while avoiding the displacement or relocation of residents that has usually accompanied Federal urban housing construction programs and has been so destructive of many city neighborhoods.

This new program will assist lower-income homeowners to fix up their homes through private rehabilitation loans, but will not require extensive new procedures or administrative personnel that have proven to substantially hinder implementation of new housing programs in the past. The funding procedures, eligibility and assistance criteria, and administrative practices under the section 8 housing programs would be adapted to incorporate homeowner rehabilitation assistance.

In section 2 of the bill, I propose that HUD allocate $30 million contract authority for fiscal year 1979 to help approximately 30,000 homeowners rehabilitate their homes. Section 3 incorporates this program in housing assistance plan requirements so that localities would assess the need for homeowner rehabilitation assistance, establish priorities between assisting homeowners and renters, and designate rehabilitation neighborhoods. In future fiscal years, HUD would then allocate funds for this program according to these local priorities from the appropriations for the section 8 existing housing programs.

This program is established and incorporated with the section 8 housing programs by sections 4 and 5 of the bill. With the allocated contract authority, local housing authorities would make payments to private lenders to cover the costs of rehabilitation loans to lower-income homeowners, to the extent their housing costs exceed 25 percent of income. Local housing authorities would screen applicants from designated rehabilitation neighborhoods under section 8 income and asset eligibility criteria, determine the extent of home improvements needed to meet section 8 housing quality standards, and assist the homeowner in getting a rehabilitation loan from local lenders. Savings and loan associations and other private lenders would be encouraged to make these loans because local housing authorities would handle the initial screening of applicants and would directly make repayments for groups of loans out of the cities' annual Federal housing assistance commitment. FHA home improvement loan standards on loan size, interest rates, and repayment period would apply to these loans. The homeowner could provide some of the labor required with the loan paying for materials. The lender and city code inspections would insure that the work is done properly. During the loan repayment period the local housing authority would review assistance eligibility and payment requirements under the existing criteria of the section 8 program. Rather than making payments to landlords as in the renter assistance program, the housing authority would pay the rehabilitation lender the allowable housing assistance grant.

Mr. President, I believe that the legislation which I am introducing today along with S. 2050 and S. 2574 which I introduced previously provides realistic and achievable goals. And this program can be acted upon before the Congress adjourns. I urge my colleagues to join with me in working for enactment of these proposals. Clearly the burden is on the Congress to provide leadership in the development of urban initiatives this year. That is our responsibility and I believe that we shall be equal to the challenge.●

By Mr. BUMPERS:

S. 2801. A bill to designate the building known as the Ozark National Forest Headquarters Building in Russellville, Ark., as the "Henry R. Koen Forest Service Building"; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

HENRY R. KOEN FOREST SERVICE BUILDING

● Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, today I introduce a bill to designate the building known as the Ozark National Forest Headquarters Building in Russellville, Ark., as the "Henry R. Koen Forest Service Building."

The mayor of Russellville, the Honorable M. J. Hickey, and a number of citizens of that city have endorsed the resolution of the board of directors of the Russellville Chamber of Commerce to name the building after the late Mr. Koen. His whole life was dedicated to conservation and development of our renewable resources in the area of forestry.

Henry R. Koen is known as the father of forestry in the Arkansas Ozarks. Through his broad experience, sound judgment, and wide contacts, Mr. Koen was able to play a leading and constructive part in the development of a forest consciousness in his native State of Arkansas at a time when it was most needed.

Born at Bellefonte, Ark., in the heart of the Ozarks, the son of Thomas S. Koen and Tennessee Breece Koen, his active career in conservation spanned four critical decades, from 1913 to 1943. Subsequent to his retirement from the Forest Service in 1943, he still maintained an active interest in conservation. He served as Boone County representative for the 1952–53 session of the Arkansas State Legislature.

He began his Forest Service career in 1913 as forest ranger of the Sylamore district, Ozark National Forest, Stone County, Ark. Except for brief periods during which time he worked on national forests, in North Carolina, Virginia, and Georgia, Mr. Koen's entire service was in Arkansas.

He became supervisor of the Ozark

National Forest in 1922 and remained in that position until 1939 when he transferred to the regional office of the Forest Service in Atlanta, Ga.

The challenges facing him as supervisor of the Ozark National Forest in 1922 were many and difficult to imagine from today's viewpoint. After repeated failures to protect the area from fire prior to 1922, he launched a successful program in 1925, including a system of towers, telephones and personnel. During his tenure, hundreds of thousands of acres were added to the forest under the Weeks Law purchase program. He directed the planting of millions of trees on abandoned farmlands in Government ownership.

The popular and productive CCC program during his administration resulted in hundreds of miles of badly needed roads and the beautiful campgrounds—such as Spring Lake, Gunner Pool, and Shores Lake—which are still heavily used today. The Ozark National Forest supervisor's office in Russellville was also completed during this period. This beautiful and functional building is recognized widely as one of Russellville's outstanding landmarks.

He was so well respected and admired, that in 1950, the Henry R. Koen Experimental Forest was named in his honor. The decision to name the experimental forest after a living man was made in view of the outstanding service to the cause of forestry which Mr. Koen had rendered in the public interest over a period of nearly 40 years.

Mr. Koen was on the board of directors of Keep Arkansas Green since it was organized. He was instrumental in the establishment of the Arkansas Forestry Commission. He was a member of the Arkansas Resources and Development Commission and served as chairman of the Ozark section of the society of American Foresters.

Conservation was no easy task during the early part of the century. Much of the land which is now Ozark National Forest had been cut over for timber or cleared for homesteading. Forest fires were common, burning thousands of acres each year. As in the rest of the Nation, most people were not concerned about conservation of what they believed to be an inexhaustible supply of wood. Forests were an obstacle in the way of settlement. Federal forestry officials and their ideas of conservation were not readily accepted. Henry R. Koen indeed faced a difficult task and handled it extremely well.

To honor Mr. Koen, as proposed by the mayor of Russellville, the citizens of Russellville and the Russellville Chamber of Commerce, will do much to encourage others to continue innovative and sound principles of conservation and development of our forests.

Mr. Koen contributed more than any other dedicated forestry official to the successful establishment of the Ozark National Forest as it is known today. He spent many hours in acquiring the property and designing and obtaining the approval for the construction of the headquarters building, and I join with the citizens of Russellville in stating that there can be no more deserving recognition than to give this building his name.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill I am now introducing be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the building in Russellville, Arkansas, commonly known as the Ozark National Forest Headquarters Building, shall hereafter be known and designated as the "Henry R. Koen Forest Service Building." Any reference in a law, map, regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States to that building shall be held to be a reference to the "Henry R. Koen Forest Service Building".●

By Mr. DOMENICI:

S. 2804. A bill to expand the licensing and related regulatory authority of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission for certain specified activities, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

RADIOACTIVE WASTE MANAGEMENT REGULATORY REFORM ACT OF 1978

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, as a member of both the Energy and Natural Resources Committee and the Nuclear Regulation Subcommittee of the Environment and Public Works Committee, I am keenly aware of the pressing need for this Nation to get on with finding and implementing a satisfactory permanent solution to our nuclear waste problem. The steadily increasing accumulation of these radioactive byproduct materials is a necessary consequence of the benefits of additional electrical power and enhanced national security accompanying the widespread domestic ultilization of atomic energy. However, the quantities of these materials amassed over the years, coupled with an inadequate system of regulatory oversight, is severely straining our existing temporary, and often make shift, methods of containment.

Yesterday the Nuclear Regulation Subcommittee began a series of hearings on the national program for storage of nuclear waste materials and spent fuel from nuclear power reactors. Testimony presented to the subcommittee by representatives of the Department of Energy, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, and the Environmental Protection Agency confirmed the existence of substantial gaps and uncertainties in regulatory oversight authority regarding storage of these materials. These gaps and uncertainties exist for both present and proposed storage procedures.

As an example, there is considerable disagreement as to whether the NRC has clear licensing authority over facilities for either away-from-reactor or permanent storage of spent reactor fuel. In view of current national policy banning commercial reprocessing, it is essential that the NRC be given licensing authority in this area.

The bill I am introducing today will significantly improve the existing regulatory framework for long- and short-term storage of radioactive materials by considerably expanding the licensing authority of the NRC. Specifically, this bill makes the following changes to the existing statutory basis for NRC authority in this area.

The bill would give the Nuclear Regulatory Commission broad new authority and would eliminate uncertainties in its existing authority for licensing and regulating the growing nuclear waste management activities of the Department of Energy. At the same time, the bill is carefully drawn to avoid undue disruption of certain essential activities at existing Federal installations which are part of the Nation's research and development and defense programs.

Subject only to this limitation, the bill would insure that the Nuclear Regulatory Commission has the authority it needs to fully regulate both the short-term storage and the ultimate disposal of high level radioactive wastes, which must be carefully isolated from the environment for centuries, and of the potentially hazardous transuranic and low level wastes. In addition, the bill would remove any uncertainty regarding the Commission's authority to license any facility for either the short-term storage or the permanent disposal of spent fuel from our nuclear powerplants or from foreign reactors. In all cases, the activities covered by the bill would be subject to the full range of applicable Commission regulation, including licensing proceedings, public hearings with the opportunity for State and public participation, and continued NRC supervision and inspection.

The bill also provides for the first time a statutory standard for identifying those nuclear waste disposal activities of the Department of Energy which are of a permanent rather than a short-term nature.

Finally, the bill would require that the Nuclear Regulatory Commission exercise its licensing responsibility for commercial low level waste burial grounds. At present, this responsibility is delegated to 25 agreement States, 5 of which have licensed waste burial grounds. Mandatory NRC licensing of these and any new waste burial grounds would insure that all such facilities will meet a set of uniform national standards, and that they will be subject to full NRC inspection and enforcement and other regulatory activities.

Mr. President, this legislation is closely related to a bill, S. 2761, which I introduced last Friday. Indeed I would hope that these two companion bills, which taken together establish a comprehensive basis for nuclear waste management including full participation by the affected States, might receive simultaneous consideration by my Senate colleagues.

As submitted, S. 2761 would require State concurrence before any nuclear waste or spent fuel storage facility licensable by the NRC could be located within that State's boundaries. It is readily apparent that the significance of the State veto provision contained in S. 2761 would be considerably enhanced by an expansion of the authority of the NRC to license such facilities. This will be accomplished by the legislation I am introducing today.

Let me cite but one example where these two bills work together to provide necessary, expanded protection for the health and safety of our citizens. Under present DOE policy, the primary purpose of the waste isolation pilot plant (WIPP), proposed for construction in the early 1980's in southeastern New Mexico, will be storage of transuranic nuclear wastes from the national defense program. Under current law the DOE is required neither to seek a license from the NRC for WIPP, nor heed the wishes of New Mexicans regarding the desirability of locating that facility within the boundaries of my State. Taken together these two bills will insure that the the proposed WIPP facility will not be constructed without the concurrence of New Mexicans, and, if constructed, will meet the exacting standards now under development by the NRC.

Mr. President, I would also like to make special note of the effect of these two bills on licensing procedures for shallow land burial of low-level commercial waste. Together they make it clear that any State faced with a proposal for construction of such a facility within its boundaries would be able to exercise a determining role in the granting of an NRC license. Under current law, only the agreement States, such as my own, would be able to deny such a license application, and then only under very constrained conditions.

I would hope that my Senate colleagues will give their careful consideration and support to passage of these two important pieces of legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill I am introducing today be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2804

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Radioactive Waste Management Regulatory Reform Act of 1978."

SEC. 2. The purposes of this Act are:

(a) to expand the Nuclear Regulatory Commission's licensing and related regulatory authority for long- and short-term storage and disposal operations, including research, development, and demonstration operations, for high-level radiocative wastes, irradiated nuclear reactor fuel, nonhigh-level transuranium contaminated wastes, or low-level radioactive wastes; and

(b) notwithstanding the provisions of section 274 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, to require that the Nuclear Regulatory Commission retain its authority and responsibility with respect to the regulation of long-term storage and disposal of low-level radioactive wastes.

SEC. 3. Section 202 of the Energy Reorganization Act of 1974, as amended, is amended by striking subsections (3) and (4) and adding the following new subsections:

"(3) Long and short term storage and disposal operations, including research, development and demonstration operations, for high level radioactive wastes from any source, except for short term storage operations at existing Federal installations for high level radioactive wastes generated by activities under the national research and development and defense programs.

"(4) Long and short term storage and disposal operations, including research, development and demonstration operations, for non-high level transuranium contaminated wastes from any source, except for short term storage operations and existing long term storage and disposal operations at existing Federal installations for non-high level transuranium contaminated wastes generated by activities under the national research and development and defense programs.

"(5) Long and short term storage and disposal operations, including research, development and demonstration operations, for low level radioactive wastes from any source, except for long and short term storage and disposal operations at existing Federal installations for low level radioactive wastes generated by activities under the national research and development and defense programs.

"(6) Long and short term storage and disposal operations, including research, development and demonstration operations, for irradiated nuclear reactor fuel from any source, except for short term storage operations at existing Federal installations for irradiated nuclear reactor fuel generated by activities under the national research and development and defense programs.".

SEC. 4. Section 304 of the Energy Reorganization Act of 1974, as amended, is amended by adding the following new subsection:

"(3) Short term storage operations are all radioactive waste storage operations for which retrieval is intended not later than 20 years after the date of emplacement of the radioactive wastes in the storage facility. Long term storage and disposal operations are all other radioactive waste storage and disposal operations.".

SEC. 5. Section 274.c of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, is amended by striking subparagraph (4) and adding the following new subparagraph:

"(4) disposal operations for other byproduct, source, or special nuclear material for which retrieval of the material is not intended within 20 years of the initial disposal; Provided, however, That any license issued by a State for such disposal operations in accordance with this section on or before the date of enactment of this subparagraph shall remain in effect for a period of three years from that date.".●

By Mr. DOMENICI (for himself and Mr. CHILES):

S. 2805. A bill to amend the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act of 1973 to provide improved employment and training services, to extend the authorization, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Human Resources.

COMPREHENSIVE EMPLOYMENT AND TRAINING AMENDMENTS OF 1978

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with our distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from Florida (Mr. CHILES), in introducing legislation which will completely overhaul the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act of 1973. Our proposal actually constitutes a package of two separate bills which together will attack the most difficult forms of structural unemployment which have, to date, resisted lesser remedies. The first measure is the Comprehensive Employment and Training Amendments of 1978. The second proposal, which is being introduced simultaneously, will establish a voucher wage subsidy designed to open employment opportunities in the private sector for economically disadvantaged youth. I will discuss this latter proposal in greater detail in remarks accompanying its introduction.

One of the most significant innovations in S. 2805 is the emphasis it places on the indispensable role of the private sector in combating structural unemployment. We will require each local prime sponsor to establish a private business advisory committee which will provide a valuable bridge between governmental programs and the private business community. This increased emphasis on the private sector's participation extends across the board to all of the services and programs authorized under this act.

We have also redesigned the bill so that the CETA programs will, in the future, be mission-oriented. This has been achieved, however, without in any way reducing the local priority-setting authority which has been such a valuable part of the CETA program since its inception.

In the past, the CETA program has been used, to a large degree, as a counter-cyclical device capable of offsetting adverse trends in our national economy. We will retain that concept and create a title specifically oriented to moderating fluctations in the business cycle.

I believe, Mr. President, that the most important new element in the Chiles-Domenici proposal is the major new emphosis we are placing in efforts to combat structural unemployment. In too many instances, the existing CETA program has focused its primary efforts on the most employable of the unemployed. While this is a worthy objective, it has left largely intact the pool of truly hardcore unemployed Americans who have yet to be effectively reached by Federal training and employment programs. To maximize the impact of our efforts, we are proposing a broad-based comprehensive thrust which will combat structural unemployment in all age groups.

Part A of title II draws together a number of programs previously authorized in various CETA titles in an effort to mount a truly effective campaign against youth unemployment. Part B will focus attention on the adult displaced worker ranging in age from 22 to 54. This program would be especially helpful to workers with outdated skills and those who live in economically declining areas. The emphasis of this program will be second career development and training designed to enable these workers to reenter the labor force with new and updated skills. Part C provides a new CETA initiative aimed at older workers, 55 years of age or older. Unlike the current title IX programs, authorized under the Older Americans Act, this proposal will seek to place the older workers in meaningful jobs within the private sector of our Nation's economy. Emphasis will be placed on innovative techniques to achieve this objective such as flextime, job sharing, part-time employment, and so forth.

Mr. President, I believe the best way to summarize S. 2805 is to focus attention on several of the key issues addressed in my bill.

STRUCTURAL VERSUS COUNTER-CYCLICAL UNEMPLOYMENT

It is generally agreed by economists that a substantial proportion of this Nation's unemployment is structural in nature. CETA is an appropriate mechanism for a targeted focus on the structurally unemployed. However, we must clearly differentiate between remedies in CETA that are appropriate for the cyclically unemployed and those that are suitable for the structurally unemployed. A public service employment job with no training or other services is suitable for the skilled individual who is out of work due only to temporary economic conditions. This same remedy is totally inappropriate for a structurally unemployed individual who lacks labor force skills and behavior and is thus unsuited for available employment opportunities in the labor market.

For this reason, Senator CHILES and I have brought together various structural remedies into title II of our bill. The administration's bill puts 725,000 job slots in a cyclical title with no training or service. Our bill recognizes that much of today's unemployment is structural in nature by transferring a substantial amount of funds from the temporary employment program into our structural title, where a range of coordinated services are available.

LOCAL FLEXIBILITY

In a nation that is as large and diverse as the United States, one quickly becomes aware that different strategies for combating unemployment must be used in different areas of the country. The unemployment situation in New York is much different from the one in New Mexico. We are therefore proposing the State and local prime sponsors retain a high degree of flexibility in shaping programs designed to meet varying local conditions. Those provisions of our bill, which are directed toward structural unemployment, like title I of the current law, allow a broad range of training, placement, supportive, and employment activities.

To further broaden and strengthen the program we are asking the prime sponsors to coordinate their activities with those of the Economic Development Administration, the Small Business Administration, and various State and local agencies designed to stimulate economic growth.

SUBSTITUTION OF EXISTING JOBS

One of the perennial problems in any CETA type program is the danger that State and local governments, nonprofit organizations, and private employers will substitute public service employees for existing personnel. Obviously, this process denies us the full impact of the employment program and thwarts our efforts to significantly expand the employment market. S. 2805 seeks to reduce the substitution of CETA jobs for existing positions in three ways.

First. Employers under our bill will pay the minimum wage instead of the prevailing wage. In addition to reducing substitution, this reform should make additional job slots available by stretching existing resources.

Second. Under S. 2805 CETA wages could not be supplemented by local funds. By prohibiting this practice, we can further reduce the instances of substitution.

Third. Our bill limits the maximum duration of a public service job to 12 months. Under current law there is no limit and the administration bill recommends an 18-month limitation. It is our opinion that a 1-year limitation will allow individuals to receive the necessary training while giving him or her an opportunity to gain valuable job experience. It will not, however, be long enough to encourage job substitution.

JOB OPPORTUNITIES FOR OLDER WORKERS

One of the most persistent criticisms of the CETA program has been its failure to provide additional job opportunities for older workers. As the number of older Americans steadily increases, the Congress will have to make a special effort to see that Federal programs are responsive to their needs. Statistics would indicate that, to date, only about 2 percent of all of CETA participants are older workers. As a partial remedy to this problem, Congress enacted title IX of the Older Americans Act. The title IX public service employment program currently provides approximately 40,000 part-time jobs for low-income older persons. When I drafted S. 2609, the 1978 Amendments to the Older Americans Act, I expanded title IX to include the private sector. The Chiles-Domenici CETA amendments create a new program for older workers which will be in addition to the Older Americans Act program which is administered jointly by the States and national contractors.

The new program will be for structurally unemployed older workers, and will include training, retraining, placement, supportive services and part-time employment. This program will be administered by prime sponsors who have, at their disposal, resources far beyond those presently available under title IX.

By providing an older workers program which is geared to the needs of this large and growing segment of the population, we seek to address what is becoming a major economic problem in this country. It is critical that we provide suitable work modes for an aging work force. Experiments in work sharing and flextime are necessary. The creation of more part-time employment in both the public and private sectors is consistent with the needs of the labor force and an older population of workers.

I would note, Mr. President, that S. 2805 provides a separate authorization for the older workers employment programs because we recognize that there are intense local pressures on the CETA program to focus their resources on the problems of youth unemployment. By providing earmarked funds for this program, we can insure older Americans that they will receive an appropriate level of services under the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act.

COORDINATION WITH OTHER PROGRAMS

The Chiles-Domenici bill recognizes that there are in existence other local, State, and Federal programs which have some services which are similar to CETA. For that reason our bill provides that:

> Available facilities and program delivery systems such as vocational education agencies and institutions, community colleges, local education agencies, vocational rehabilitation, and social and supportive services under other Federal and state and local programs should be utilized and coordinated to the greatest extent feasible in support of programs under this Act.

In addition, a strong role for vocational education is built into the planning process. It is extremely important that we do not duplicate the exitsing vocational education delivery system.

In closing, Mr. President, let me say that over the past 5 years the CETA program has evolved into one of our most successful Federal programs. It has become a viable partnership between all levels of government—Federal, State, and local. We have learned a great deal from the experiences of the last 5 years. Senator CHILES and I have sought to build upon this foundation and we believe our proposals will significantly expand the effectiveness of this vital program.●

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, today Senator DOMENICI and I are introducing our bill to reauthorize and restructure the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act. The Chiles-Domenici bill attempts to restore many of the original purposes of CETA, particularly a comprehensive approach to the structural barriers to employment. I believe that over the last few years Congress has lost sight of this central purpose while loading CETA down with a variety of objectives and programs. Our other main thrusts are to increase local flexibility in program design and operation, to clarify the objectives of employment and training programs for different population groups, and to consolidate the fragmented array of program authorities and eligibility criteria. Finally, we build private sector involvement into all phases of the program and create a new tax voucher system to give private employers an economic incentive to participate, while avoiding new grants or paperwork.

I will first summarize the major features of our approach, then go on to discuss the reasons for our recommendations.

First. We have developed a mission structure for the bill, which sets out clear objectives and groups multiple programs serving similar goals. By focusing on missions rather than activities we will increase local flexibility in implementing the programs, while also achieving greater public accountability for the outcome. We believe that local prime sponsors should determine the appropriate mix of services for their own populations and labor market conditions.

Second. We emphasize structural unemployment goals, rather than countercyclical, and we divide our structural unemployment title by age groups:

Part A. For youth (age 16–21) we combine initiatives from many titles of CETA;

Part B. For adult displaced workers (age 22–54), we reestablish the emphasis on declining areas and industries, and tie training and employment to economic development plans; programs are also authorized to develop the skills necessary for labor force entry or reentry for workers displaced from private labor force participation by military service, imprisonment, child-rearing, or welfare dependency.

Part C. We create a new initiative for older workers (age 55 plus), with a special emphasis on local programs to maintain private employment and encourage innovative work arrangements. We maintain the community service program for older Americans and the role of national contractors.

Third. The Chiles-Domenici bill builds private sector participation into the basic structure of the whole CETA program, instead of just tacking it on to a separate public program. We propose an innovative tax voucher mechanism to encourage private employment of youths without adding to paperwork and redtape for the employer.

Fourth. Temporary employment assistance—we propose a limited program triggering on and off at 5.5 percent unemployment, which is 0.6 percent above full employment and thus not inflationary. We propose a fixed authorization level, rather than a quasi-entitlement mechanism, so that Congress can assess the changing economic conditions and make the appropriate responses.

No issue is more important than this country's overall policy to assure meaningful employment opportunities for the entire population. As a member of the Budget and Appropriations Committees, I have spent a large amount of time considering CETA both from the viewpoint of its economic objectives and of its operating effectiveness. My overall feeling is one of frustration. The goals and potentials of the program are enormous. But as Congress has responded to one or another situation, we have created a confused arrangement of programs of overlapping objectives.

By creating a massive public employment program in response to the recession, we have overwhelmed the original purpose of overcoming structural barriers to employment faced by certain individuals. Due to a quirk in the politics of avoiding a veto of appropriations, the program to deal with the economic problems of distressed areas (the original title II) was completely subsumed into temporary public employment. It seems that every new idea has been added on as a district program or an experimental authority. When I ask which programs are effective, I am told that they have so many overlapping objectives that they cannot be adequately evaluated. There has, in fact, been no systematic effort to sort out the major objectives and evaluate how each objective is being met by each of the programs. Setting annual appropriations levels has become more a matter of faith than of analysis and judgment.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTABILITY

The Chiles-Domenici bill proposes to improve public accountability and credibility in the following ways:

First, the temporary employment program is clearly separated from the title addressed at overcoming structrual barriers to employment;

Second, the structural title is divided into three parts, based on the differing needs of youth, of displaced adult workers, and of older workers;

Third, for each of these parts, we specify a set of missions for which the program can be held accountable. Program activities are listed for illustration and guidance, but if local sponsors can meet the objectives in a different way, they are authorized to do so;

Fourth, current experiments are either converted to permanent authorities or separated into a designated part of the research, statistics, evaluation, experiments and demonstrations title (III). Experiments are limited to a duration of 3 years. The Secretary is required to submit to Congress an annual evaluation plan telling us what research and evaluation he is conducting to address what policy issues, and when he expects to achieve results.

YOUTH UNEMPLOYMENT

A key difference between our bill and either the existing law or the administration approach is our proposal to divide the structural title by age group. It is based primarily on the recognition that youth, adults, and older workers face different needs, have different backgrounds of work experience, are treated differently by employers, and respond to different kinds of program efforts. Local and national pressures make it diffcult for prime sponsors to serve all of these groups, unless we give them clear guidance and a separate funding allocation for each.

Structurally unemployed youths may lack the basic skills and attitudes necessary for obtaining and keeping a job. They may not even know how to go about looking for a job and getting an interview. They may be caught in the "Catch 22" of not being hired because they lack experience.

We currently serve youth in numerous parts of CETA: 57 percent of title I; 22 percent of title II; 50 to 100 percent in various parts of title III; 100 percent of title IV; 22 percent title VI; and 17 percent of the work incentive (WIN) program.

No one can tell you what this all adds up to in terms of dollars, in terms of services received, or in terms of a coordinated strategy to solve their problems. We, therefore, propose to maintain the current youth programs which were expanded last year, but combine them into a single youth title, with an authorization of $3.2 billion.

DISPLACED ADULT WORKER

When adult workers are structurally unemployed, it is mostly due to displacements in the economy. The area where they live may be suffering economic decline, or the particular industry for which they possess skills may be declining. Their skills may be obsolete due to technological change. They may have been separated from the work force for a substantial period due to military service, child rearing or welfare dependency. Adults need special programs geared to their reentry or delayed entry to the work force. Those programs should be related to local or regional strategies for economic development. It is useless to retrain a worker unless you are also locating or developing an industry that needs his new skills. We, therefore, propose requirements that structural programs for adult workers be related to regional and local economic development plans developed under the Economic Development Act.

The Chiles-Domenici bill also specifically authorizes an experimental program to develop a comprehensive economic development strategy which combines retraining and placement services with employment vouchers for unemployed workers and industrial location loans. I believe that if we experiment with the various fragmented authorities spread around different departments, we ought to be able to develop a workable regional economic development program to aid declining urban and rural areas.

The total authorization for the displaced adult workers title is $3 billion, including a large component of public service employment shifted from the temporary employment assistance title.

OLDER WORKERS INITIATIVE

Older workers are not currently served by CETA—only 2 percent of CETA enrollees are over age 55. I believe that the declining labor force participation rate by workers age 55 to 64 is a major social and economic problem. Our major need is not for full-time public jobs for this group. Rather, we need programs to help older workers remain in private employment in the face of institutional pressures and economic incentives to retire. We need innovative programs to develop part-time employment, work sharing, flexible hours, and other alternative work modes to allow those older persons who can and want to work to continue to do so. Work provides the kind of critical social support which we are trying to re-create in senior citizens centers and other such activities after letting older people be pushed out of the work place. We can utilize volunteer efforts to achieve many of our social objectives for the elderly, but we need a Federal program to develop and foster those efforts. We also need people to work with private employers and train workers in new work arrangements for the older worker. We therefore recommend an authorization of $400 million for this new initiative.

While we would have the same local prime sponsor conduct each of these three structural programs, we believe it is necessary to have a separate authorization and appropriation of funds for each. We are concerned that under pressure to meet priorities for one age group, the others could be neglected. Most important, we think Congress should be able to consider the changing economic conditions and demographic trends in order to assess the needs for funds in each part. If we are to hold the programs accountable for meeting the different problems of these groups, then we must be able to consider the annual achievement in each of the specified missions and show that we are basing appropriations on achievement as well as need.

I do want to emphasize, however, that while we mandate separate allocations, we would not fragment the operations of local programs. The prime sponsors would be required to show in their plans how they were meeting the needs of each group as specified in the mission objectives. They would determine the appropriate mix of services, and the Secretary could not reject their plan simply because he did not approve of the mix. Where the sponsor showed that the same service—for example, classroom training to achieve basic work skills—was appropriate to more than one age group, he would be encouraged to conduct that activity in a single operation. While maintaining local flexibility, we could thus be assured that all groups were being served and all program objectives were being achieved.

We recommend authorization levels equalling the current total, but sorted out into the appropriate new titles. We propose a shift of $2 billion from countercyclical employment to the structural programs. While some of this money would still be used for public service jobs, it would be in the context of a comprehensive program of training, placement, counseling and supportive services. We will also recommend modified allocation formulas which take account of the purposes of each title and the different structural parts.

PRIVATE SECTOR PARTICIPATION

An increased role for private employers is a major thrust of the Chiles-Domenici bill. It has come to be generally recognized that it does not make sense to rely on public sector employers for a program that is supposed to prepare workers for entry into the private labor market. Unemployed youth have a cluster of attributes which keep them out of jobs: lack of skills, no experience, poor work attitudes and expectations, too low productivity to justify the Federal minimum wage or minimum union scale. An effective program should seek to modify all of these factors, including the excessive cost to employers. We therefore propose the following measures to increase private sector participation.

First. We require each local prime sponsor to create a private business advisory committee to facilitate and develop private employer participation;

Second. Evidence of private participation is required in each program authority;

Third. We create a tax voucher system to partially subsidize the employment of unemployed youth with requisite skills. The CETA prime sponsor would determine eligibility and issue the youth a voucher, which would entitle a private employer to a credit against his employee withholding tax, with no grant applications or paperwork. Each prime sponsor will have a set amount of voucher authorization based on the prime sponsor's allocation. Each local prime sponsor would issue to eligible youth a voucher good for a credit of 50 cents to $1 an hour. The youth would then seek employment in the private market. The voucher would entitle the employer to a reduction of his employees withholding tax equal to that 50 cents to $1 for each hour worked. The youth would be paid minimum wage, or union scale, or whatever raise the employer considered appropriate.

The voucher would be portable and valid for 24 months, so that the youth and employer would not have to worry about being locked into an unsatisfactory arrangement. The employer would not have to go through the paperwork of waiting for a grant or contract. He would get the immediate cash benefit at each payroll period. All he would have to do is add a column to his withholding statement and attach the voucher along with his W–2 forms at the end of his tax year. The youth would have the benefit of a regular private sector job, paid at the same rate as his fellow workers. If he did not perform well he could be fired; if he performed well, he could get raises and promotions.

TEMPORARY EMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE

Our final recommendation is for a temporary employment title. You will note that we do not call it countercyclical. We have been looking at economic policy carefully at Budget Committee for 3 years now, and we are convinced that public employment does not work well on a countercyclical basis. That is, you cannot phase it up or down rapidly as the economy changes. It takes time to plan and hire. Once workers are on public rolls, you cannot easily drop them off.

We have seen proposals to vary the level of public employment with the unemployment rate of the past two or three or four quarters. Unfortunately, as you came around the bend to recovery, you would still be increasing public employment even as private unemployment declined. That would aggravate the cycle, not counter it. I am afraid we are being asked to design the response to the last economic cycle, not the next one.

We do think it is useful to have a backup of public employment when you are clearly in a recession. The President's Council of Economic Advisers now calculates the high employment rate at 4.9 percent overall unemployment. In other words, at 4.9 percent you have to begin worrying about stimulating inflation in the job market. We, therefore, recommend a fixed sum at 5.5 percent or more unemployment. If we appropriate at 5.5 percent when the economy is recovering, then the phase down would last until you got down to 4.9 percent.

If we allowed expenditures authorized when you got down to 4.9 percent, people would still be employed when the economy accelerated past that. In terms of the present recovery, the trigger would be the same as the administration bill, since they discount the previous three quarters of allocation. Thus, they would have zero countercyclical authorization for the period when you are going down from 5.5 to 4.9 percent unemployment. In general, we think Congress ought to look at the economic conditions and forecasts each year and decide what mix of spending is appropriate, rather than mechanically tie an annual level of spending to the unemployment rate.

In order to minimize fiscal substitution and maximize the net job creation in the temporary employment title, we include several important provisions:

First. Employment is limited to 12 months duration;

Second. The minimum payment is set at the higher of Federal or State minimum wage (not prevailing wage), with a maximum of $10,000 per employee;

Third. Supplementation of CETA wages from other sources is forbidden; and Fourth. All jobs are targeted to the economically disadvantaged, who face the greatest loss of employment during a recession. All age groups would be eligible.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point comparative outlines of the administration bill and the Chiles-Domenici bill. These outlines will demonstrate the greater clarity of our approach.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHILES-DOMENICI BILL—DRAFT OUTLINE

I. Administrative provisions.
II. Structural unemployment—
A. Youth:
1. Youth employment and training programs (includes summer youth program).
2. Entitlement pilot projects.
(1 and 2—local prime sponsors.)
3. Job Corps.
4. Young Adult Conservation Corps.
(3 and 4—nationally administered.)
B. Adult: Displaced workers employment and training programs (local).
C. Older workers (local)—additional to title IX of Older Americans Act.
III. Research, statistics, evaluation, experiments and demonstrations.
IV. Special Federal responsibilities—
A. National programs:
Indians and other native Americans,
Migrant and seasonal farmworkers,
Persons with limited English-speaking ability.
B. National Commission for Employment and Training Policy.
C. Federal agency programs.
V. Temporary employment.
Tax Code amendment.

CARTER BILL OUTLINE

I. Administrative provisions.
II. Comprehensive employment and training (local prime sponsors):
A. Financial assistance to local prime sponsor vocational education—supplemental job search assistance.
B. Services for the economically disadvantaged.
C. Upgrading and retraining.
III. Special Federal responsibilities:
A. National program,
Native Americans,
Migrant and seasonal farmworkers,
Persons of limited English-speaking ability,

Job search and relocation assistance,
Veteran's information and outreach.
B. Research, training, evaluation.
IV. Youth:
A. Youth demonstrations—
I. Incentive entitlement (national),
II. Community conservation and improvement (local),
III. Youth employment and training (local prime sponsors) Secretary's discretionary projects.
B. Job Corps (national).
C. Summer youth (local).
V. National Commission for Employment and Training Policy.
VI. Public service employment (local) (countercyclical and permanent).
VII. Private sector opportunities (local).
VIII. Young Adult Conservation Corps (national)

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, employment and training programs have been a major subject of debate for the last 3 years as we have grappled with the problems of economic recovery. We are now two-thirds of the way to full employment and it is time to shift our focus to providing opportunities for those persons denied employment due to features of our economic and social structure. I believe that the emphasis on temporary employment programs has blurred the public understanding of the comprehensive set of services necessary to deal with structural unemployment. The Chiles-Domenici bill being offered today attempts to reestablish a public acceptability by clearly sorting out program objectives, by making the transition to private sector employment a workable goal and by improving local flexibility in program design and operation.●

By Mr. DOMENICI (for himself and Mr. CHILES):

S. 2806. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide for a credit against an employer's liability for withholding income tax on wages paid to his employees based upon the employment of individuals certified for hourly employment benefits under the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act of 1973; to the Committee on Finance.

YOUTH EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT VOUCHER PROGRAM

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I am sending to the desk legislation that will establish a tax voucher, within the CETA program, designed to combat hardcore youth unemployment. This Domenici-Chiles bill amends the Internal Revenue Code to provide for a tax credit to employers who participate in this new CETA youth employment voucher program. CETA administrative provisions for this program are contained in the Chiles-Domenici amendments to the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act which were introduced just a few minutes ago.

I would like to outline briefly how this total program will operate if enacted. Each prime sponsor would have a set voucher authorization based on the prime sponsor's allocation. The prime sponsor would issue, to eligible youth, a voucher good for a credit of from 50 cents to $1 an hour. The youthful job seeker would then look for employment in the private market. The voucher would entitle the employer to a reduction of his employees withholding tax equal to that 50 cents to $1 for each hour worked. The youth would be paid at least the minimum wage, or a higher wage rate if the employer considered that appropriate. The voucher would be portable and valid for 24 months, so that the youth and employer would not have to worry about being locked into a long-term commitment. The employer would not have to go through extensive paperwork or long delays waiting for a grant or contract. He would get the immediate cash benefit at each payroll tax period. All he would have to do is add a column to his withholding statement and attach the voucher along with his W–2 forms at the end of his tax year. The youth would have the benefit of a regular private sector job. If he did not perform well he could be fired; if he performed well, he could get raises and promotions. After up to 2 years of private sector experience, the youth would, in all likelihood, be able to continue to be employed or employable without further need for service or subsidized employment.

Mr. President, in recent years there has been a growing appreciation among employment specialists of the role of the private sector in combatting structural unemployment. Huge budget deficits and our inability to further reduce the inflation rate below 6 percent has caused a dimunition of support for massive new Federal programs. This Domenici-Chiles tax voucher seeks to encourage the private sector to take a greater hand in efforts to train and employ hardcore unemployed youth.●

By Mr. DOMENICI (for himself and Mr. HART):

S. 2807. A bill to amend the Bilingual Education Act, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Human Resources.

BILINGUAL EDUCATION ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1978

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, today I am introducing with my friend and colleague from Colorado, Senator GARY HART, a bill which rewrites the Bilingual Education Act. Our proposal, which is similar to a bill introduced in the House by Representative CORRADA, represents a major effort to provide bilingual education programs to children with limited English language proficiency.

The Domenici-Hart Bilingual Education Act Amendments of 1978 amends title VII of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1964 to:

Provide for a continuation of the current demonstration project approach for fiscal years 1979 through 1981.

Require that by September 30, 1980, the Commissioner of Education shall submit a report to the Congress indicating the total number of children in the United States with limited English proficiency and identifying those children by language and by State and local education agencies.

Phase in a formula grant program to be administered by the State to serve all children with limited English language proficiency:

First. Funds would be granted by the Office of Education to State education agencies and would be passed through to local education agencies on the basis of the number of children in need of bilingual education programs.

Second. States would be required to provide matching funds equal to 25 percent of the allotment in fiscal year 1981 and 40 percent of the allotment in fiscal year 1982.

Third. Require State education agencies to develop and submit to the Commissioner of Education a 2-year comprehensive program plan.

Fourth. Require local education agencies to submit a program plan to the State education agency.

Provide increased focus and funding to training programs for bilingual education teachers and other personnel.

Strengthen research development and data collection programs administered by the Office of Education and the National Institute of Education.

Reauthorize and incorporate that section of the Emergency School Aid Act relating to bilingual education into title VII.

Authorize appropriations which provide for the transition from a demonstration program to a formula grant service by increasing the authorization to $750 million in fiscal year 1982.

Mr. President, children in the United States are entitled to a free public education. For those children who do not speak English or who have limited English proficiencies, the public education program needs to include the teaching of English. Bilingual instruction in other subjects should be provided in order to allow the children to progress through the educational system while they are learning English.

The Federal role in education is primarily focused around providing assistance to State and local education agencies in meeting the needs of "high-cost" children, that is children, like the handicapped and the disadvantaged, whose education costs more than the average per pupil expenditure. Children who have limited English language proficiency fall into this "high cost" category. I believe the Federal Government should provide bilingual funding on a per-pupil basis, as it does for handicapped children, in order to provide the educational programs necessary for such children.

Children with limited English proficiency have a right to a public education. I believe it is incumbent upon the Federal Government to aid State and local education agencies as they provide for such children a free and appropriate education.

My own State of New Mexico, which has an extensive bilingual program funded by the State, has been a leader in recognizing the right of children from language minorities to an education.

The bill which Senator HART and I are proposing will build on the successful programs in our States and on the experience gained from the title VII demonstration program. The Human Resources Committee will reauthorize title VII this spring. It is my hope that the committee will recognize the need for such a program and will come to the floor with a bill that provides a program such as Senator HART and I have proposed.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of S. 2807 be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2807

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

That this Act may be cited as the "Bilingual Education Act Amendments of 1978".

SEC. 2. The Bilingual Education Act is amended to read as follows:

"TITLE VII—BILINGUAL EDUCATION ACT

"SHORT TITLE

"SEC. 701. This title may be cited as the 'Bilingual Education Act'.

"POLICY; APPROPRIATIONS

"SEC. 702. (a) The Congress finds that—

"(1) there are more than three million children of limited English proficiency in the United States;

"(2) many such children have a cultural heritage which differs from that of English-speaking persons;

"(3) a primary means by which a child learns is through the use of such child's language and cultural heritage;

"(4) large numbers of children of limited English proficiency have educational needs which can be met by the use of bilingual education methods and techniques;

"(5) children of limited English proficiency benefit through the fullest utilization of multiple language and cultural resources;

"(6) children of limited English proficiency have a high dropout rate and low median years of education;

"(7) research and evaluation capabilities in the field of bilingual education need to be strengthened;

"(8) the Supreme Court in Lau v. Nichols (414 U.S. 563, 566 (1974)) affirmed that State and local educational agencies have an affirmative duty to provide children of limited English proficiency a meaningful opportunity to participate in their school's instructional program; and

"(9) it is in the national interest that the Federal Government assist State and local efforts to provide programs to meet the educational needs of children of limited English proficiency in order to assure equal protection of the law.

The Congress declares it to be the policy of the United States, in order to establish equal educational opportunity for all children and to foster the development of a bilingual-citizenry (1) to encourage the establishment and operation, where appropriate, of educational programs using bilingual educational practices, techniques and methods, and (2) for that purpose to provide financial assistance to local educational agencies, and to State educational agencies for certain purposes, in order to enable such local educational agencies to develop and carry out such programs in elementary and secondary schools, including activities at the preschool level, which are designed to meet the educational needs of such children; and to demonstrate and develop effective ways of providing for children of limited English proficiency, instruction utilizing the child's language and cultural background, designed to enable them to achieve proficiency in the English language.

"(b)(1) Except as otherwise provided in this title, for the purpose of carrying out provisions of this title, there are authorized to be appropriated $225,000,000 for the fiscal year 1979, $250,000,000 for the fiscal year 1980, $275,000,000 for the fiscal year 1981, and sums as may be necessary $750,000,000 for each of the two succeeding fiscal years.

"(2) There are further authorized to be appropriated to carry out the provisions of section 721(b)(3) $12,000,000 for the fiscal year 1979, $14,000,000 for the fiscal year 1980, and $16,000,000 for the fiscal year 1981.

"(3) From the sums appropriated under paragraph (1) for each of the fiscal years 1979, 1980, and 1981—

"(A) the Commissioner shall reserve $45,000,000 of that part thereof which does not exceed $150,000,000 for training activities carried out under clause (3) of subsection (a) of section 721 and shall reserve for such activities 33⅓ per centum of that part thereof which is in excess of $150,000,000, and less than $300,000,000.

"(B) the Commissioner shall reserve from the amount not reserved pursuant to clause (A) of this paragraph such amounts as may be necessary, but not in excess of 1 per centum thereof, for the purposes of section 732.

"(4) From the sums appropriated under paragraph (1) for the fiscal year 1982, and the fiscal year 1983, the Commissioner shall reserve such an amount not less than that appropriated during the preceding fiscal year, based on findings of national training needs for bilingual education, including data derived from the study mandated under section 731.

"DEFINITIONS; REGULATIONS

"SEC. 703. (a) The following definitions shall apply to the terms used in this title:

"(1) The term 'limited English proficiency', when used with reference to an individual, means—

"(A) individuals whose native language is a language other than English;

"(B) individuals who come from environments where a language other than English is dominant, as further defined by the Commissioner by regulations;

"(C) individuals who come from environments where a language other than English has had a significant impact on their level of English proficiency, as further defined by the Commissioner by regulations; and have difficulty speaking, reading, writing, or understanding the English language within their appropriate age and grade levels. Children shall be considered to be proficient in English when they can speak, read, write, and understand English at a level comparable to other children within their age and grade levels.

"(2) The term 'native language', when used with reference to an individual of limited English proficiency, means the language normally used by such individuals, or the language normally used by the parents of the child or in the home.

"(3)(A) The term 'program of bilingual education' means a program of instruction designed for children of limited English proficiency in elementary or secondary schools, in which with respect to the years of study to which such program is applicable—

"(i) there is instruction given in, and study of English and the native language of the children of limited English proficiency, and the curriculum and such instruction shall include an appreciation for the cultural heritage of such children and such instruction shall, to the extent necessary, be in courses or subjects of study which will allow a child to progress effectively through the educational system; and in which the program and curriculum materials shall be comparable in quality to that offered to the regular English dominant class; and

"(ii) the requirements in subparagraphs (B) through (E) of this paragraph and established pursuant to subsection (b) of this section are met.

"(B) In order to provide peer models for language learning, in order to broaden the understanding of children about cultural heritages other than their own, and to prevent the segregation of children on the basis of national origin in programs assisted under this title, a program of bilingual instruction may include the participation of children whose language is English. In providing that such children shall be eligible to participate in such programs, a program shall not diminish the effectiveness of the program for children who have limited English language skills. In no event shall the principal purpose of the program be to teach a foreign language to English-speaking children, nor shall the percentage of children whose language is English exceed 30% of a class. In any other provision of this title, include education would, as a consequence of State or local practice, foster segregation of children of limited English-speaking proficiency, such program may provide for centralization of teacher training and curriculum development, but shall serve such children in the schools which they normally attend.

"(C) In such courses or subjects of study as art, music, and physical education, a program of bilingual education shall make provision for the participation of children of limited English-speaking proficiency in regular classes.

"(D) Children enrolled in a program of bilingual education shall, if graded classes are used, be placed to the extent practicable in classes with children of approximately the same age and level of educational attainment. If children of significantly varying ages or levels of educational attainment are placed in the same class, the program of bilingual education shall seek to insure that each child is provided with instruction which is appropriate for his or her level of educational attainment.

"(E) An application for a program of bilingual education shall be developed in consultation with parents of children of limited English proficiency, teachers, and, where applicable, secondary school students, in the areas to be served, and assurances shall be given in the application that, after the application has been approved under this title, the applicant will provide for participation by a committee composed of, and selected by parents (not less than 51 per centum of whom shall be parents of children of limited English proficiency), and in the case of secondary schools, representatives of secondary school students to be served.

"(5) The term 'Bureau' means the Bureau of Bilingual Education.

"(6) The term 'Deputy Commissioner' means the Deputy Commissioner of the Bureau of Bilingual Education.

"(7) The term 'Council' means the National Advisory Council on Bilingual Education.

"(8) The term 'other programs for persons of limited English proficiency' when used in sections 731 and 732 means any program within the Office of Education directly involved in bilingual education activities serving persons of limited English proficiency.

"(b) The Commissioner, after receiving recommendations from State and local educational agencies, the National Institute of Education, instrumentalities engaged in the field of research in bilingual education, and groups and organizations involved in bilingual education, shall establish, publish and distribute suggested curriculum and language and cultural teaching strategies for programs of bilingual education including techniques for parental and community involvement.

"(c) In prescribing regulations under this section, the Commissioner shall consult with State and local educational agencies, appropriate organizations representing parents and children of limited English proficiency, and appropriate groups and organizations representing teachers and educators involved in bilingual education.

"PART A—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR BILINGUAL EDUCATION PROGRAMS

"BILINGUAL EDUCATION PROGRAMS

"SEC. 721. (a) For the fiscal years 1979, 1980, and 1981, funds available for grants under this part shall be used for—

"(1) the establishment, operation, and improvement of programs of bilingual education;

"(2) auxiliary and supplementary community and educational activities designed to facilitate and expand the implementation of programs described in clause (1), including such activities as (A) adult education programs related to the purposes of this title, particularly for parents of children participating in programs of bilingual education, and carried out, where appropriate, in coordination with programs assisted under the Adult Education Act, and (B) preschool programs preparatory and supplementary to bilingual education programs;

"(3)(A) the establishment, operation, and improvement of training programs for personnel preparing to participate in, or personnel participating in, the conduct of programs of bilingual education and (B) auxiliary and supplementary training programs, which shall be included in each program of bilingual education, for personnel preparing to participate in, or personnel participating in, the conduct of such programs; and

"(4) planning, and providing technical assistance for, and taking other steps leading to the development of, such programs.

"(b)(1) A grant may be made under this section only upon application therefor by one or more local educational agencies or by an institution of higher education, including a junior or community college, applying jointly with one or more local educational agencies (or, in the case of a training activity described in clause (3)(A) of subsection (a) of this section, by eligible applicants as defined in section 723). Each such application shall be made to the Commissioner at such time, in such manner, and containing such information as the Commissioner deems necessary, and

"(A) include a description of the activities set forth in one or more of the clauses of subsection (a) which the applicant desires to carry out; and

"(B) provide evidence that the activities so described will make substantial progress toward making programs of bilingual-bicultural education available to the children having need thereof in the area served by the applicant.

"(2) An application for a grant under this part may be approved only if—

"(A) the provision of assistance proposed in the application is consistent with criteria established by the Commissioner, after consultation with the State educational agency, for the purpose of achieving an equitable distribution of assistance under this part within the State in which the applicant is located, which criteria shall be developed by his taking into consideration (i) the geographic distribution of children of limited English proficiency, (ii) the relative need of persons in different geographic areas within the State for the kinds of services and activities described in subsection (a), and (iii) with respect to grants to carry out programs described in clauses (1) and (2) of subsection (a) of section 721, the relative ability of particular local educational agencies within the State to provide such services and activities;

"(B) in the case of applications from local educational agencies to carry out programs of bilingual-bicultural education under clause (1) of subsection (a) of section 721, the Commissioner determines that not more than 15 per centum of the amounts paid to the applicant for the purposes of such programs shall be expended for auxiliary and supplementary training programs in accordance with the provisions of clause (3)(B) of such subsection and section 723;

"(C) the Commissioner determines (i) that the program will use the most qualified available personnel and the best resources and will substantially increase the educational opportunities for children of limited English proficiency in the area to be served by the applicant, (ii) that, to the extent consistent with the number of children enrolled in nonprofit, nonpublic schools in the area to be served whose educational needs include the same native language or languages and grade levels which the program is intended to serve, provision has been made for participation of such children, (iii) that the applicant demonstrates that to the extent possible personnel recruited and employed to carry out projects and activities under this title are bilingual, and (iv) that the program includes a plan for evaluation consistent with guidelines developed by the Deputy Commissioner;

"(D) the State educational agency has been notified of the application and has been given the opportunity to offer recommendations thereon to the applicant and to the Commissioner; and

"(E) Nothing in this paragraph shall prohibit the use of funds made available under this title to enable the applicant, (i) to comply with an order of a court of the United States or of any State respecting services to be provided for those children, or (ii) to carry out a plan approved by the Secretary as adequate under title VI of the Civil Rights Act with respect to services to be provided for those children, as long as with respect to clauses (i) and (ii) of this subparagraph the programs approved meet the guidelines for bilingual education as established in this title and by regulations under this title.

"(3)(A) Upon an application from a State educational agency, the Commissioner shall make provision for the submission and approval of a State program for the coordination by such State agency of programs of bilingual education in such State assisted under this title. Such State program shall contain such provisions, agreements, and assurances as the Commissioner shall, by regulation, determine necessary and proper to achieve the purposes of this title, including assurances that funds made available under this section for any fiscal year will be so used as to supplement, and to the extent practical, increase the level of funds that would, in the absence of such funds be made available by the State for the purposes described in this section, and in no case to supplant such funds.

"(B) Except as is provided in the second sentence of this subparagraph, the Commissioner shall pay from the amounts authorized for these purposes pursuant to section 702 for each fiscal year to each State educational agency which has a State program submitted and approved under subparagraph (A) such sums as may be necessary for the proper and efficient conduct of such State program. The amount paid by the Commissioner to any State educational agency under the preceding sentence for any fiscal year shall be equal to 5 per centum of the aggregate of the amounts paid under this part to local educational agencies in the State of such State educational agency in the fiscal year preceding the fiscal year in which this limitation applies, but in no event shall such amount be less than $50,000, or greater than $500,000.

"(C) In determining the distribution of funds under this title, the Commissioner shall give priority to areas having the greatest need for programs assisted under this title.

"(D) In determining the distribution of funds under this title, the Commissioner shall, with respect to the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, take into account the number of children in elementary and secondary schools who are not proficient in the English language, and, programs of bilingual education under this title in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico may, notwithstanding any other provision of this title, include programs of instruction, teacher training, curriculum development and evaluation and testing, designed to improve the English proficiency of those children. The Commissioner shall conduct a study on the extent of the need for these programs in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and shall report the results thereof, together with recommendations, to the Congress, within one year after the date of enactment of this subsection.

INDIAN CHILDREN IN SCHOOLS

SEC. 722. (a) For the purpose of carrying out programs under this part for individuals served by elementary and secondary schools operated predominantly for Indian children, a nonprofit institution or organization of the Indian tribe concerned which operates any such school and which is approved by the Commissioner for the purposes of this section may be considered to be a local educational agency as such term is used in this title.

(b) From the sums appropriated pursuant to section 702(b), the Commissioner is authorized to make payments to the Secretary of the Interior to carry out programs of bilingual education for children on reservations served by elementary and secondary schools for Indian children operated or funded by the Department of the Interior. The terms upon which payments for such purpose may be made to the Secretary of the Interior shall be determined pursuant to such criteria as the Commissioner determines will best carry out the policy of section 702(a).

(c) The Secretary of the Interior shall prepare and, not later than November 1 of each year, shall submit to the Congress and the President an annual report detailing a review and evaluation of the use, during the preceding fiscal year, of all funds paid to him by the Commissioner under subsection (b) of this section, including complete fiscal reports, a description of the personnel and information paid for in whole or in part with such funds, the allocation of such funds, and the status of all programs funded from such payments. Nothing in this subsection shall be construed to relieve the Director of any authority or obligation under this part.

(d) The Secretary of the Interior shall, together with the information required in the preceding subsection, submit to the Congress and the President, an assessment of the needs of Indian children with respect to the purposes of this title in schools operated or funded by the Department of the Interior, including those State educational agencies and local educational agencies receiving assistance under the Johnson-O'Malley Act (25 U.S.C. 452 et seq.) and an assessment of the extent to which such needs are being met by funds provided to such schools for educational purposes through the Secretary of the Interior.

"TRAINING

"SEC. 723. (a)(1) In carrying out the provisions of clauses (1) and (3) of subsection (a) of section 721, with respect to training, the Commissioner shall, through grants to, and contracts with, eligible applicants, as defined in subsection (b), provide for—

"(A) training, carried out in coordination with any other programs training auxiliary educational personnel, with particular emphasis on programs leading to certificates or degrees in bilingual education, designed (i) to prepared personnel to participate in, or for personnel participating in, the conduct of programs of bilingual education, including programs emphasizing opportunities for career development, advancement, and lateral mobility, (ii) to train teachers, administrators, counselors, paraprofessionals, and teacher aides, and (iii) to train persons to teach and counsel such persons;

"(B) special training programs designed (i) to meet individual needs, and (ii) to provide programs which will reform or bring about innovation and improvement in applicable education curricula in graduate education, in the structure of the academic profession, and in recruitment and retention of higher education and graduate school facilities, as related to bilingual education;

"(C) Special programs for the training of education personnel in (i) the use of bilingual educational practices, techniques, and methods; (ii) the use of instructional materials for bilingual education programs; (iii) the use and selection of appropriate instruments for measuring the educational performance of children participating in bilingual programs; (iv) the means of involving parents and community organizations in bilingual education programs; (v) the development and implementation of procedures to evaluate the impact of bilingual education; and

"(D) the operation of short-term training institutes designed to improve the skills of participants in programs of bilingual education in order to facilitate their effectiveness in carrying out responsibilities in connection with such programs.

"(2) In addition the Commissioner is authorized to award fellowships for study in the field of training teachers for bilingual education. For the fiscal year 1979, and subsequent years, not less than 100 fellowships leading to a graduate degree shall be awarded under the preceding sentence for preparing individuals to train teachers for programs of bilingual education. Such fellowships shall be awarded in proportion to the need for teachers of various groups of individuals with limited English proficiency. For each fiscal year beginning after September 30, 1979, the Commissioner shall report to the Committee on Education and Labor of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Human Resources of the Senate on the number of fellowships in the field of training teachers for bilingual education which he recommends will be necessary for that fiscal year.

"(3) The Commissioner shall include in the terms of any arrangement described in paragraphs (1) and (2) of subsection (a) of this section provisions for the payment, to persons participating in training programs so described, of such stipends (including allowances for subsistence and other expenses for such persons and their dependents) as he may determine to be consistent with prevailing practices under comparable federally supported programs.

"(4) In making grants or contracts under this section, the Commissioner shall give priority to eligible applicants with demonstrated competence and experience in the field of bilingual education. Funds provided under grants or contracts for training activities described in this section to or with a State educational agency, separately or jointly, shall in no event exceed in the aggregate in any fiscal year 15 per centum of the total amount of funds obligated for training activities pursuant to clauses (1) and (3) of subsection (a) of section 721 in such year.

"(5) The Commissioner shall undertake an ongoing longitudinal study of the impact of recipients of such fellowships on the field of bilingual education, and shall disseminate research undertaken by recipients of such fellowships.

"(6) Any person receiving assistance under this subsection shall work for a period equivalent to the period of time during which such person received assistance, and such work shall be in an activity related to the training of teachers and related personnel of bilingual education, as further determined by the Commissioner through regulations. The Commissioner may waive this requirement in extraordinary circumstances.

"(7) The Commissioner shall issue regulations specifying such activities as shall constitute training under this section and section 721(b)(2)(B).

"(8) An application for a grant or contract for preservice or inservice training activities described in clause (A)(i) and clause (B)(ii) of paragraph (1) and in subparagraph (B) of paragraph (1) shall be considered an application for a program of bilingual education for the purposes of subsection (a)(4)(E) of section 703.

"(b) For the purposes of this section, the term 'eligible applicants' means—

"(1) institutions of higher education (including junior colleges and community colleges) and private and nonprofit organizations which apply, after consultation with, or jointly with, one or more local educational agencies or a State educational agency;

"(2) local educational agencies; and

"(3) State educational agencies.

"PART B—ADMINISTRATION

"BUREAU OF BILINGUAL EDUCATION

"SEC. 731. (a) There shall be, in the Office of Education, a Bureau of Bilingual Education (hereafter in this section referred to as the "Bureau") through which the Commissioner shall carry out his functions relating to bilingual education.

"(b)(1) The Bureau shall be headed by a Deputy Commissioner of Bilingual Education, appointed by the Commissioner, to whom the Commissioner shall delegate all of his delegable functions relating to bilingual education, and who shall be placed in, and compensated at the rate specified for grade 18 of the General Schedule set forth in section 5332 of title 5, United States Code.

"(2) The Bureau shall be organized as the Deputy Commissioner determines to be appropriate in order to enable him to carry out his functions and responsibilities effectively.

"(3) There shall be two additional positions in the Bureau which shall be placed in grade 17 of the General Schedule set forth in section 5332 of title 5, United States Code, one of whom shall be designated by the Deputy Commissioner of the Bureau to act for the Deputy Commissioner in the Deputy Commissioner's absence or disability.

"(c) The Commissioner, in consultation with the Council, shall prepare and shall submit to the Congress and the President an annual report on the condition of bilingual education in the Nation and the administration and operation of this title and of other programs for persons of limited English proficiency. Such report shall include—

"(1) a national assessment of the educational needs of children and other persons with limited English proficiency and of the extent to which such needs are being met from Federal, State, and local efforts;

"(2) a report on and an evaluation of the activities carried out under this title during the preceding fiscal year and the extent to which each of such activities achieves the policy set forth in section 702(a);

"(3) a statement of the activities intended to be carried out during the succeeding period, including an estimate of the cost of such activities;

"(4) an assessment of the number of teachers and other educational personnel needed to carry out programs of bilingual education under this title and those carried out under other programs for persons of limited English proficiency and a statement describing the activities carried out thereunder designed to prepare teachers and other educational personnel for such programs, and the number of other educational personnel needed to carry out programs of bilingual education in the States and a statement describing the activities carried out under this title designed to prepare teachers and other educational personnel for such programs; and

"(5) a description of the personnel, the functions of such personnel, and information available at the regional offices of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare dealing with bilingual education programs within that region.

"(d) The Commissioner, in consultation with the Council, shall prepare and, not later than September 30, 1980, shall submit to the Congress and the President a report identifying the number of children with limited English proficiency in the Nation, by language, by State, and by local educational agency, and identifying a mechanism for annually updating these statistics. Such report shall also include cost estimates for extending programs of bilingual education to all children of limited English proficiency in the Nation, as well as the necessary teachers and related personnel to serve these children, including a breakdown by language, by State and local educational agency, and by grade levels; as well as comparisons with current availability. Such cost estimates shall be based on an implementation date of September 30, 1982.

"(e) Not later than September 30, 1980, the Commissioner shall develop methods for identifying children with limited English proficiency who are in need of bilingual education programs.

"(f) Not later than September 30, 1980, the Commissioner shall develop mechanisms to measure the progress of children of limited English proficiency enrolled in programs assisted under this title, taking into account the acquisition of requisite English proficiency which will enable the child to competently and effectively participate in a classroom where the vehicle of instruction is English, and take into account other factors contributing to the children's cognitive and affective development.

"(g) Not later than September 30, 1980, the Commissioner shall develop evaluation and data-gathering models, which take into account linguistic and cultural differences of the child, and shall include allowances for variables such as pupil/teacher ratios, teacher qualification, length of the program, hours of instruction, percentage of children, whether English dominant, and limited English proficiency, which are applicable to programs funded under this title.

"(h) In order to maximize Federal efforts aimed at serving the educational needs of children with limited English proficiency, the Deputy Commissioner shall coordinate and closely cooperate with other programs administered by the Office of Education, including such areas as teacher training, program content, research, and curriculum. The Commissioner's annual report under subsection (c) shall include demonstration that such coordination has taken place.

"NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL ON BILINGUAL EDUCATION

"SEC. 732. (a) Subject to part D of the General Education Provisions Act, there shall be a National Advisory Council on Bilingual Education composed of fifteen members appointed by the Secretary, one of whom he shall designate as Chairman. At least eight of the members of the Council shall be persons experienced in dealing with the educational problems of children and other persons who are of limited English proficiency, at least one of whom shall be representative of persons serving on boards of education operating programs of bilingual-bicultural education. At least two members shall be experienced in the training of teachers in programs of bilingual-bicultural education. At least two members shall be classroom teachers of demonstrated teaching abilities using bilingual methods and techniques. The Council shall also include at least two parents of students whose language proficiencies are other than English. At least one State educational agency representative and one member at large shall also be included. The members of the Council shall be appointed in such a way as to be generally representative of the significant segments of the population of persons of limited English proficiency and the geographic areas in which they reside. Subject to section 448(b) of the General Education Provisions Act, the Advisory Committee shall continue to exist until October 1, 1983.

"(b) The Council shall meet at the call of the Chairman, but, notwithstanding the provisions of section 446(a) of the General Education Provisions Act, not less often than four times in each year.

"(c) The Council shall advise the Commissioner in the preparation of general regulations and with respect to policy matters arising in the administration and operation of this title, including the development of criteria for approval of applications and plans under this title, and the administration and operation of other programs for persons of limited English proficiency. The Council shall prepare and, not later than March 31 of each year, submit a report to the Congress and the President on the condition of bilingual education in the Nation and on the administration and operation of this title, including those items specified in section 731(c), and the administration and operation of other programs for persons of limited English proficiency.

"(d) The Commissioner shall procure temporary and intermittent services of such personnel as are necessary for the conduct of the functions of the Council, in accordance with section 445, of the General Education Provisions Act, and shall make available to the Council such staff, information, and other assistance as it may require to carry out its activities effectively.

"PART C—SUPPORTIVE SERVICES AND ACTIVITIES

"ADMINISTRATION

"SEC. 741. (a) The provisions of this part shall be administered by the Assistant Secretary, in consultation with—

"(1) the Commissioner, through the Bureau of Bilingual Education; and

"(2) the Director of the National Institute of Education, notwithstanding the second sentence of section 405(b)(1) of the General Education Provisions Act; in accordance with regulations.

"(b) The Assistant Secretary shall, in accordance with clauses (1) and (2) of subsection (a), develop and promulgate regulations for this part and then delegate his functions under this part, as may be appropriate under the terms of section 742.

"RESEARCH AND DEMONSTRATION PROJECTS

"SEC. 742. (a) The National Institute of Education shall, in accordance with the provisions of section 405 of the General Education Provisions Act, carry out a program of research in the field of bilingual education in order to enhance the effectiveness of bilingual education programs, carried out under this title and other programs for persons of limited English proficiency.

"(b) In order to test the effectiveness of research findings by the National Institute of Education and to demonstrate new or innovative practices, techniques, and methods for use in such bilingual education programs, the Director of the National Institute of Education and the Commissioner are authorized to make grants to and contracts with individuals and with public and private educational agencies, institutions, and organizations for such purpose.

"(c) In carrying out their responsibilities under this section, the Commissioner and the Director of the National Institute of Education shall, through grants and contracts with appropriate individuals and with public and private nonprofit agencies, institutions, and organizations—

"(1) undertake studies to determine the basic educational needs and language acquisition characteristics of and the most effective conditions for, educating children of limited English proficiency;

"(2) develop, and disseminate instructional materials and equipment suitable for use in bilingual education programs;

"(3) establish and operate a national clearinghouse of information for bilingual education, which shall be the central coordinating mechanism for collecting, analyzing, and disseminating information about bilingual education and related programs.

"(4) conduct research, development, and evaluation activities designed to improve the means by which teachers are trained for programs of bilingual education and disseminate the results of those activities;

"(5) conduct research, development, and evaluation activities into the use of the cultural heritage of children to improve programs of bilingual education, and disseminate the results of those activities;

"(6) conduct research, development, operation, and evaluation activities to determine effective instructional strategies for bilingual programs; and

"(7) develop and disseminate instructional materials and equipment suitable for use in bilingual education programs, and report annually to Congress on the efforts made to disseminate such materials and equipment. Materials developed shall be of comparable quality to those provided in classrooms for English dominant children. Consideration shall be given to the availability of materials already in existence in private and public sources and give special attention to those language groups for whom private organizations are unlikely to develop such materials.

"(d) In carrying out their responsibilities under this section, the Commissioner and the Director of the National Institute of Education shall provide for periodic consultation with representatives of State and local educational agencies and appropriate groups and organizations involved in bilingual education.

"(e) There are authorized to be appropriated to carry out in this section $20,000,000 for each of the fiscal years ending prior to October 1, 1981, and such sums as may be necessary for each of the two succeeding fiscal years.

"PART D—CONTINUED BILINGUAL EDUCATION ASSISTANCE

"PROGRAMS OF STATE ASSISTANCE FOR BILINGUAL EDUCATION

"SEC. 752. (a)(1) For the fiscal years 1982 and 1983, from the amount appropriated under section 702(b)(1) for each year, the Commissioner shall grant to each State which applies for such assistance (and to the local educational agencies within any State which does not so apply) an amount determined on the basis of the number of children, as determined by the Commissioner, aged five to seventeen, inclusive, in schools in such State (or in the area served by such educational agency) who have need, as determined under criteria established by the Commissioner based upon the results of the studies under section 731, for programs of bilingual education as compared with the total number of such children in all the States.

"(2) Whenever the Commissioner determines that a State will not apply for funds under this section the Commissioner shall grant to each local educational agency within that State making application for a grant under this section an amount to which each agency would be entitled had the State applied, if such local educational agency submits a program plan in accordance with subsection (g) of this section.

"(3) The amount of any State's allotment under paragraph (1) of subsection (a) for any fiscal year to carry out the provisions of this section which the Commissioner determines will not be required for such fiscal year (but such determination may not be made prior to the ninth month in any fiscal year) to carry out such section shall be available for reallotment from time to time, on such dates during such year as the Commissioner may fix, to other States in proportion to the original allotments to such States under paragraph (1) for that year but with such proportionate amount for any of such other States being reduced to the extent it exceeds the sum the Commissioner estimates such State needs and will be able to use for such year; and the total of such reductions shall be similarly reallotted among the States whose proportionate amounts were not so reduced. Any amounts reallotted to a State under this paragraph during a year from funds appropriated pursuant to section 702(b) shall be deemed a part of its allotment under paragraph (a) for such year.

"(b) In order to be eligible for such funds, the State education agency (or local education agency, where applicable) shall provide matching funds from State or local funds, or about equal to 25 per centum of the allotment in fiscal year 1981 and equal to 40 per centum of the allotment in fiscal year 1982.

"(c) Grants under this section may be used only for programs of bilingual education and related programs and activities consistent with sections 721(a), 721(b)(2)(B), (C), and (E), and 721(b)(3)(D), except that, in any State in which the language of instruction is other than English, such programs and activities shall be designed to help children attain English proficiency, in keeping with their level of need for such proficiency.

"(d) Training programs pursuant to this section as described in section 721(a)(3) shall be consistent with section 733(a)(1). No more than 15 per centum of a State educational agency (or local education agency where applicable) allotment shall be used for such purposes.

"(e) For the purpose of receiving assistance under this section for programs for Indian children, the Bureau of Indian Affairs shall be considered a State.

"(f) Not to exceed 5 per centum of the total amount of any grant to a State under this section for any fiscal year may be used by that State for costs of administering programs authorized to be assisted by such grant, except that not less than $75,000 of such funds shall be used for such purposes, and not more than $500,000 may be so used.

"(g) Any State which desires to receive a grant under this section shall develop a two year comprehensive program plan with annual modifications which shall be submitted to the Commissioner, at such time and in such manner as the Commissioner may by regulation require. Each such plan shall contain—

"(1)(A) a plain for allocating funds received under such grant among local educational agencies for programs authorized by this section which is based upon (i) the number of children in elementary and secondary schools in that State who are in need of such programs, and (ii) a priority for successful programs which have received assistance under this title for preceding fiscal years, and which takes into account the size of the program necessary to be successful, in keeping with the purposes of this Act;

"(B) the criteria used for distribution among local educational agencies, including the need for the program, the number of children to be served, the cost of the program, and program content and methodology".

"(2) procedures for receiving applications from local educational agencies in the State for funds from grants under this section;

"(3) priorities of needs and policies set for the establishment of programs under this section which meet applicable requirements;

"(4) bilingual program standards for programs of instruction and training under this section which takes into account successful projects;

"(5) assurances that programs assisted from the State grant under this section will meet all applicable requirements for such programs under this section;

"(6) provision for coordination with available State and local resources;

"(7) assurances that different language groups in need of programs under this section will be taken into account;

"(8) assurances that funds from grants under this section will be used so as to supplement and to the extent practical, increase the level of funds that would, in the absence of such funds be made available by the State for the purposes described in this section, and in no case to supplant such funds;

"(9) assurances that State and local fiscal effort for such purposes will be maintained, on a per pupil or aggregate expenditure basis, as compared with the second preceding fiscal year, except that the Commissioner may waive this requirement under extraordinary circumstances;

"(10) provide a system for fiscal control and fund accounting procedures to be adopted;

"(11) provide for evaluations of programs at least on an annual basis, following criteria established by the Commissioner under section 731;

"(12) take into account the State and local educational agency's ability to assume long-term program costs;

"(13) take into account the availability and use of bilingual teachers and bilingual-related personnel; and

"(14) assurances that the plan was prepared in consultation with local educational agencies, parents, and teachers of children with limited English proficiency.

"ASSISTANCE TO LOCAL EDUCATIONAL AGENCIES ELIGIBLE UNDER THE EMERGENCY SCHOOL AID ACT

"SEC. 752. (a)(1) The Commissioner, from funds appropriated under subsection (c), shall carry out a program to meet the needs of minority group children who are from an environment in which a dominant language is other than English and who, because of language barriers and cultural differences, do not have equality of educational opportunity. From such funds the Commissioner is authorized to make grants to, and contracts with—

"(A) private nonprofit agencies, institutions, and organizations to develop curricula materials and training techniques at the request of one or more educational agencies which are eligible for assistance under section 706 of the Emergency School Aid Act designed to meet the special educational needs of minority group children who are from environments in which a dominant language is other than English, for the development of reading, writing, and speaking skills, in the English language and in the language of their parents or grandparents, and to meet the educational needs of such children and their classmates to understand the history and cultural background of the minority groups of which such children are members;

"(B) local educational agencies eligible for assistance under such section 706 for the purpose of engaging in such activities; or

"(C) local educational agencies which are eligible to receive assistance under such section 706, for the purpose of carrying out activities to implement curricula developed under clauses (A) and (B) or curricula otherwise developed which the Commissioner determines meets the purposes stated in clause (A).

"(2)(A) In order to be eligible for a grant or contract under this subsection—

"(i) a local educational agency shall establish a program or project committee meeting the requirements of subparagraph (B), which will fully participate in the preparation of the application under this subsection and in the implementation of the program or project and join in submitting such application; and

"(ii) a private nonprofit agency, institution, or organization shall (I) establish a program or project board of not less than ten members which meets the requirements of subparagraph (B) and which shall exercise policymaking authority with respect to the program or project and (II) have demonstrated to the Commissioner that it has the capacity to obtain the services of adequately trained and qualified staff.

"(B) A program or project committee or board, established pursuant to subparagraph (A), must be broadly representative of parents, school officials, teachers, and interested members of the community or communities to be served, not less than half of the members of which shall be parents and not less than half of the members of which shall be members of the minority group the educational needs of which the program or project is intended to meet.

"(3) All programs or projects assisted under this subsection shall be specifically designed to complement any programs or projects carried out by the local educational agency under section 706 of the Emergency School Aid Act. The Commissioner shall insure that programs of Federal financial assistance related to the purposes of this subsection are coordinated and carried out in a manner consistent with the provisions of this subsection, to the extent consistent with other law.

"(b) All programs or projects assisted under subsection (a) shall be part of a program of bilingual-bicultural education.

"(c) There are authorized to be appropriated to carry out subsection (a) $10,000,000 for the fiscal year 1979, $15,000,000 for the fiscal year 1980, and $20,000,000 for the fiscal year 1981; $25,000,000 for the fiscal year 1982 and $30,000,000 for the fiscal year 1983."

SEC. 3. (a) Section 704(b) of the Emergency School Aid Act is amended to read as follows:

"(b) From the sums appropriated pursuant to subsection (a) for any fiscal year, the Assistant Secretary shall reserve an amount equal to 9 per centum thereof for the purposes of sections 708(a), 711, and 713, of which not less than an amount equal to 3 per centum of such sums shall be for the purposes of section 711."

(2) Section 708(a)(1) of such Act is amended by striking out "designated for purposes of clause (A) or (B) thereof," and inserting in lieu thereof "reserved for purposes of section 711".

(c) Section 710 of the Emergency School Aid Act is amended—

(1) by striking out "except in the case of applications under section 708(c)," in subsection (a)(1);

(2) by striking out "or section 708(c)" in subsection (a)(9);

(3) by striking out "or, in the case of an application under section 708(c), would assist in meeting the needs described in that subsection," in subsection (a)(12);

(4) by striking out "and (c)" in the matter preceding paragraph (1) of subsection (c); and

(5) by striking out "or (c)" in subsection (f).

(d) Section 711 of the Emergency School Aid Act is amended by striking out "section 704(b)(2)(A)" and inserting in lieu thereof "section 704(b)".

(e) Section 712(c)(1) of the Emergency School Aid Act is amended—

(1) by striking out "or in the case of an application under section 708(c) would assist in meeting the needs described in that subsection";

(2) by striking out "or, in the case of an application under section 708(c), from funds reserved under section 704(b)(2)(A),"; and

(3) by striking out "section 704(b)(2) for" and inserting in lieu thereof "section 704(b) for".

(f) Section 713 of the Emergency School Aid Act is amended by striking out "section 704(b)(2)" and inserting in lieu thereof "section 704(b)".

● Mr. HART. Mr. President, I am honored to join with my distinguished colleague from New Mexico (Mr. DOMENICI) in introducing the Bilingual Education Act Amendments of 1978.

Almost 10 years have passed since Federal funding was first made available for bilingual education projects under title VII of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act. During this decade, funding has increased steadily as more and more communities have sought help in establishing worthwhile programs of instruction for language-minority children. Funds have also been made available for teacher training and for the development of bilingual texts and other education materials.

We recognize these achievements and applaud them, but title VII programs still fall far short of what is needed. Further, the continued focus of that program on loosely defined demonstration projects invites inadequate, part-time approaches that contribute little either to the children enrolled or to the public perception of what bilingual education ought to be.

The bill which Senator DOMENICI and I have introduced provides for an orderly transition during the 5 years of the reauthorization period to a more comprehensive and rigorous program that will be vastly more responsive to the real needs of language-minority children.

Mr. President, I would like to outline the dimension of the challenge facing bilingual education programs in the years ahead. While there is still some disagreement as to the total numbers of school-age children in this country whose native language is other than English—some estimates range as high as 3.6 million—there is substantial agreement that between 1.2 and 1.5 million of these children are unable to function adequately in school, because of their incomplete command of English.

For most of these children, school is a "sink or swim" proposition. They must struggle to do course work without being able to fully understand, read, or write the language of instruction. Not too surprisingly, the results are often low achievement scores and high dropout rates. Another frequent result, noted in a 1970 report of the Civil Rights Commission, is massive and inaccurate assignment of language-minority children to special education classes for the mentally retarded.

During the 1970's, educators developed two approaches to breaking the barriers to learning faced by language-minority children. One method, called English as a second language (ESL), emphasizes teaching the student to communicate in English as quickly as possible. But instruction is generally limited to 30 to 40 minutes in each school day; for the rest of the day, ESL children are back in the 'sink or swim" syndrome of trying to keep up in science, mathematics, social studies, and other courses taught in a language they only partially understand.

An alternative approach was offered by bilingual education. This approach is based on the idea that learning should continue in the native language while the new language—English—is being mastered. Bilingual education starts from the premise that learning English does not require the child to reject the native language—in fact, the child is encouraged to maintain and perfect mastery of the native language while he or she is achieving command of English. Bilingual education is not a single technology, or a unique method. It is better described as a total educational strategy for teaching language-minority children.

Mr. President, I am proud that my home State of Colorado has been a leader in developing programs of bilingual education. The Bilingual-Bicultural Act passed by the Colorado State Legislature in 1975 has been heralded as one of the most comprehensive of its type. Some of the provisions of that law are reflected in the bill that Senator DOMENICI and I are proposing.

Let me share with you some of the factors that encouraged Coloradans to enact this law, and some of the insights we have gained during the early years of our comprehensive participation in full bilingual programs. The largest language minority in Colorado is the Spanish-speaking population. Nearly 25 percent of our school-age children are from this group. When we began the bilingual education program, only about 60 percent of Chicano children completed high school. The dropout rate was a whopping 34.9 percent, nearly double that of Anglo children. Three times as many Chicano children were placed in classes for the mentally retarded; eight times as many were held back at least 1 year. It was clear to our educators and lawmakers that the problem was a deep-seated institutional one that required a totally different educational strategy.

The Colorado program calls for full-time bilingual instruction, and seeks to enrich the student's understanding of his native language and culture as well as to teach him English. The enrollment of Anglo children is also encouraged; and, perhaps most important, strong parental involvement in program development and implementation is mandated.

The program has been in place only long enough for us to make preliminary evaluations. It will be a decade before we can speak with confidence about its impact on dropout and completion rates, or on total academic achievement. But the initial evaluations are showing a pattern of markedly improved achievement by children enrolled in bilingual programs. Standardized tests of enrollees show improved scores in all basic subjects, including language skills. These students are not only performing better than Chicano children in those grade levels in earlier years, but their performance also compares favorably with the scores of Anglo children in other schools in the community. Educators in our State are deeply pleased by these early indicators.

Mr. President, I point to the Colorado experience not only out of pride in my State's leadership in this area, but also because I believe it underscores the need for a commitment to a more comprehensive educational approach in the Federal title VII programs. Bilingual education is still a relatively new concept. In some respects, it is not an easy program to implement—it requires fully bilingual teachers, for example, and bilingual textbooks and materials in all basic subjects. School systems that have tried short cuts have sometimes fallen back to programs that were little more than English as a second language. The Federal title VII program has, to be frank, not always been as selective and vigorous as it should have been.

Critics of bilingual education point to some of these difficulties and shortcomings, and argue that they preclude moving the Federal title VII program toward more comprehensive coverage. They call for another 5 years of "demonstration projects" to further test and evaluate the techniques and methods of bilingual instruction. We believe, on the contrary, that we must not delay any longer. While we engage in continued experimentation and limit support to a relatively small number of demonstration projects, millions of language-minority children will continue to struggle through a curriculum that does not meet their educational needs. It is clear that well conceived, full-time bilingual programs, properly staffed by bilingual teachers and supported by parents and educators, can greatly enrich the entire educational process. If anything, title VII programs must be faulted for not reaching high enough.

The bill which Senator DOMENICI and I have introduced would build on the experience achieved to date in both title VII programs and successful State and local programs such as those in Colorado and New Mexico. The approach we propose would allow for an orderly transition of the program, providing for immediate tightening up of title VII programs and more rigorous selection of projects, then moving rapidly to a more comprehensive program in partnership with State and local education agencies.●

At the request of Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD, on behalf of Mr. ABOUREZK, the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. SCHMITT) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 405, to make the Select Committee on Indian Affairs a permanent committee.

SENATE RESOLUTION 414

At the request of Mr. PERCY, the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. ZORINSKY), and the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE) were added as cosponsors of Senate Resolution 414, a resolution to study the feasibility of installing a solar energy system in the Dirksen Office Building extension.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 71

At the request of Mr. MCGOVERN, the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Concurrent Resolution 71, a resolution requesting the United Nations to convene a World Alternate Energy Conference and establish an International Alternate Energy Commission.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED FOR PRINTING

ELECTRONIC FUND TRANSFER CONSUMER PROTECTION AMENDMENTS—S. 2546

AMENDMENTS NOS. 1747 THROUGH 1751

Mr. BROOKE submitted five amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (S. 2546) to amend the Consumer Credit Protection Act to provide consumer rights and remedies in electronic fund transfer systems.

● Mr. BROOKE. Mr. President, I am introducing amendments to the bills beginning markup by the Banking Committee which establish consumer protections and responsibilities in electronic fund transfer systems. These amendments address some of the objections to EFT consumer legislation raised by financial institutions and others while insuring that basic consumer protections are provided in new electronic banking services.

Many representatives of the financial industry urge the Banking Committee to delay action on any EFT consumer protections because restrictions will stifle innovative competition for customers of new banking services and hinder further development of electronic banking. They further argue that EFT systems can increase payment convenience and security for consumers and reduce the cost and time of fund transfers for financial institutions and merchants and, thus, should be allowed to develop in an unrestricted fashion. I agree with this assessment of potential benefits from EFT, but also recognize that increasing numbers of fund transfers are made electronically and that consumers must be assured they will not lose the protections now provided in the check and credit card payment systems.

I believe the Banking Committee should proceed to mark up S. 2470 and S. 2546 in order to preserve basic consumer protections as payments shift from check and credit card systems to electronic fund transfers. In several areas where these bills differ, I am proposing compromise amendments to insure that consumer protections are maintained but without imposing unnecessary hindrances on EFT services. Compromises may be appropriate in other areas which the committee agenda identifies as outstanding issues. My amendments are offered, though, to begin the process of maintaining consumer protections while recognizing legitimate concerns of financial institutions and others involved in providing electronic fund transfer systems.

ANALYSIS OF THE AMENDMENTS

Amendment No. 1747 will require the Federal Reserve Board to issue model clauses for disclosure of EFT terms and conditions. By using appropriate model disclosure clauses financial institutions will be assured of meeting the disclosure requirements and consumers will be informed in readily understandable language of their rights and responsibilities and other account terms relating to electronic banking services.

Flexibility in disclosure requirements will be provided by amendment No. 1748. First, the Federal Reserve Board is authorized to determine when disclosures are made. Generally full disclosure of EFT rights and responsibilities would be made when a consumer signs up for a new electronic banking service. However, when a consumer authorizes his employer to deposit his salary electronically, disclosures by the bank may be practical only after the first electronic fund deposit is made. Second, this amendment will not require disclosure of limitations on EFT account usage that would compromise EFT system security. Consumers should be informed of most limitations on account usage so they would not, for example, discover late at night or in an emergency situation that only a limited amount of cash can be withdrawn from an automated teller machine. The Board however is given flexibility to waive disclosure of the details of limitations if their confidentiality is necessary for system security. This could include the particular usage patterns that would trigger a security system to suspect fraudulent use and freeze further use of the EFT card. Finally, this amendment permits changes in an EFT system without prior disclosure to consumers if those changes must be implemented quickly to maintain or restore the system's security.

Amendment No. 1749 recognizes the legitimate point that many savings associations are not equipped to prepare regular account statements and are now receiving electronic deposits of salary and social security benefits with passbooks providing the documentation of account transfers. This amendment will allow continued use of passbooks for accounts which only receive deposits electronically. Where electronic payments are made from an account, periodic statements are required so consumers will have clear and frequent records of funds withdrawn from their account.

A highly controversial issue in electronic fund transfers is whether consumers should be able to withhold payment from a merchant if there is a dispute about the goods or services. Consumers can now stop payment on a check or withhold payment on certain credit card purchases for over $50 and they seek similar protection against faulty merchandise if purchases are made through EFT. Financial institutions and retailers argue that electronic fund transfers will be instantaneous and should be treated like final payments in cash. Furthermore, the proposed reversal provision of S. 2546 is seen as inviting abuse of the system by allowing consumers to reverse a transfer over $50 within 3 days even if there is no dispute with the merchant and then leaving the merchant without recourse to settle the dispute and get paid or to have the purchase returned.

Finally it is argued that EFT systems will not be accepted by merchants if even a limited reversal procedure is required. The evidence speaks against this. Credit cards are widely accepted even with provision for consumers to withhold payment on disputed purchases for over $50. No evidence has been presented that consumers abuse the protection afforded by withholding credit card payments or stopping payment on checks, and only an infinitesimal percentage of purchases are the subject of disputes which require use of these features.

Amendment No. 1750 provides that consumers can reverse a transfer over $50 within 3 days of the purchase if the reversal is based on a dispute about the amount of the transfer or the goods or services. Written confirmation of the dispute from the consumer can be required by the financial institution and provided to the merchant. The reversal would not affect the underlying purchase agreement between the merchant and the consumer. This amendment is very similar to the current Federal law about withholding payment on certain credit card purchases. Finally, the Federal Reserve Board is authorized to provide for value dating or other mechanisms which provide the same consumer protection as reversal. Hence the legislation would not constrain EFT systems to any particular technological mechanism for conditional payments.

Finally, amendment No. 1751 recognizes that other consumer protection laws, such as the Truth-in-Lending Act, have inadvertently resulted in lawsuits over highly technical interpretations of requirements even where financial institutions have tried to meet their obligations. This amendment will encourage EFT providers to resolve any errors or consumer inquiries outside of court by providing that there is no civil liability for any consumer inquiry or other error resolved under the error resolution procedure or for any compliance failure corrected before a consumer lawsuit is filed. In correcting a compliance failure the consumer would be compensated for any actual damages unless there was a technical malfunction beyond the financial institution's control.●

(Ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.)

Mr. BROOKE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2637) to amend and extend certain Federal laws relating to housing, community and neighborhood development and preservation, and related programs, and for other purposes.

OLDER AMERICANS ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1978—S. 2609

Mr. DOMENICI submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2609) to amend the Older Americans Act of 1965 to provide for an extension of programs under that act, and for other purposes.

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I am sending to the desk for printing an amendment to S. 2609, the Older Americans Act Amendments of 1978. The text of the bill which I introduced on February 28 inadvertently omitted an important provision which I mentioned in my introductory remarks. The amendment I am sending to the desk corrects this error by restoring the omitted language to the bill.

The substantive provisions affected by this amendment relate to the title VII nutrition program for senior citizens as outlined in my original introductory statement. I would like to summarize briefly the changes contained in this amendment. First, the title VII program would be authorized to subcontract its home delivered meals activities to existing "Meals-on-Wheels" organizations. Second, this amendment would prohibit the Commissioner from setting arbitrary limits on the home-delivered meal program by regulation, rule, guideline, and so forth. Third, this amendment provides that homebound elderly and handicapped individuals may receive home-delivered meals under the title VII program. By structuring this provision so that participation is based upon an assessment of need and not an arbitrary quota, we feel we have tailored the program to fit the needs of people rather than the other way around.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this amendment be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMENDMENT NO. 1753

On page 6, line 12, strike out "(1)".

On page 6, line 14, insert "clause (1) of" after "in".

On page 34, between lines 10 and 11, insert the following:

(d)(1) Section 706(a)(7) is amended by inserting after "provide" a comma and the following: "except as set forth in subsection (b) of this section,".

(2) Section 706 is amended by redesignating subsection (b), and all references thereto, as subsection (c) and by inserting immediately after subsection (a) the following new subsection:

"(b)(1) In allotting funds for nutrition projects under subsection (a) of this section, consideration shall be given, where feasible, to the use of organizations, such as meals-on-wheels groups, which have demonstrated an ability to provide home delivered meals efficiently and reasonably.

"(2) No quotas on the number of home delivered meals may be set by the Commissioner under the provisions of this title.

"(3) Elderly individuals may receive home delivered meals in a nutrition project based upon a determination of need made by the recipient of a grant or contract entered into under the provisions of this title.

"(4) Individuals who are handicapped but not elderly may receive home delivered meals in a nutrition project based upon a determination of need made by the recipient of a grant or contract entered into under the provisions of this section; and such services are financed to the extent feasible from sources other than funds made available under section 708 of this Act."

On page 34, line 11, strike out "(d)" and insert in lieu thereof "(e)".

On page 34, line 16, strike out "(e)" and insert in lieu thereof "(f)".

PANAMA CANAL TREATY—EX. N, 95–1

AMENDMENT NO. 90

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. STEVENS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Panama Canal Treaty, Ex. N, 95–1.

AMENDMENT NO. 91

(Ordered to be printed.)

Mr. ALLEN (for himself, Mr. HATCH and Mr. HELMS) proposed an amendment to the Panama Canal Treaty, Ex. N, 95–1.

AMENDMENT NO. 92

Mr. HATCH (for himself, Mr. ALLEN, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. GARN, Mr. HELMS, Mr. LAXALT, Mr. MCCLURE, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. EASTLAND, and Mr. GOLDWATER) proposed an amendment to the Panama Canal Treaty, Ex. N, 95–1.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON SEPARATION OF POWERS

● Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I wish to announce that on Monday, April 3, 1978, at 11:30 a.m., in room 1418, Russell Senate Office Building, the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers of the Committee on the Judiciary will hold a meeting for consideration of and action on the staff draft of the subcommittee report on the congressional power to dispose of public property in the Isthmus of Panama.●

SUBCOMMITTEE ON NUTRITION

● Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, I wish to announce that the Subcommittee on Nutrition of the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry will conduct hearings on April 4, 6, and 12 on two important nutrition programs. Both the WIC—women and infant children feeding program—and the child care food program will expire at the end of this fiscal year, unless the Congress moves to extend these programs. The purpose of these hearings will be to determine how well the programs have worked and what can be done to improve them. The subcommittee will meet on April 4 at 10 a.m., on April 6 at 9 a.m., and on April 12 at 8:30 a.m. in room 324, Russell.

Oral statements will be limited to 10 minutes, but written statements may be of any length and will be inserted in the record in their entirety. Anyone wishing to testify should contact Denise Love, hearing clerk, at 202–224–2035.●

COMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

● Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I wish to announce for the information of the Senate and the public, the following schedule of meetings before the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources beginning April 4, 1978:

April 4—Energy Research and Development Subcommittee: 9 a.m., room 3110, hearing. S. 2692, Department of Energy authorization bill.

April 5—Full committee: 9 a.m., room 3110, hearing. S. 499, S, 1500, S. 1546, S. 1787, S. 2465, lands of national interests legislation.

April 6—Parks and Recreation Subcommittee: 10 a.m., room 3110, hearing. S. 1655, Lowell National Cultural Park, S. 2699, relating to the preservation of historical and archeological data in the parks; S. 2566, to amend the Pennsylvania Avenue Development Corporation Act of 1972.

April 6—Energy Production and Supply Subcommittee: 10 a.m., room 6226, hearing. S. 419, to test the commercial, environmental, and social viability of oil shale technologies.

April 7—Public Lands and Resources Subcommittee: 10 a.m., room 3110, hearing. S. 74, to amend the Act of October 20, 1976, re payment in lieu of taxes.

April 7—Energy Research and Development Subcommittee: 9 a.m., room 3110, hearing. S. 2692, Department of Energy authorization bill.●

COMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

● Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I wish to announce for the information of the Senate and the public, the scheduling of public hearings before the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

The hearings are scheduled for April 8 and April 15, 1978. The first hearing will begin at 8 a.m., in the north auditorium of the New Federal Building at Second and Madison Streets in Seattle, Wash. The second day of hearings will begin at 8 a.m., in the auditorium of the Bonneville Power Administration Building at 1002 NE., Holladay Street in Portland, Oreg. Testimony is invited regarding S. 2080, the proposed Pacific Northwest Electric Power Supply and Conservation Act, related amendments, and issues associated with electric power planning and production in the Pacific Northwest.

For further information about the hearings you may wish to contact Joel Merkel at extension 43441. Because of widespread interest in the subject area of these hearings, it is necessary to limit the number of witnesses appearing at each hearing. Those wishing to testify or submit a written statement for the hearing record should write to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C. 20510.●

CHANGES IN HEARING DATE AND ROOM

ARBITRATION OF CIVIL CASES IN UNITED STATES COURTS

● Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, on February 1, 1978, I announced that public hearings would be held by the Subcommittee on Improvements in Judicial Machinery of the Committee on the Judiciary on S. 2253, a bill to amend title 28 of the United States Code to encourage prompt, informal, and inexpensive resolution of civil cases by use of arbitration in U.S. district courts, and for other purposes.

I wish to notice that the hearings will be held on April 14, 1978, in room 4232, Dirksen Senate Office Building, rather than on April 11, in room 2228, Dirksen Senate Office Building, commencing at 9 a.m.

Those who wish to testify or submit a statement for inclusion in the record should communicate as soon as possible with the Subcommittee on Improvements in Judicial Machinery, 2228 Dirksen Senate Office Building, telephone 202–224–3618, Washington, D.C. 20510.●

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

UNFAIR DISCRIMINATION BY PROPERTY AND CASUALTY INSURANCE COMPANIES

● Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, on January 17 and 18, 1978, the Subcommittee on Citizens and Shareholders Rights and Remedies of the Judiciary Committee, which I chair, held hearings on discrimination by property and casualty insurance companies. Specifically, the subcommittee explored whether the use of such categories as age, sex, race, neighborhood, occupation, and marital status for underwriting and rating purposes unfairly discriminates against broad classes of consumers. At issue is the acceptability of classifications based on personal characteristics that consumers cannot control and that have no causal relationship to losses or risks. I want to report to the Senate the results of these hearings and of subcommittee investigations of some insurance industry practices. Response to the hearings from individual consumers has been enormous. Their letters have attacked a great variety of practices by the insurance industry in relation not only to property and casualty insurance, but also to life, health, accident, and mutual insurance issues.

Insurance has become a necessity of our daily living. Unless it is available at fair rates, many consumers will not be able to drive cars or own homes. Thus, the issues examined in the subcommittee hearings now have, and will continue to have, a deep and long-term impact on the average American.

The testimony at the hearings revealed that serious problems exist in the availability and affordability of essential insurance. A persuasive case has been made that in order to maximize profits, property and casualty companies are rejecting "clean" risks in an apparent attempt to eliminate all but the ideal policyholder, that is, one with no losses.

Company underwriting guidelines received by the subcommittee list as bad risks military personnel, waiters and waitresses, unskilled manual laborers, musicians, porters and janitors, any consumer who "can be seen sitting on his front porch without his shirt," and even the "just plain ornery." Many Members of this body would not survive application of that standard. One auto insurance company listed 83 occupations in order of preference for underwriting purposes, with church workers at the bottom of the list. These underwriting categories are used even though an insurance company executive testified that they have not been—and in some cases cannot be—statistically verified.

Most companies view the so-called "model risk" as married and require special scrutiny of divorced and widowed consumers. The auto insurance rates of one consumer witness increased 86 percent when she became widowed even though she had had no accident or violation in 24 years.

Other consumer witnesses complained about the "redlining" of whole sections of cities by property insurance companies. A witness from St. Louis complained that she and her neighbors are unable to obtain homeowners insurance. She lives in a middle-class, 90-percent black neighborhood with homes in excellent condition.

All seven of the subcommittee's consumer witnesses had the same complaint: They cannot get insurance at fair and affordable rates even though they have clean loss records.

Consumers who are denied auto insurance in the so-called standard and preferred markets are consigned to nonstandard rates or to "assigned risk" pools. Many consumers are insured at nonstandard rates 35 to 100 percent higher than standard levels without even knowing it. Homeowners living in redlined neighborhoods are unable to obtain comprehensive property insurance on their homes and are forced into the high priced market of less desirable coverage, nonstandard companies, or State fair plans. In that market, homeowners must pay higher premiums per dollar of coverage than suburban homeowners pay while receiving less comprehensive coverage. As a result, insurance redlining is contributing to the exodus of property owners from the central city.

That "clean" risks land in State fair plans and "assigned risk" pools is undeniable. The chief actuary for a State insurance department has concluded that approximately 60 to 70 percent of insurance consumers in automobile "assigned risk" plans are "clean" risks. In fact, an executive for a large insurance company has stated:

> Many drivers who are put in assigned risk pools often don't really belong there, but they're there . . . because of agency terminations, capacity problems and arbitrary, subjective underwriting judgments.

Further, according to the Federal Insurance Administration, of the 3 million policies written in the State fair plans between 1968 and 1974, only 4.8 percent, less than 1 out of 20, sustained a loss annually; approximately 95 percent of all the fair policies were found to be loss free.

The property and casualty insurance industry suggests that there is statistical justification for the rating criteria they use. In fact, such categories have been challenged by industry critics as superficial, with no direct causal relationship to possible losses. More significantly, the industry's approach to classifying risks forces whole segments of the population to pay higher premiums as a result of the conduct of a relatively few persons in each class.

Insurance commissioner James M. Stone of Massachusetts stated at the hearings:

> I think it is time we stopped the practice of assuming that a young, male or urban policyholder is guilty until proven innocent. Chromosome count and the year of your birth should not determine what you pay for essential property insurance. People should be charged for what they do, not what they are.

To illustrate his statement Commissioner Stone gave a particularly startling example of current rate inequities. In 1977 a resident of the wealthy, suburban town of Concord, Mass., with frequent traffic accidents, could have purchased a full package of auto insurance coverage for $200. In sharp contrast, a 24-year-old workingman in the urban and predominantly black North Dorchester section of Boston, who had driven 7 years without an accident or violation, would have paid more than $2,500 for the same coverage on the same car with the same company.

In addition, the New Jersey Department of Insurance reports that an adult who lives in Flemington, N.J., and commutes 50 miles each way to a job in Newark pays $321 a year for liability, comprehensive, and collision insurance; while, a 19-year-old unmarried male driver with a clean record living in Newark and driving only 10 blocks to work pays $1,888 for the same auto insurance coverage.

erty and casualty insurance industry practices suggest that personal characteristics such as age, sex, occupation, race, territory, and marital status—which an individual cannot control—should not be the basis for denying consumers insurance, or for making it available only at very high rates.

The consumer response to our hearings has been extraordinary and the numerous unsolicited accounts of unfair treatment I have received substantiate the evidence produced at the hearings.

In a letter to me, a 74-year-old woman explained that she had insured her home for 45 years and never made a claim when her company notified her that they would not renew her property insurance policy. Her despair in such treatment was clear when she wrote:

> I spent several uneasy weeks, thinking property was too old, that I was too old or neighborhood was deteriorating. Do not know yet what happened.

In fact she was given no explanation whatsoever for the company's nonrenewal decision.

Another consumer wrote that despite a perfect driving record, her auto insurance rates increased after her divorce. The auto insurance rates of her former husband were not increased.

Still another consumer wrote:

> After driving for about 40 years, I bumped a car (parked unlawfully) at a laundromat. . . . It was a tiny dent. I sent the claim of $135 to [my insurance company].
> My new premium showed that the rate was doubled. [The company] tells me they will reduce it during the next several years. I will have paid the claim at least three times.

Such letters as these lead me to ask whether insurance companies operate to insure policyholders against losses or to protect themselves from all claims. Practices such as indiscriminate cancellations and nonrenewals of policies and large premium increases suggest that for some companies the interests of consumers have the lowest priority.

I am attaching hereto the texts of additional consumer letters as samples of the many I have received on this issue.

Independent insurance agents who have written to me confirm that the types of discrimination suggested by these consumer letters are not isolated but a part of a pattern of practice of much of the property and casualty insurance industry. In addition, some insurance company attempts to analyze the personal characteristics of prospective policyholders involve serious invasions of privacy.

One independent agent from Milwaukee, Wis., Mr. Terry L. Thomas, sent me a copy of a questionnaire that one of the auto insurance companies he represents requires all prospective policyholders to complete. The questionnaire, which I am attaching, asks such questions as:

> Are (or did) your parents disapprove of some of your close friends?; and do you believe it is better to express feelings openly than to bottle them up?

Mr. Thomas characterized the questionnaire as "reprehensible, irresponsible and an invasion of our clients' personal lives." I agree wholeheartedly with him that we "should not allow these violations to perpetuate themselves".

With the exception of a few outspoken—even courageous—State insurance commissioners, some of whom testified at our hearings, the States appear unable to deal with unfair insurance practices or with discrimination in the cost and availability of essential insurance. Individual consumers, city and county officials, a few State insurance commissioners, and the Deputy Federal Insurance Administrator who testified at our hearings all emphasized the inadequacy of State regulation.

A number of witnesses, including Commissioner John Randolph Ingram of North Carolina and Supervisor Kenneth Hahn of Los Angeles County, called for repeal of the McCarran-Ferguson Act. The statute not only exempts the insurance industry from Federal antitrust regulation—the only major industry to be so exempted, but over the years the executive branch has treated the act as largely preemptive of all Federal regulation. A case now before the U.S. Supreme Court, St. Paul Fire & Marine Insurance Co. against Barry (No. 77–240), may signal a change in that trend. In an amicus curiae brief the U.S. Department of Justice argues that the McCarran-Ferguson Act does not exempt such acts as boycott, coercion, or intimidation by insurance companies against their policyholders from the application of the Sherman Act. If the Court agrees with this interpretation, insurance redlining practices could be subject to Federal antitrust challenge. This would solve some, but not all, of the problems I have been discussing. I have asked the staff of the subcommittee to examine alternative legislative solutions to the availability and affordability crises in property and casualty insurance. Once I have anlyzed the proposed solutions I will introduce remedial legislation.

Problems in the availablity and affordability of essential insurance are not new, but they are more serious today than ever before. These problems underscore the failure of our society to protect the rights of the individual and to insure that he or she is equally treated by large and powerful organizations—whether these be governments, huge corporations, or entire industries. It is time we acted to redress this imbalance in the insurance field, as in others, by guaranteeing American citizens a right to fair treatment.

LETTERS

GENTLEMEN: I'm delighted that you're taking a long-overdue look at automobile insurance companies' present rating practices.

An outrageous example of their manic methods was the recent cancellation of my daughter's insurance by Civil Service Employee's Insurance Co., via their Flagstaff, Arizona office.

My daughter, 24 years old, is a graduate student at the University of Arizona at Tucson. Last school year she attended graduate school at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, where her insurance was with Nationwide. For her '76 Fiat, she paid $75 every six months. When she reinsured in Arizona with CSE, the premium became $120 every six months. Then within 30 days, she received an enigmatic letter telling her that the insurance was cancelled by CSE.

She phoned the Flagstaff office and was told by "Barbara" that the company had cancelled because Bridget was a transient. Bewildered, my daughter pressed for clarification. The final, and I do mean final, "explanation" was that Bridget was a "waitress and waitresses are considered transients."

On the CSE application, Bridget had noted that in addition to being a full time student she also had part time employment at a restaurant as a waitress. (She worked approximately two evenings a week, for about 3–4 hours).

When Bridget applied to other companies, she was quoted exorbitant rates or outright refusal to insure because she had been "cancelled."

She phoned every conceivable agency in Tucson, federal, state, county and city, for help. The unanimous answer was that there was nothing to be done: "That's the way insurance companies operate."

Bridget's driving record is, thank God, unblemished. No accident, no tickets. Her one insurance claim was several years ago, for $100 when her windshield was broken by a passing truck's churning up of a rock. She was a high school honor student, on the dean's list with honors for junior college, is a registered nurse with her BS in nursing (also graduating with honors), and is now completing her studies this year for her master's degree. The part time waitress job was to help with school expenses.

And if, indeed, she were a full time waitress, what then? Does this mean Arizona waitresses are, per se, transients who are unworthy of automobile insurance?

I certainly hope you will recommend legislation which will end such idiotic and cruel practices on the part of insurance companies who wield such unmonitored power over the lives of all of us.

Sincerely,

HELEN B. TETLEY,
Long Beach, Calif.

SIR: I whole-heartedly support you in your efforts to repeal the McCarran-Ferguson Act. That the State of Michigan has not protected all of its citizens from the powers of the monolithic insurance industry is one reason why this repeal should take place. As an example of this power, the insurance industry, both automobile and homeowner, has virtually written the city of Detroit off as too great an insurance risk—really redlined. Even though Michigan has a no-fault automobile insurance law which was to reduce premium costs, my insurance rates have increased $111.00 in a period of one year.

I believe these costs are based on pure and outright discrimination because I live in a central city where costs are supposedly based on the greater risk factors. Incidentally, I have never had a traffic violation nor an automobile accident in over twenty years.

The above conditions exist as to homeowners insurance. In particular, after 17 years and with not one claim filed with my insurance company, my comprehensive homeowners policy was terminated. I was placed in a high risk state insurance pool where I could only obtain the basic fire-insurance. This coverage would have cost $50.00 more than my previous policy. After searching for a new insurance company, I was only able to receive a fire, limited extended, and personal liabilities coverages. Some insurance companies stated that they were not writing insurance in Detroit, others that their coverages would be limited. It does not seem to me that the State of Michigan is protecting all of its citizens.

Public safety is one of the basic tenets upon which government grants licenses to monopolies which serve the general public. All citizens should be equally protected with all the insurance coverages available and with just and uniform rates.

For the above reasons, I support your endeavor to repeal the McCarran-Ferguson Act. I hope that you and your colleagues will pass Federal insurance legislation which will be fair and beneficial to all Americans.

Yours truly,

ISAIAH GASTON.

DETROIT, MICH.

DEAR SENATOR METZENBAUM: I was very interested in the article in the Washington Post this morning about the insurance companies. I feel it is about time someone looked into the way they set their rates.

Last year I purchased a new car and was told by my agent (Allstate) that my premium would not go up too much at the time of renewal. I was paying about $380.00 annually at that time. I had expected the premium to go as high as $500.00 when I renewed. When I received the new premium the rate was raised to $986.00 a year. I felt there had to be a mistake as I was eligible for their good driver's rates and had never had an accident. When I discussed the matter with my agent, he told me that the rate was in fact correct and further explained that Allstate was trying to discourage customers who were males, single, and under twenty-five. They did not take into consideration that in my eight years of driving I had had no accidents or moving violations. The agent pointed out that had I not been eligible for their good driving policy they would not have given me the option to renew my policy. After six years of faithfully paying my premiums and never having a claim filed against me, I felt they were treating me poorly. However the agent did tell me that if my parents carried a policy with Allstate my rates would be reduced substantially.

In shopping around for a new insurance company I found the same problem; no one wanted to insure me because of my age, sex, and marital status. One Hartford agent offered to carry me if I doubled the amount of coverage in my then existing policy. Again the premium would have cost me close to a thousand dollars a year. I certainly didn't need that much coverage. I finally settled on Liberty Mutual, whose agent offered me a fair price. After "saving" me all that money he wanted me to take out a life insurance policy for the amount I "saved". I somehow felt that I was given a fair rate in hopes that I would buy a life insurance policy. I shudder to think what they might raise my rates to this year.

I must say that after my ordeal with insurance companies my one time dim view of them has turned to utter contempt. I hope that you and your committee are successful in finding a solution to insurance problems. I agree with you that rates should be set by your driving record not age, sex, and marital status. Thank you for the opportunity to sound off a bit.

Sincerely,

CHARLES A. ZUVER.

MCLEAN, VA.

DEAR SENATOR METZENBAUM: I read where you are working on the insurance companies rate program, charging our young people and our elder people high rates.

One example is our grandson, who will be 20 years old, served in the Marines and has driven cars, jeeps, trucks since he was 16 years old.

We checked with several insurance companies and every one wanted to rate him up from $600.00 to $800.00 per year for the same coverage that other people get for about $135.00 per year.

In fact after checking with many of the younger kids we found that they are driving older cars and with no insurance at all just because of this discrimination.

Also some of the older people have informed us that after having insurance for as many as 35 or 30 years and then they have several moving violations they are put in the high risk premium rate. Many of whom had to quit driving and get rid of the cars as they could not afford the expense.

It seems after looking over some of the financial statements of these companies, they have huge surpluses, huge new buildings and holdings of nearly every description. Also the officers and executives are some of the highest paid and wealthy in our Nation.

I, for one, think you are on something that should be investigated and some form of legislation, to take care of this discrimination.

Very truly yours,

FRED CHAMBERLAIN.

BOWLING GREEN, OHIO.

SENATOR METZENBAUM: I'm reading the local paper of your recent investigation of discriminatory practices by insurance companies. I thought you would be interested in this letter from American Family Insurance Co. Attached is a copy of the letter. My driving record was clean (no violations) at that time and is now. According to their reasons I was cancelled because of my parents'—Thomas A., and Mary R., driving record. I feel I've been discriminated against because at that time I was not under the same policy as my parents. When talking to the underwriter of the policy, he said the reason I was dropped was due to the possibility that my parents might use my car. Another question is "Why can American Family cancel me and take me under their companion company at a higher rate?" I feel that I have been unjustly handled by this company; is there any action I can take? Your reply would be appreciated. My maiden name appears on the American Family letterhead. My married name is Lori Roadt.

Thank you.

LORI ROADT.

GREENFIELD, WIS.

MY DEAR SENATOR: There is another aspect to the fire insurance renewal approach that is disturbing.

I have lived in my current house since 1950 and have, for all these years, had my homeowners policy with the Travelers of Hartford (#0820308096331). I have never had a fire although several years ago I had a pipe burst and had a ceiling replaced.

My policy expires 2-26-78 and I have just received from Travelers a notice of termination. No reason—no explanation. For 1973-74 I paid $244; for 1977-78 I paid $400. It's hard to see the cancellation as reasonable—either because of too many claims or because the company is stuck with low rates. I retired Jan. 1, 1978 which makes this even more disturbing!

Sincerely,

HARRY C. ISAACS.

RYE, N.Y.

DEAR SENATOR: On behalf of those suffering from unwarranted insurance rate discrimination, I thank you for your efforts to change this system.

At the time of my divorce, I had been driving for 19 years, with one minor traffic violation and one non-chargeable accident, was a responsible member of my community, was employed, and drove an economy car. I had never caused a dent in any car.

When I tried to get insurance in my own name, Allstate wanted to put me in an assigned risk pool, because I was unmarried. My agent, who'd been my neighbor for eight years, managed to get me a regular policy, which then came through with a safe driver discount.

Ironically, my ex-husband. who put in a number of claims for fender-benders in the past years, had no problem continuing his insurance.

I hope you can help in forcing the insurance industry to stop using excuses like age and marital status for what amounts to price-gouging.

Sincerely,

NORMA J. JOHNSON.

These instructions are very important! Please read and follow them completely!

The questions on this form refer to you! Complete the questionnaire yourself. Do not have anyone else or let anyone else answer the questions for you. Each driver in the household should complete his own questionnaire.

Please answer all questions. Do not leave any blank. Answer the questions as accurately as possible even if you are not absolutely sure of the answer. If an answer is "zero" or "none", write that in.

There is some overlap with items on the application. However, please answer the questionnaire completely.

Please Note! Only one applicant in the household need complete Parts B & C. List the names and birthdates of all persons between the ages of 14 and 25 who live in the household or who would if they were not away at school in the military, etc. List all, whether they drive or not. Include yourself if your age falls within the given range. Check "Yes" or "No" where indicated.

Names:

Birthdates:

Does he/she drive? ( ) Yes; ( ) No.

Does he/she have own car ( ) Yes; ( ) No.

Does he/she have own Ins. ( ) Yes; ( ) No.

List the names, and relationship to you, of all persons who are not members of the household who will drive any of the vehicles you have insured with Iowa National Mutual Insurance:

Write the year, make (Ford, Chevrolet, etc.) and model (Pinto, Vega, etc.) of each vehicle insured with Iowa National Mutual Insurance which YOU will drive in the next 12 months.

Vehicle 1: Year, make, and model

Vehicle 2: Year, make, and model

Vehicle 3: Year, make, and model

How many miles will each vehicle be driven in the next 12 months by drivers combined? Vehicle 1, Vehicle 2, Vehicle 3.

How many miles will you drive each of these vehicles in the next months? Vehicle 1, Vehicle 2, Vehicle 3.

You drive this vehicle to work, school or depot regularly? Vehicle 1, Vehicle 2, Vehicle 3.

If yes, how many days per week do you drive? Vehicle 1, Vehicle 2, Vehicle 3.

How many miles one way each day? Vehicle 1, Vehicle 2, Vehicle 3.

Do you deduct a percentage of the expenses of operating the vehicle from your income tax as a business expense or will a portion of the expenses of your rating it be paid by employer? If "yes," indicate percent.

Vehicle 1: ( ) Yes; ( ) No.

Vehicle 3: ( ) Yes; ( ) No.

Where is each vehicle usually left overnight (drive, street, garage, etc.)?

Vehicle 1, Vehicle 2, Vehicle 3.

Has the motor been replaced or the motor or car altered? If Yes, indicate on a separate sheet the year, make, cubic inches and horsepower of the replacement motor or how the car has been altered, each to the self report.

Vehicle 1: ( ) Yes; ( ) No.

Vehicle 2: ( ) Yes; ( ) No.
Vehicle 3: ( ) Yes; ( ) No.

If you will drive more than three vehicles insured with Iowa National Mutual Insurance please put the information for the additional vehicles on a separate sheet and attach to this questionnaire.

This information must be complete and accurate. Cross check dates and details with spouse and against any available records.

If you have not been in an accident or have not received a traffic citation (ticket, etc.) in the past 36 months be sure to write None as your answer. Do not leave any questions blank!

2a. List all traffic infractions (except fined for overtime parking) in the past 36 months which resulted in your being fined, jailed, in the loss of driving privileges, the assessment of penalty points, or attendance at a driver improvement program. List all regardless of the vehicle you were driving or where they occurred. Include violations associated with accidents listed below. If none, write none.

Violation 1. month, 2. year, and 3. nature of violation.

2b. Answer the following questions concerning any and all accidents in which you have been involved while driving in the past 36 months, including one car crashes. Report all accidents which resulted in any damage to any vehicle or to any property or in death or injury to any person. Include all accidents regardless of seriousness, who was at fault, the vehicle you were driving, where it occurred, whether a report was filed with the state or a claim submitted to an insurance company. Report the amount of damage (before deductible) to all the vehicles involved and to all property. Answer every section of the question. If none, write none.

1. Date of occurrence, detailed description, and who was legally at fault?

Results of crash—

Death or injury to anyone requiring medical treatment? ( ) yes; ( ) no.

Total $ damage (all vehicles—all property).

Whose insurer paid damages?

Were you ticketed in connection with crash? ( ) yes; ( ) no.

2c. Indicate the date and reason for any suspension or revocation of driving privileges in the past 36 months. If none, write none.

No. 1, month, year, and reason.

2d. If you have been picked up or detained or charged or fined for any non-traffic legal violation in the past 36 months, indicate the date, the nature of the accusation, and the outcome or action taken. If none, write none.

No. 1, month, year, and nature of accusation; and outcome.

Did you (the applicant) personally answer the questions? (signature).

If not who did?

Name of state issuing driver's license.

Driver's license number.

Today's date.

Questions: Answer the following questions by putting the appropriate numbers in the answer boxes, by putting an X in the appropriate squares to indicate a Yes or No answer or writing out the answer in the space provided. If you wish to explain, qualify or amplify upon an answer, use a separate sheet and staple to the self-report.

1. How old are you?

2. How many years have you been driving by yourself?

3. What percent of your driving of vehicles insured with Iowa National Mutual insurance is between 5 a.m. and 7 p.m. (daytime)?

4. What percent of your driving of vehicles insured with Iowa National Mutual Insurance is done alone (without passengers)?

5. What percent of your driving of vehicles insured with Iowa National Mutual Insurance is in heavy density traffic?

6. What percent of your driving of vehicles insured with Iowa National Mutual Insurance between 7 p.m. and 5 a.m. (evening and night)?

7. What percent of your driving of vehicles insured with Iowa National Mutual Insurance is between 5 p.m. Friday and 5 a.m. Monday (weekends)?

8. How many non-auto injuries have you suffered in the past 3 years which have required medical attention?

9. What is the highest year in school you have completed? (High school is 12 years, college graduate is 16 years, etc. (If completed, high school by G.E.D., so indicate.

10. How many full time jobs have you held in the past 3 years including self employment? If student, homemaker, unemployed, retired or only part time employed answer X.

11. If employed full time, how many years have you been with your present employer or self employed? Student, homemaker, unemployed, retired or only part time employed answer X.

12. Check which is true. In the past 3 years you have been—separated, divorced, widowed, none of these.

13. How many residences have you lived in in the past 3 years? (Count present residence as 1).

14. In the past 3 years how many full time jobs have you quit or been discharged from (except temporary layoffs)?

15. For how many traffic infractions have you been fined or assessed penalty points in the past 3 years? (Do not count fines for overtime parking.) If none, write 0.

16. Do you (and/or spouse) own (or are buying) your current place of residence? Yes, no. Do you live with a parent or guardian? Yes, no.

17. Have you blacked out or fainted in the past 3 years? If Yes, explain. Yes, no.

18. Are you married and living with your husband or wife? Yes, no.

If married, how many years have you been married? (If not married answer X.)

19. How many years have you lived in your present residence? (house, apartment, whatever.)

How many years have you lived in this community?

20. Do you spend much time gardening or doing handy work around the house? Yes, no.

21. Check the one in which you live. Apartment, condominium, house, duplex, rented room, mobile home, other—please specify.

22. What is your principal occupation? (If student, homemaker, unemployed, retired or only part time employed so state.)

23. List physical impairments, conditions limiting your activity or major health problems. If none, write None.

24. Describe any continuing medications you take including tranquilizers or sedatives and explain why you take them. If none, write None.

FEDERAL REGULATION AND SMALL BUSINESS

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, the proliferation of Federal regulation, a situation we are all concerned with, has different impacts on different segments of our society. The American small businessman is particularly adversely affected by these regulations and the following article by Kenneth W. Chilton, from the Center for the Study of American Business, Washington University, St. Louis, Mo., explains how and why I ask that said article be published in its entirety.

The article follows:

THE IMPACT OF FEDERAL REGULATION ON AMERICAN SMALL BUSINESS

(By Kenneth W. Chilton)

Government regulation tends to have a disproportionate adverse impact on small business. The limited ability of the smaller firm to pass along regulation-induced costs or to generate investment capital to finance those costs is having a debilitating effect on this segment of the economy. The special problems of the small firm in dealing with government regulation are managerial as well as financial. Government paperwork requirements command large segments of the entrepreneur's time and energy. Thus, appropriate consideration of the problems of small business should be a part of the analysis of any proposed governmental regulation of the private sector.

INTRODUCTION

There is ample reason for concern over the health of American small business. The cumulative contribution of these small enterprises to the economy is not small. There are over 13 million small businesses (excluding family farms). They comprise more than 95 percent of all private enterprises in the United States. They employ over 40 million persons and produce 43 percent of the gross national product. While small retail outlets (the so-called mom and pop stores) represent a large segment of these businesses, small enterprises are a vital element of nearly every segment of the American economy.

Another reason for concern about small business is the vital role that the individual entrepreneur plays in the area of innovation and in competition. Air conditioning, Bakelite, automatic transmissions, stereophonic sound systems, air brakes, plain-paper copiers, and instant photography were all breakthroughs initially made by small entrepreneurs. Economic effectiveness is well served when barriers to entry into markets are at a minimum. The cornerstone of private enterprise or capitalism rests on efficient markets and vigorous competition.

Yet another reason for consideration of the future of small business is simply that the future does not look bright for many of these firms. For example, a relative shift in technological innovation from small business to large firms appears to have occurred in the late 1960's. According to one research report published by the American Association for the Advancement of Science, small firms (those with fewer than 1,000 employees) produced the greatest number of major innovations from 1953 to 1966, but large manufacturing companies (those with 10,000 or more employees) led in innovation in the 1967–73 period. To be sure, many factors are at work here, including the effects of inflation, changing economies of scale, international competition, union wage rates, and all manner of government factors ranging from taxation and credit policy to regulation. Of this host of factors, it is the latter that is the subject of this report.

The impact of the recent expansion of federal government regulation of business has been particularly severe on the smaller companies. Large capital expenditure requirements to meet environmental or job safety standards above those that would be followed voluntarily may represent merely an uneconomical application of resources for a large firm; but it may literally be a matter of the enterprise's life or death for the small firm. While surely there has been no deliberate intent on the part of the regulation writers to bring about the demise of small business firms, it is accurate to say that often there has been little if any consideration given to the economic impact of regulation on the small firm.

THE THREAT TO CORPORATE EXISTENCE

A few examples of the effect of government regulation on the small firm serve to punctuate the point that government regulation affects small business disproportionately hard. The foundry industry is composed of approximately 4,200 foundaries; 82 percent of these firms employ fewer than 100 people and 75 percent employ fewer than 50 persons. The total industry employs approximately 375,000 workers. In the late sixties this industry began to lose small plants, those that specialized in small orders of less than 500 pieces a year, due to a combination of economic recession and EPA regulation. The castings produced by these foundries are critical for production of limited quantity capital equipment. The size of the mandated EPA emission control expenditures for many of the foundries that closed exceeded the net worth of the entire operation. In the period 1968 through 1975 there were 350 verified foundry closings. Table 1 summarizes the results of a follow up study conducted to determine the causes of these foundry closings.

The impact of proposed standards for airlead exposure levels promulgated by the Occupational Safety and Health Administration has been examined in a recent study by Charles River Associates. The consulting firm estimates that the total compliance cost would be approximately $416 million (in 1976 dollars) with annual costs of $112 million. The predicted result in the battery industry, which is made up of 143 firms, is as follows:

". . . OSHA lead regulations would result in much larger per unit production costs for smaller plants than for larger plants. Because of large differential costs and the fact that battery prices would only rise to cover the unit costs of the larger firms . . . smaller plant operators would be forced to absorb the differential in costs. In many cases the amount absorbed would . . . eliminate entirely the plant's profitability and about 113 single plant battery firms would be forced to close . . . [this] would eliminate half of the productive capacity not operated by the five major battery companies."

The information in this report is insufficient to assess the merits of alternative OSHA standards for measuring the hazard posed by working in these firms; however, the predicted impact on small business in this industry of the proposed standard indicates the need for further study prior to its final issuance.

Albeit unintentionally, at times regulatory agencies can hurl devastating blows at a small business by simply releasing incorrect information. Such was the case of Marlin Toy Products. Marlin sales totaled $1.5 million in 1972; the company employed about 85 people in a commnuity of 1,100 people. In November, 1972 the Food and Drug Administration notified Marlin that its two main products, the toy balls known as Flutter Ball and Birdie Ball, were going to be banned because the balls contained small noise-making pellets that could be swallowed by a child if the balls cracked. Later Marlin and the FDA agreed that if Marlin would recall the balls on the market and remove the pellets from future balls it would be removed from future banned lists. Marlin gave rebates totaling $96,000.

In October 1973 the Consumer Product Safety Commission (which had assumed the authority for toy safety) picked up the old ban list from the FDA and reprinted it, but inadvertently omitted the fact that Birdie Balls and Flutter Balls were banned only if they were the old version that contained pellets. The company's toy sales plummeted during the vital Christmas season. Marlin was forced to lay off 75 percent of its work force and was forced out of the toy business. CYSC admitted that, "the toys were supposed to be deleted from the banned list but weren't and we weren't about to recall 250,000 lists just to take one or two toys off."

A key to the continued existence of any private enterprise is, of course, its ability to generate a stream of profits sufficient to finance future capital expenditures for replacement and growth. This fundamental economic requirement must be satisfied by small firms as well as large. A basic difference between large firms and small firms faced with "unproductive" capital expenditures required to meet governmental regulatory standards is the greater ability of the large firm to pass along the added cost and a reasonable return on that investment to the consumer.

In 1974, the National Association of Manufacturers surveyed its members and obtained estimates of the costs of meeting the OSHA standards existing at that time. The average estimate for firms with fewer than 100 employees was $35,000, a significant demand on the resources of a small firm. It is interesting to note that the only reference to small business in the whole legislative history of the Occupational Safety and Health Act is for the provision for Small Business Administration financial aid to improve work place safety.

Other regulatory agencies have created increased capital demands on small business. The Employee Retirement Income Security Act was designed to protect employee pensions. However, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Jerome Kurtz, estimates that, due to a propensity to specify uniform standards for all pension plans, large or small, as much as 30 percent of the nation's 500,000 private pension plans may have gone out of business. An important contributor to this phenomenon is the estimated 5–10 percent increase in the costs to small business to meet pension law requirements. This increase is due to higher minimum funding and increased administrative costs including accounting and actuarial services and insurance for fiduciary liability.

AVAILABILITY OF CAPITAL

Some government regulations adversely affect the ability of small enterprises to attract investment. The "prudent man" rules included in ERISA coupled with their accent on personal liability for the "imprudent" pension fund manager have accentuated the trend to concentrate equity investments in the larger, well-established companies. Changes to these rules to allow up to two percent of a pension fund's portfolio in smaller, more risky firms while meant to provide some relief for small business may, unfortunately, merely place a ceiling on these types of investments by the pension funds.

Some of the Securities and Exchange Commission's rules also tend to work against the small firms. The SEC definition of a "private offering" is the solicitation of no more than 25 potential investors and sale of stock to no more than 10 investors. SEC registration for "public offerings" costs between $100,000 and $150,000 to prepare and takes four to six months. Table 2, from the report of the SBA Task Force on Venture and Equity Capital for Small Business, demonstrates the decline in the new issue market for small business (defined as those with net worth less than $5 million).

Table 3 shows the estimated cost (in 1969 dollars) of flotation of public and private debt issues by size of the issue. The difference in the two types of issue indicates, in part, the added cost of meeting requirements imposed by the Securities and Exchange Commission and ancillary accounting and legal costs associated with public offerings. It is clear that small firms (small issues) bear disproportionate costs whether private or public and that SEC requirements greatly compound the costs for small issues.

THE PAPERWORK BURDEN

It is much more difficult to assess the impact of regulations that are merely burdensome to small business, such as meeting the paperwork requirements. The Commission on Federal Paperwork reports that—

"5,000,000 small businesses spend $15–20 billion or an average of over $3,000 each on federal paperwork; and small businesses are relatively harder hit by federal information requirements than larger firms and often lack the necessary expertise to comply."

The latest addition to the power of the Environmental Protection Agency comes from the 1976 Toxic Substances Control Act (Tosca). The impact on small firms in the chemical industry has been given little consideration as regulations are being drafted. The Act gives the EPA virtually unlimited authority to require extensive testing—at the firm's own expense—of any new chemical product before it goes on the market. In addition, EPA can take action against as many as 50 existing substances annually and can require almost unlimited data.

Although Congress intended to shield small businesses from many of Tosca's paperwork burdens, the latest proposed regulations define "small manufacturer or processor" as a single-plant manufacturer with annual sales less than $100,000 or with production less than 2,000 pounds annually. Under that ruling, a firm such as the Harwicke Chemical Company in Elgin, South Carolina is classified as big business. Harwicke has less than 75 employees and produces $9–11 million in annual sales out of a single-plant facility. Harwicke's sales manager has become the regulatory expert since he is the only employee besides the president who even holds an advanced degree in chemistry.

Not all examples of the heavier burden of regulation on small business have to do with the newer regulatory agencies. A National Labor Relations Board election is a good example. Table 4 shows the total estimated cost per employee of an NLRB election by size of the company work force. Clearly the unit cost of meeting this regulatory requirement is smaller for the large firm ($101.60 for companies with over 1,000 employees) and larger for the small firm ($134.60 for firms with fewer than 100 workers).

POSSIBILITIES FOR IMPROVEMENT

Often small firms have little if any opportunity to influence regulation in the formative stages. Even if individual firms become aware of proposed laws or regulations, by virtue of their smallness they can ill afford to devote precious management time to attempting to alter an only potentially difficult situation. That this problem often has gone unrecognized in the past was aptly expressed by James D. Hutchinson, who headed the Labor Department's pension benefits unit when ERISA was passed. He stated that "no one asked" for input from small business during hearings on the legislation.

There are hopeful signs that the regulatory agencies do eventually obtain a better understanding of the special problems of small business. For instance, seven years after its establishment, OSHA has begun a combined effort with the Small Business Administration known as the Small Business Program (SBAP). This is a pilot program with five federal safety and health officers in OSHA's Region V who will be "contact points" between OSHA and small business. These officers will provide a referral service, directing the businessmen to the appropriate agencies and organizations.

In addition, OSHA has proposed to pay 90 percent of a state's cost to send consultants to visit a workplace and identify unsafe conditions. Sixteen states do not currently provide such service. The consultants cannot issue complaints if an employer is violating safety and health laws, but the consultant must request "immediate elimination" of any hazard posing "imminent danger." If a violation is considered serious, the consultant will give the employer "a reasonable time" to correct the problem and if correction is not made, the consultant notifies OSHA. The consultant does not levy fines and thus the small firm can request his assistance without fear of punitive results.

Minor changes have also been instituted in ERISA regulations, such as, reduced reporting requirements and a small business participation in its Advisory Council. The Internal Revenue Service and the Labor Department are working together to eliminate duplication of forms associated with ERISA.

These changes have been brought about as a reaction to public criticism that resulted from initial regulatory action. The key to preventing regulations from creating disastrous consequences for small business is careful consideration of this segment of the economy as part of a pre-regulation economic impact statement. The inclusion of the impact of regulation on small business as a part of an overall economic impact statement might very well result in an improved regulatory climate for the entire business community.●

OIL SHALE—SPECIAL QUALITIES COULD HELP OUR DOMESTIC ENERGY SUPPLY

● Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, the first congressional initiative to develop nonnuclear energy technologies was in the mid-1940's when Senator Joseph O'Mahoney of Wyoming and I introduced in the Senate and House of Representatives, the Synthetic Liquid Fuels Act, which was signed by President Franklin Roosevelt on April 5, 1944. That law authorized the first Federal programs for gasification of coal, liquifaction of coal, and production of synthetic crude oil from oil shale.

I have stated many, many times during the debate on energy legislation last year that much of the extensive knowledge and skill acquired on conversion of coal and oil shale into alternative fuels was lost in the intervening years. We are again realizing the importance of synthetic fuels. There will continue to be interfuel competition, but it is certain that soon America will be striving for fuels of several descriptions.

Oil shale has the potential of becoming an important energy resource. It is possible that 2 to 3 trillion barrels of oil are available from U.S. shale deposits. Under current economic and policy conditions production could reach 20,000 to 57,000 barrels per day by 1985.

Associated with the development of this resource are many unresolved issues. They include the role of the Federal Government in its development, environmental consequences of a large scale oil shale processing industry and social and economic planning related to this industry. Future leasing policies of the Department of the Interior, price supports, loan guarantees, tax policies related to oil shale development, and the establishment of a comprehensive national oil shale policy (possibly as part of a national energy policy) are vital factors which should be addressed.

Dr. Armand Hammer, a creative industry leader, pointed out recently in a challenging article in a March 17 issue of the Value Line investment survey, that oil shale should not be overlooked as a possible solution to our insatiable domestic need for liquid fuels. His knowledgable discussion centers on Occidental Petroleum Co.'s efforts on a 4,000-acre oil tract of land known as Logan Wash, located near DeBeque, Colo.

Mr. President, I commend this article to my colleagues, particularly those involved in efforts to adequately fund research and development in the energy field, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

OIL FROM SHALE—A SOLUTION TO AMERICA'S ENERGY CRUNCH

(By Dr. Armand Hammer)

An abundant energy resource existing right in our own back yard can play a key role in our nation's near term energy future. That resource is shale oil, the most important and least understood of the imported oil alternatives now being developed to supply our need for domestic liquid fuels.

A vast treasure of oil is locked up in shale located in the Rocky Mountains of northwestern Colorado, southeastern Utah and southwestern Wyoming. If only one-fourth of this oil is recovered there would be enough oil available to supply the total U.S. needs for the next 70 years. Those mountains located in our western United States contain close to 2 trillion barrels of recoverable oil. They can provide more oil than the total known reserves of the free world.

Occidental Petroleum Corporation believes it has achieved a major scientific technology breakthrough that will make a commercial oil shale industry a reality in the mid 80's. The impact of oil in huge quantities in the American market in this time frame would be tremendous because it would make our nation independent of foreign sources.

The energy problem is real . . . confusing, but real. Everything our nation uses is dependent on energy.

This problem is clearly stated in the President's National Energy Plan:

"The diagnosis of the U.S. energy crisis is really quite simple: demand for energy is increasing, while supplies of oil and natural gas are diminishing. Unless the U.S. makes a timely adjustment before world oil becomes very scarce and very expensive in the mid 1980's, the nation's economic security and the American way of life will be gravely endangered. The steps the U.S. must take now are small compared to the drastic measures that will be needed if the U.S. does nothing until it is too late."

In the United States, we consume more than 17 million barrels of oil per day—and the rate continues to climb. Our domestic production now meets only a little more than half of our daily needs. Approximately 8 million barrels per day must be imported. We have virtually no control over foreign imports, since production and prices are determined by an Arab-dominated cartel—the 13 member countries of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC).

The new oil finds in Alaska's North Slope and the North Sea will provide some temporary relief, but these new sources will not be able to reverse the trend.

The energy debate continues, but two facts dramatically demand our attention—our balance of payments is deeply in the red and our national defense posture is threatened.

Our dependence on oil imports cost us an estimated $45 billion in 1977 (that is about $83,000 a minute!). For every man, woman and child in the United States, $210 flowed into the hands of foreign petroleum producers—substantially affecting the U.S. economy. The consequences of spending such a large sum overseas are enormous—our trade deficit is more than $27 billion and steadily mounting. Such a predicament weakens the value of the U.S. dollar in international trade and challenges the basis of our economy.

Of major concern is the availability of domestic jet aircraft fuel for military operations in the decade of the 80's. The Defense Department indicates that the depletion of our domestic natural petroleum supplies is only a matter of time. Unless alternatives are developed domestically, another Middle East oil embargo could have grave military consequences.

President Carter has said that the lack of an assured energy supply is the single greatest threat to our security and that of our allies.

The President has made energy a top priority of his administration. Government, congress and industry are striving to come up with some answers in the form of substitute energy sources for imported petroleum.

Research and development has been accelerated in a number of promising technologies—solar energy, geothermal power, nuclear and synthetic fuels from coal—but none of these is capable of making major contributions to our energy supplies in the short term when we will need them the most.

The demand for energy output in the 80's and beyond will continue to be directed towards liquid fuels. Our aim is that liquid fuel will come from oil shale, right from our own back yard. The beauty of shale is that deposits are well mapped out, so the risk of exploration is eliminated. There is no chance of drilling any dry holes—we know where the oil is.

THE INSIDE STORY

Shale oil—how it can be extracted from the rock economically and with minimum impact on the environment, and what the potential is for a commercial oil shale industry are just some of the questions the OXY team has probed. They have taken an aggressive, dynamic course to develop an underground process for recovering the oil from the mountains in commercial quantities at reasonable costs in today's energy market and under environmentally acceptable conditions.

WHAT IS OIL SHALE?

Oil shale is found throughout the world, and its potential has been known for centuries. Oil from shale has been produced in Europe on a small scale for more than 100 years, and industries exist in such diverse areas as the Soviet Union, China and Brazil.

There are oil shale deposits in at least 27 of our states, but none compared with the quality of the shales found in the Green River formation of the Rockies. Within the Green River formation, the richest oil bearing shales are imbedded in a comparatively small area of the Piceance (pronounced "pea-ants") Basin in Rio Blanco County, Colorado. Some of these rich deposits are as much as 1,500 feet thick.

Once extracted from the rock, oil from shale has similar properties to crude oil. Tests show it can be refined into a variety of petroleum products, including gasoline, fuel oils, jet fuel and petrochemicals.

The source of the oil in shale is an organic material called "kerogen," which was deposited in large quantities at the bottom of some vast, prehistoric lakes. This was about 50 million years ago during the Eocene Age. There were no Rocky Mountains then. Over the millennia, thousands upon thousands of tons of this material were built up, and as they became compacted under the layers above, they hardened into rock or shale. The lakes, which probably existed for some 10 million years, finally disappeared altogether as erosion and upheavals radically changed the landscape into plateaus edged by steep cliffs.

The layers of kerogen are easily detected in a piece of shale rock as black or dark brown streaks. The darker and wider the streaks of kerogen, the richer is the oil shale. When you travel through shale country, you often see the rich shale formed in the face of the cliffs.

OIL SHALE—PAST AND PRESENT

When pioneers first crossed through the shale country of western Colorado more than a century ago, the Ute Indians told them tales about "the rock that burns." The pioneers soon learned that they could use the shale rock to help light their campfires. The residue from the rocks proved to be useful for harness oil and grease for their wagons.

Developing a shale oil industry in the Rocky Mountains has been an elusive goal for more than 50 years. Early attempts in the 1920's were stymied when the then bountiful crude oil fields of east Texas were discovered. An oil shale industry remained dormant for decades, first because of the relative ease of recovery and cheaper cost of ordinary crude and later because of the initial low cost of imports from Venezuela and the Middle East.

The oil embargo of 1973 and the ensuing energy problems changed the picture drastically. Since that time the price of oil has increased more than four times.

Under these circumstances, OXY is convinced that a commercial shale industry can become a near term reality. There are still some technical problems but we are confident they can be overcome, and the potential rewards justify that a substantial effort be made to develop an oil shale industry.

HOW DO WE GET THE OIL?

To put it simply, when the rock is heated to about 900 degrees Fahrenheit, the kerogen breaks down from its natural solid state to form oil. This technique is known as "retorting."

A number of different processes for producing oil from shale have been conceived and tested. Repeated attempts have been made using an above ground process to first mine the shale and then bring it to the surface to be crushed and retorted. In almost every case, high costs and environmental constraints have slowed or halted the progress of the development of shale oil recovery under this process. Once the oil has been extracted above ground, the millions of tons of spent shale must be disposed of somehow. This is a major environmental hurdle that still must be overcome.

We believe the most efficient way to produce oil from shale is to do the work underground, inside the mountain. Our engineers call this process "in situ" (the Latin words meaning "in place"). The benefits are obvious. The disturbances to the surrounding environment are minimal and capital costs are reduced. Although the concept may sound simple, it is quite a challenge to make it work on a commercial scale, developing an industry which could eventually produce millions of barrels of oil per day.

THE OXY PROCESS—HOW IT WORKS

The OXY process is unique, but what is more important, it works.

It is called "modified in situ" because a relatively small amount of oil shale (about 20%) is removed to gain entrance to the mountain containing the shale rock, before the retorts are formed and the retorting process begins inside the mountain. The process was conceived as a lower cost alternative to above ground operations which would be environmentally acceptable.

Occidental has invested more than $50 million in developing its process during some 7 years of pioneering research, five of them in the fiield. The result has been the development of a strong proprietary position with a total of 22 patents having been issued, 3 more will be issued shortly, and 55 have been applied for while 35 more applications are presently being prepared and 26 more are scheduled for processing, for a total of 141. OXY is the acknowledged leader in modified in situ technology.

In the OXY process, the mining is conducted inside the mountain to carve out several chambers or "rooms" within and below the rich oil shale formation. Pillars of shale are left inside the rooms to support the overlying formation before blasting takes place. Using conventional explosives with a patented process, the oil shale within the retort boundary, some 30 stories high and 200 × 200 feet in width, is fractured into small chunks of rock 6 to 12 inches in diameter which expand into the rooms, forming a natural retort, or "heating receptacle," inside the mountain. (The specific techniques used in the fragmentation process form a key part of OXY's proprietary information.)

Now the retorting or "cooking" process begins. An external source of fuel is introduced and ignited at the top of the rubble pile. The hot gas heats the top layer of oil shale to the required temperature of 900 degrees F. At this point, the kerogen breaks down to produce oil, gas and a residual carbon that remains on the rocks. The carbon now becomes the fuel for the heating process and the external fuel source is turned off. Air is injected to maintain the process. The self-sustaining combustion advances down the retort, controlled by the rate of air injected. Gravity allows the oil and gas freed by the high heat to flow downward through the retort in advance of the burn. The oil is collected in a sump at the base of the retort and pumped to the surface.

An additional bonus is the low Btu gas which can be used to generate electricity at the site, and in a commercial operation even provide auxiliary power to surrounding communities.

LOGAN WASH—THE PROVING GROUND

In 1972 OXY proceeded to prove out its technology in a series of development tests inside a mountain containing oil-bearing shale.

Since Occidental was unable to acquire any high-grade oil shale acreage at the time, it settled for a 4,000 acre marginal oil shale tract of land known as Logan Wash, located near De Beque, Colorado, some 50 miles northeast of Grand Junction. The focal point of the Logan Wash effort is an 8,500 foot mountain.

In the intervening period since 1972, a series of underground retort tests were conducted, starting on a small scale and building up to commercial size operations. More than 50,000 barrels of shale oil have been produced during the commercial development program, which we believe confirms the validity of OXY's modified in situ process. An active research and development program also has been conducted at OXY's research center in Irvine, California.

The development of OXY's technology during the years at Logan Wash has produced important refinements in mining and retort designs, environmental control and monitoring procedures, and methods of handling oil, water and gas production. All of these will be applied to OXY's future commercial operations.

The operations at Logan Wash will continue, with the development of a third commercial scale retort scheduled for 1978. It is anticipated that additional patents will be developed in the future as field tests are conducted to advance the state of the art of the technology and to improve further the economic, environmental and safety aspects of the modified in situ process.

Some of the Logan Wash oil production was introduced on a test basis into potential markets. Some 5,000 barrels were sold to the Consumers Power utility in Detroit, Michigan, which burned the oil in its boilers without further upgrading as part of its normal operations.

Consumers Power reported: "The shale oil received from Occidental performed satisfactorily. . . . We recommended that Consumers Power continue its interest in shale oil production."

Occidental retained one of the foremost engineering firms, Ralph M. Parson Company, to perform engineering studies of its modified in situ process. Parsons supports OXY's confidence in its shale operations with the following summary statement.

"We believe OXY's in situ approach is fundamentally sound and unique in concept. We are gratified to see it is now being applied to an even richer deposit than before (the OXY-Ashland commercial Colorado-b site), and we feel that the final outcome of the detailed engineering and optimization will prove to be worthy of full commercialization. Parsons believes, based on our previous experience, that future design refinements and optimizations will impart significant savings to the cost of the project."

COMMERCIAL OPERATIONS

Occidental, in partnership with Ashland Colorado, a subsidiary of Ashland Oil, is proceeding with the initial work on commercial operations at the 5,120 acre Colorado-b (C-b) tract leased from the government in Rio Blanco County some 25 miles north of Logan Wash.

The two corporations plan to develop the C-b tract in a progressive fashion which will allow early evaluation of the modified in situ technology on the new site prior to construction of a full scale commercial plant.

How the OXY-Ashland partnership evolved is an interesting story in itself. The federal government, which owns the great majority of the richer oil shale lands, put up four choice tracts for bid in a prototype leasing program in 1974. A number of energy companies responded, and the C-b site was acquired by a joint venture of Ashland, Atlantic Richfield, Shell and TOSCO with a bid of $118 million.

The four companies planned to extract the oil using an above ground process. Atlantic Richfield, Shell and TOSCO eventually withdrew, citing the uncertain environmental obstacles surrounding above ground oil shale development. Ashland then approached Occidental, offering a 50 percent interest in the C-b tract in exchange for the use of OXY's proprietary modified in situ technology. An agreement was entered into on December 1, 1976, and OXY became operator of the tract.

Work on the C-b tract began in September 1977, after a comprehensive Detailed Development Plan was approved by the Department of the Interior. When the commercial facility reaches full production, estimated for 1983, approximately 40 retorts will be in operation, producing a total of some 57,000 barrels of oil daily. The total yield from C-b is estimated to reach about 1.2 billion barrels of oil.

NATIONAL OIL SHALE PROGRAM

This could be just the bare beginning, however. The potential for shale oil is even much greater. As Occidental board chairman and chief executive officer, I have called for a national oil shale program supported by the government that could result in production rates of some 2 million barrels of shale oil per day by the middle 80's.

Under this bold plan, the government would fund the construction of a 200,000 barrel per day plant in Colorado at a cost of about $1 billion (in 1977 dollars). The plant would use the OXY modified in situ process and would come on-stream in about five years. At the same time the proposal calls for the government to announce plans to lease to private industry, on a competitive basis, nine additional oil shale tracts each capable of plants producing 200,000 barrels per day for 30 years. The result: 2 million barrels per day production of oil when it will be needed the most. No one company could dominate the field because federal law limits any company from leasing more than 5,120 acres of government-owned oil shale land.

Such an ambitious program requires a large investment, but the payoff makes it worth the price.

In suggesting the national plan, I have proposed that the government rally to our present national crisis just as President Roosevelt did during World War II when he created a synthetic rubber industry, or as he did with the Manhattan Project.

We have offered our technology to the government for national defense purposes at no profit to ourselves. We will license private companies at a reasonable fee, which we believe we would be entitled to in view of the large investment we have in research and development.

In the national plan we have maintained that the government must be paid back totally for its investment. Only after the government has been reimbursed would the plant be put up for bid. Once the government has adopted this plan we believe private industry would take over and develop a shale oil industry capable of providing for the total needs of our country and the free world. The Federal Government owns six hundred 5,000-acres tracts, each capable of producing 200,000 barrels a day for 30 years. These lands could be eventually leased on a competitive basis, making us totally independent of imported oil.

THE FEDERAL ROLE

The future for an intensive oil shale commercialization program will depend to a great degree on what actions the Federal Government takes in the next few years. The government has a key role to play, not only in supporting the new industry but also in eliminating some of the barriers to private development.

The Department of Energy (DOE) signed a cooperative agreement with Occidental in October, 1977, for a jointly funded project for further development of OXY's techniques to produce oil from shale. Total cost of the two phases, 53 month project is estimated at $60.5 million, with DOE providing 71% of the funds and Occidential 29%.

The first phase of the contract is for the processing of two commercial size retorts at Logan Wash to test and evaluate two different rock fragmentation designs. The first retort test was conducted in 1977 and the second is scheduled to be rubblized in early 1978. If the parties agree to go ahead from there, the second phase will be to burn a cluster of retorts, using the selected design, in the richer shale land at the OXY-Ashland Colorado-b site. The plant would have an output of 2,500 barrels a day and the demonstration would include a determination of environmental effects. An ancillary facility has been set aside at C-b for this additional work.

For a large scale private oil shale industry to go forward, however, the government must take additional action to ease or eliminate some of the existing barriers to commercialization.

The issues threatening a commercialization program are based on inconsistencies in U.S. policy as far as oil shale is concerned. They include:

Lack of a national plan which would define the priorities for oil shale, establish goals and set schedules for meeting goals.

Lack of a coherent plan for developing the rich oil share reserves owned by the Federal Government.

Uncertainties regarding regulations, particularly related to environmental standards.

Additional uncertainties concerning shale oil pricing, oil taxation and entitlement policies.

Unreasonable time delays in the processing of various work permits.

Positive action by the government in these areas could provide the incentive for more companies to invest in oil shale development.

Under consideration by the Congress as part of two proposed Energy bills is a provision introduced by Senator Long of Louisiana and Senator Talmadge of Georgia to grant shale oil producers a tax credit of $3.00 for every barrel produced. This will not cost the U.S. Treasury a penny unless the shale is produced. It would be a powerful incentive for private industry to participate in the development of a shale oil industry.

ENVIRONMENTAL QUESTIONS—AND ANSWERS

Environmental considerations have always been a major factor in Occidental's planning for the development of a shale oil industry. For the government leased commercial C–b tract, the lessees completed what is perhaps the most comprehensive environmental baseline data collection and exploration program that has been associated with any mineral development. These assessment activities included evaluation of surface and subsurface hydrology, air quality and meteorology, plants and animal life, soil productivity and archeology.

Other than nuclear, no industry has been more closely analyzed from an environmental point of view than oil shale.

By working primarily underground, the OXY modified in situ process minimizes the environmental risks. All the spent shale remains inside the mountain. The comparatively small amount of raw shale removed to gain entrance to the mine can be contoured and revegetated. Experiments have shown that the raw shale readily supports new plant life.

Calculations also show that emissions * * * into the atmosphere will meet all standards set by the Federal Government and the state of Colorado.

How about water? The availability of water and its use are a major concern in the Piceance Basin as well as much of the rest of the western United States. Two of the major demands for water in an oil shale plan are the process cooling and to provide water for revegetating the mined shale. The OXY process water needs are about ⅓ to ¼ of the amount needed for the above ground process. Safeguards also are being developed to ensure that the natural water resources within the mountain are not contaminated by the mining and retort operations.

The advantages of the OXY process are even more impressive when the water use is compared to that of a typical coal fired 1,000 megawatt electric generating plant. Data show that the OXY-Ashland 57,000 barrel per day plant will use only 7 to 13 percent as much water as the 1,000 megawatt electric plant. (The two plants produce roughly the same amount of energy in barrels of oil equivalent.) Thus, 10 comparable sized oil shale plants still would use less water than a single coal-fired power plant.

As far as the socio-economic issues are concerned, OXY is working closely with local, county and state groups to assure that orderly growth will be carefully planned in the nearby small towns that will be affected by commercial oil shale operations.

OIL SHALE INDUSTRY IMPACT IN THE 1980's

If a viable oil shale industry becomes a reality, and if such a program were accelerated by government support, what would the impact be in the late 80's?

It would be substantial, since each barrel of oil from shale produced domestically would save a barrel that otherwise would be imported. Thus, as far as our balance of payments is concerned, a 2 million barrel per day oil shale industry would mean a savings of $10 billion per year in foreign payments, at today's oil prices. Eventually enough shale oil could be produced by private industry to eliminate the present trade deficit, amounting to $27 billion in 1977.

Perhaps even more importantly, oil from shale could assure a secure domestic supply of jet fuel for our national defense purposes in the 80's. This is a matter of vital concern within the Department of Defense (DOD).

Contrary to what some people may think, DOD uses only a small portion of the petroleum consumed in the United States on an annual basis—it's less than three percent. However, our military operations are among the most important users of energy, and in wartime they could become the most demanding.

Some 65 percent of the Defense Department's requirements for petroleum are used for jet aircraft fuel. That amounts to about 300,000 barrels per day under peace time conditions. With our demand for imported oil increasing in the 80's, oil from shale could make the critical difference in our defense posture if foreign oil supplies were cut off again as they were during the 1973–74 embargo.

Some tests using refined shale oil as fuel for jet aircraft have been conducted with promising results and a follow-on project is currently underway. The tests thus far have demonstrated the feasibility of using oil from shale as a source for jet fuel.

Air Force Secretary John C. Stetson, after a visit to our shale oil operation at Logan, Wash., emphasized the military's concern, and its support of an oil shale program as an alternative source for aviation fuel, when he stated:

"Depletion of our domestic natural petroleum supply is only a matter of time; then synthetic oil will become our only secure source of petroleum. For synthetic jet fuel, oil produced from shale seems to be the most promising. And oil shale is plentiful. Recognizing that environmental considerations could limit the amount of oil recoverable, our domestic reserves are still estimated to be many times larger than domestic crude oil reserves."

Several oil companies are beginning to show an interest in OXY's in situ process. Rio Blanco (Standard of Indiana and Gulf Oil Company) have retained Fluor Corporation to evaluate the OXY in situ process. They have already filed a detailed Development Plan based on a modified in situ process on their C–a 5,000 acre tract in Colorado for which they bid $210 million

THE ECONOMICS OF OXY'S PROCESS AND THE FUTURE PROSPECTS FOR ENERGY SELF-SUFFICIENCY

We are confident that with our modified in situ process we will be able to produce oil in commercial quantities estimated to be competitive with imported oil The Parsons engineers and ourselves estimate that we can earn a 15% return on our investment based on the current U.S. price for imported oil of about $13.50 a barrel. When this calculation was made, our investment to build a 57,000 barrel a day facility was expected to be about $400 million. Since then there has been considerable escalation in cost so that today's estimate would be near $600 million. It is therefore important that Congress grant the $3.00 per barrel tax credit for every barrel of shale oil produced. If, in addition, the Department of Energy would extend its entitlement program to oil shale, offering to pay any difference between the price of imported oil and the cost of producing shale oil, it would be a tremendous stimulus for the rapid development of a shale oil industry. The world would see that ultimately we do have an alternative to OPEC oil and that the Arab nations will not continue to have us over a barrel for decades.

For immediate action, I propose that we get behind President Carter to see that Congress promptly passes an acceptable Energy Bill. This should provide substantial tax incentives for those who switch from oil to the use of coal and penalties for those utilities who drag their feet in converting their facilities for this purpose. The substitution of coal for oil could save up to 50% of the use of imported oil. We should declare a moratorium on some of the more stringent environmental restrictions which prevent the increased production of coal. We should encourage offshore drilling in the U.S. by shortening the time for putting up Federal leases for bidding, again by removing some of the more burdensome environmental restrictions. Finally, we should deregulate the price of new oil and gas. If these immediate steps are taken, together with Government action to build a shale oil industry as outlined above, I am convinced that confidence in the dollar would be restored, the trade deficit would be reduced and eventually eliminated entirely, the stock market would boom, capital investment in industry would increase, jobs would be created and the problem of unemployment would disappear.

Under the Rocky Mountains, there is a vast reservoir of shale oil. If it can be effectively tapped, then our dependence on foreign oil will be eliminated. It can be done . . . we think we know how to do it. All it needs is the cooperation of the government and this nation could be quickly on the way to energy self-sufficiency. I am confident that we will get there, and I find it very exciting that Occidental is leading the way.●

DANGEROUS CHEMICAL SAFETY

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I know all of my colleagues share my concern for the safety of the millions of citizens in this country who live by the railroad tracks over which dangerous chemicals and fuels are transported. The disasters last month in Waverly, Tenn. and Youngstown, Fla., could have happened in any State.

Under the leadership of the distinguished Senator from Florida (Mr. CHILES) the Subcommittee on Federal Spending Practices and Open Government and the Subcommittee on Civil Service and General Services held a joint hearing on March 20 to investigate and to bring to light the failures in the Government regulatory process which allow disasters such as these to continue to occur.

Our subcommittees heard testimony from the mayor of Waverly, Tenn. This testimony told the true story of what a tank car derailment and explosion really means to the people of a town who live in fear by the tracks. In Waverly, 15 people in a town of 5,500 were killed and 80 more were injured. Many of the injured will have permanent scars. The police chief and the fire chief were killed trying to protect the town. One-half of the police force was killed.

Mr. President, I ask that the prepared testimony of Dr. Jimmy Powers, Waverly's mayor, be printed into the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

The material follows:

STATEMENT OF HON. JIMMY POWERS

(Chronology of the Events Surrounding the Explosion of a Railroad Tanker Car Full of Propane at Waverly, Tennessee on February 24, 1978:)

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 22

10:30 pm—Twenty-four cars derailed at the edge of downtown Waverly. A home for retarded adults is ordered evacuated of its residents. The state office of Civil Defense receives notification of the derailed propane cars.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 23

6:00 am—Civil Defense dispatches a hazardous materials team to Waverly from Nashville to supervise salvage and clean up operations.

10:49 am—Evacuation complete. A check of the tankers shows no leaks. Clean up begins.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 24

2:00 pm—Evacuation is again ordered as salvage workers prepare to transfer 4,000 gallons from one tanker to bulk trucks for shipment to Jackson.

2:59 pm—Tanker explodes. Fifteen persons die (as of 3–18–78) and 80 are injured. Homes and Businesses are destroyed.

3:05 pm—A plea is issued for available ambulances, police, fire trucks, and rescue workers.

6:00 pm—Fearing the second car may catch fire and explode, authorities order evacuation within a one mile radius.

The events continue until Sunday at 8:00 am when the evacuees are allowed to return to their homes.

Even though the drama is over and the lives of many residents have returned to normal, those who have been injured and the families of those who have died are forced to readjust to their new life. The City of Waverly has lost many members of its police and fire departments. In addition to the damage of the area where the tanker exploded, the loss of lives is even more traumatic.

The L & N Railroad travels through Waverly in a heavily populated area. The lines are near the center of town causing a derailment, such as the one on February 22, to be an acute danger to the lives of the population, as well as the economic stability and life of Waverly itself. Steps must be taken to prevent these derailments from occurring and particularly when hazardous material is involved.

SHORT-TERM EFFECTS TO THE COMMUNITY

The City of Waverly lost half of its Police Force and many of the Volunteer Firefighters were injured.

6 Businesses are destroyed and 5 are damaged.

5 Homes are destroyed and 10 are damaged.

Temporary Housing must be found for the Adults who lived in the Center which was burned. These women are retarded and need the security of being with House Parents who understand them, and the other girls who they can relate to.

The City loses thousands of dollars in equipment and supplies.

People are hospitalized for long periods of time causing hardships on their families. Most of the victims are in Nashville hospitals and even in other states causing greater difficulty for those families involved.

Individuals who have lost their homes must seek shelter with family and friends until permanent housing can be found.

LONG TERM EFFECTS TO THE COMMUNITY

One of the primary concerns is the locating of a permanent home for the retarded adults who no longer have a place to live together. These women need the security of being together and also require other special facilities which are not easily found in an average house. Therefore, plans must be made to rebuild a home for these girls where they may function as normally as possible.

The Police Force must begin a rebuilding process to fill the positions left by those who were killed, injured never to return to the force, and those who will be recuperating in hospitals for many months.

The police force must also train a new Police Chief and the Criminal Investigator must be replaced. This requires training and time to learn the residents of the area.

The officers must work 69 hours a week and the supervisors work daily. It is necessary that all officers remain on call even though they are not on duty.

The residents make demands that the Police Force becomes trained in handling hazardous materials.

The residents are also demanding that communications be devloped with Bruceton L & N train station. They are insisting that L & N slows down the speed of the trains as they travel through town, that safety measures are enforced on all trains traveling through Waverly, and that the tracks are improved to make for safer passage through town.

The Fire Chief must also be replaced. New men must be trained and new equipment purchased to replace that which was burned and destroyed.

The suffering of the victims that were burned will continue for many months and possibly even their entire lives.

Located at the area which was devastated were businesses that contributed greatly to Waverly's economy. The economy thus will suffer because of the evacuation, the destruction of businesses, and by the hundreds of families who found themselves financially burdened due to individuals death and hospitalization.

The long and even the short term effects of the derailment and subsequent explosion will be felt by the community for many, many years to come. The residents of the city have never felt such shock and despair, as when they witnessed a part of their town being destroyed by fire, and friends and family being killed and disabled.

I feel stronger restrictions should be developed for the safety and well-being of all populations. New legislation must be passed and laws enacted to enforce railroad safety and specifically the transportation of hazardous materials.

REPORT OF EXPLOSION, FEBRUARY 24, 1978

Number Dead—15 (as of 3–16–78): 2 firemen, 1 policeman, and 1 Civil Defense worker.

Number Injured—80: 3 firemen, 3 policemen, 1 rescue squad member, 1 game warden on duty with the Civil Defense, and 1 Civil Defense Worker.

Houses—1 public building destroyed (Activity Center for Retarded Adults), 5 homes destroyed, and 10 homes damaged.

Businesses—6 destroyed and 5 damaged.

City damage
General damage to streets, factory building* and bridge	$300,000.00

SENATOR HASKELL ON PEACE IN THE MIDDLE EAST

● Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, in his remarks at the conclusion of his recent meetings with President Carter, Israeli Prime Minister Begin observed that—

Israel is still the only country in the world against which there is a written document to the effect that it must disappear.

That document, the 1968 charter of the Palestine Liberation Organization, is one of the great obstacles in the path of a peaceful settlement in the Middle East. As long as the Palestinian Arabs continue to permit practitioners of wanton terror to speak in their name and to proclaim as their goal the annihilation of Israel, no reasonable person can expect Israel to welcome the prospect of a state controlled by these same terrorists on its border.

Mr. President, in the wake of the latest episode in the murderous history of random PLO attacks upon unarmed Israeli civilians, our distinguished colleague from Colorado, Senator HASKELL, issued an eloquent plea to the Palestinian Arab people to turn from war and hatred to peace and reconciliation. In his statement, Senator HASKELL urged the Palestinians to repudiate the doctrines and the tactics made infamous by the PLO, to seek new and constructive Palestinian leadership and to recognize the fact that Israelis and Arabs have a common interest in finding ways to live peacefully together.

Mr. President, I ask that Senator HASKELL's statement, "An Open Letter to the Palestinian People," be printed in the RECORD.

The letter follows:

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE PALESTINIAN PEOPLE

Once again the civilized world has been shocked and enraged by the senseless and savage slaughter of innocent Israeli civilians. The perpetrators of this latest crime have, as usual, invoked Palestinian nationalism as the reason for their acts. The Palestine Liberation Organization, which remains the unchallenged representative of the Palestinian people, was quick, as it always is when Israel citizens are involved, to claim responsibility for this hideous incident. The immediate objective of this latest atrocity is abundantly clear—to sabotage the prospects for a negotiated settlement. In the long term, such actions endanger the likelihood of peace for all the peoples of this troubled area, Arab and Israeli alike. These goals are contemptible and compel even the most impartial observer to question the wisdom of ever considering the PLO as a participant in the Middle East negotiations.

Recent PLO actions and the apparent acquiescence of the Palestinian community to them raise harsh questions about the Palestine Liberation Organization and its role in the Middle East. What perverse sense of values makes an organization publically avow such barbarity? Forty years ago, the Fascists were ashamed to admit to Guernica; now the PLO boasts of actions which history's monsters have sought to hide. How can a people of acknowledged intellectual and artistic achievements permit themselves to be represented by butchers? Why should humanity care about your fate when those designated as your sole legitimate representative have so little regard for humanity? Why should Israel make the slightest concession to you when the Palestinian cause is so freqeuntly associated with cowardly attacks on children and unarmed civilians?

My support for and dedication to the survival of a strong and independent Israel are a matter of record, yet I have not been insensitive to the plight of Palestinian refugees. But I see no connection between the barbarism constantly committed by the PLO and disposition of homeless Palestinians scattered throughout the Arab world.

If the tone of this letter appears intemperate, I freely acknowledge it. The time for refined discourse and diplomatic restraint is long past.

Nearly a year ago, following the Cairo conference, I stated in the Congressional Record:

"It is with severe disappointment, then, that I note the results of the recent PLO meeting in Cairo. There was no renunciation of terrorism or repudiation of the destruction of Israel. There were no constructive or conciliatory gestures. There was, instead, only renewed verbal invective and threats of escalating hostilities. As a consequence of the PLO actions at Cairo, it is clear that the PLO cannot be accepted as a bargaining entity at a reconvened Geneva conference.

"I am not unaware of the hardships which Palestinians displaced by war have endured. But the politics of terror have no place in promoting a secure and prosperous future for Arab and Israeli alike. The futile irrendentism and savage violence of the PLO have not and cannot solve the Palestinian problem. The existence and security of Israel are not and will not be negotiable."

I concluded by expressing the hope that "a Palestinian ladership will emerge which is committed to playing an active and constructive role in the search for peace." Regrettably, no movement in that direction has occurred, and I must reiterate that hope and those concerns expressed almost twelve months ago.

Let me be unequivocal.

The PLO has no basis on which to claim a role in any peace negotiations.

The PLO has no right to expect sympathy or understanding from the American government. We in the United States Senate are committed to repudiate and eliminate terrorism and to provide the targets of terrorism with every means to defend themselves from craven assaults.

A new Palestinian leadership must emerge, one dedicated to negotiation and accommodation in the Middle East. Failure to repudiate the destructive negativism which has thus far characterized Palestinian aspirations will result in the justifiable exclusion of Palestinian representatives from diplomatic participation in Middle Eastern affairs.

I would like to close by submitting a challenge to all members of the Palestinian community. The name of the Palestine Liberation Organization is repulsive to much of the world. It is associated with acts of savagery and gratuitous violence. Many nations, including Arab states, as well as Israel, are personally familiar with the chaotic destruction associated with your cause. Yet when I visited the Middle East, I spoke with some PLO members who stated their willingness to seek peace and live with Israel. Periodically, such assurances are anonymously repeated. Those who press for public, attributable declarations from PLO members are told that, 1) such concessions must be withheld until negotiations begin, 2) the Palestinian community is not yet willing to endorse such proposals, 3) it is dangerous for individual PLO members to publically repudiate militant opposition to Isreal.

If opposition to Israel is indeed to be a bargaining chip, then let it be played now. Negotiations—the most promising undertaken in thirty years of conflict—are now underway. Palestinians must demonstrate, through word and deed, an intention to participate constructively in negotiations. Otherwise you must be correctly considered implacable enemies of peace and endure the fate of those who will not renounce violence.

Similarly, the sentiments of the majority of Palestinians must be determined. Will Palestinian nationalism continue to be identified as a perpetual cause of chaos and destruction in the Middle East or will the PLO be challenged by moderate, responsible leaders committed to reconciliation?

Finally, if there are Palestinians who are willing to die in order to slaughter innocents and disrupt negotiations, are there not among you others who will risk your lives for peace? Are you not sickened by the inevitable toll of dead and maimed and the twisted, smoking wreckage of villages? Do you not grieve with the parents and the children of the victims? Are you not ashamed that the organization which purports to represent all Palestinians proclaims these atrocities and that the trait most often associated with your people is terrorism?

I am persuaded that the Palestine Liberation Organization has no rightful role in the world community. I trust that within the diverse Palestinian community there are those of you with the immunity and foresight to heroically declare a Palestinian alternative based on justice and tolerance for all.

Neither the world community nor the Palestinian people can any longer abide the PLO. Peace and decency demand a new approach. People of goodwill everywhere look forward to your response.

Sincerely,

FLOYD K. HASKELL,
U.S. Senate.

REGULATORY REFORM: A CALL FOR ACTION

● Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, Neil H. Jacoby, founding dean and professor in business economics and policy at UCLA's Graduate School of Management, recently spoke on "Reducing Governmental Intervention in the Economy" in an address to the Fifth Annual Securities Regulation Institute of the University of California. Dr. Jacoby addressed the matter of how excessive regulation now inundates business and our society. He presented examples of how regulation often has had the opposite effect on the marketplace than was intended, costing consumers and taxpayers increasingly more and effectively stifling natural market solutions.

In his compelling argument, Professor Jacoby does not stop at merely diagnosing the problem; he proposes five concrete actions to help reduce regulation, or at least keep it manageable, for the future. Many times, citizens turn to government intervention due to a lack of understanding or a mistrust of the open market. Professor Jacoby suggests in market economics in the high schools and an updating of current economic courses in colleges. Better informed citizens can better utilize their rights and would be less prone to lean on the Government to impose often-burdensome requirements.

Dr. Jacoby notes that, just as new construction projects must now provide environmental impact statements to assess side effects on the physical environment, there should be some means for assessing the effects of governmental intervention on the social environment. He proposes that all new government regulatory incursions be accompanied by a cost-benefit analysis. And, to remedy the problems implicit in existing regulation, he calls for the passage of the Regulatory Reform Act of 1977, which Majority Leader ROBERT BYRD, Senator ABE RIBICOFF, and I have introduced, and which 42 of our colleagues have cosponsored. This bill would transform and revitalize regulatory mandates, structures, and performance so that agencies better serve the public interest, achieve their purposes more efficiently, and foster greater reliance upon free market competition.

Finally, Dr. Jacoby cites a tendency within Congress to try to mix "equity" with economic efficiency. Future legislation and regulation should, he urges, treat resource allocation and income distribution separately. Attempts to combine the two are generally unsatisfactory.

Professor Jacoby delineates the haphazard way that Government has tampered with the economy. He exhorts us to be more trusting in the ability of competitive markets to allocate resources efficiently and inexpensively. The Government should seek to change the behavior of businesses through incentives whenever possible, and leave governmental coercion to those situations and circumstances where no other choice is available.

Mr. President, because Professor Jacoby's remarks add substantial insight into the problems of excessive regulation and offer some highly practical solutions, I request that the complete text of his address be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

REDUCING GOVERNMENTAL INTERVENTION IN THE ECONOMY

(An address to the Fifth Annual University of California Securities Regulation Institute by Neil H. Jacoby, Graduate School of Management, UCLA, San Diego, Calif., January 19, 1978)

The past decade has witnessed a tidal wave of governmental intervention in the U.S. economy. Most significant has been a vast expansion in federal, state and municipal regulation of business. Government has intruded into the private sector in other ways. It has established new enterprises, added to its loans and loan guarantees, and expanded its subsidies to people and to enterprises. Its taxes and spending programs have also risen relentlessly, placing powerful constraints upon the incomes, expenditures, savings and investments of business firms and households. However, it is the flood tide of excessive governmental involvement in the internal decision-making of business that concerns us here. Let us seek the basic causes of this development, and consider what actions would reduce and prevent excessive intervention in the future.

THREE WAVES OF REGULATION

Since 1965 at least thirty-three major new federal regulatory laws have been enacted. They impose detailed controls of the design, testing, packaging and labeling of business products, the occupational health and safety of employees, employment practices and working conditions, environmental protection and improvement, energy prices and conservation, consumer credit, and employee retirement plans.[1] No one has yet counted, let alone described, the avalanche of new state and local regulations of business.

Viewed in historical perspective, we are passing through the third great wave of business regulation to have arisen during the past century. The initial wave crested during the 1880s as a result of populist outcries against industrial and railroad monopoly. It led to the Interstate Commerce Act of 1887 and the Sherman Act of 1890, and to a host of state regulations of transportation and warehousing of farm products.

The second wave emerged from the economic scars of the Great Depression of the 1930s. It brought the family of new federal agencies created by Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal. Some of these agencies were of the joint public-private industrial management type, patterned after the ICC, such as the FPC and FCC. They extended general public controls over firms in the electric power, natural gas and electronic communications industries. Others introduced a new type of regulation over particular business functions of firms in all industries, such as the issuance of and trading in corporate securities (SEC) and labor-management relationships (NLRB).

The third wave was generated by the "quality of life" movement of the 1960s, with its emphasis on broader civil rights, a cleaner environment, more "social responsibility" by business, and, somewhat later, the energy price revolution of the early 1970s. Its hallmark is comprehensiveness—for it affects particular functions of all enterprises and not merely the firms in selected industries. EEOC, EPA, OSHA, ERISA and FEA are the most prominent new federal bureaucracies to emerge during this era. Historical analogy tempts one to hope that this wave may now be receding, but we cannot be sure.

The network of business regulation has thickened greatly over the years. Each new regulatory wave has been superimposed on preceding waves. And older agencies have moved into additional areas of regulation. Thus, the ICC has extended its sovereignty from railroads over trucking, pipelines and inland water transportation. The power of the SEC has been increased over open-end investment companies, brokerage firms and the financial and corporate communities.

It has extended its requirements of public disclosure by registered companies beyond basic financial, business and legal data to include foreign political payments by companies; and it has been considering a requirement that corporations disclose environmental and other "socially significant" actions as well. As former SEC Commissioner A. A. Sommer, Jr., Chairman of the Advisory Committee on Corporate Disclosure, has pointed out, the statutory requirement to disclose "material" facts can be stretched beyond all reason.[2] If companies should disclose their environmental and personal actions on the dubious ground that they reflect "quality of management," why not require them to disclose the personal behavior of their executives—their voting records, church attendance, drinking habits, gambling losses and sexual mores? Thus the SEC could expand its statutory role of financial monitor into that of general corporate censor.

THE CONCENSUS ON EXCESSIVE REGULATION

Today, there is a national concensus that governmental regulation of business has become excessive and should be reduced. Deregulation is not a partisan issue. Both Democratic and Republican leaders give it a high priority on the national agenda. A prominent Republican, Senator Percy of Illinois, introduced the Regulatory Reform Act of 1976. No less prominent a Democrat than President Carter made the simplification of regulation a cardinal plank in his platform during the election campaign of 1976, and he has endeavored to implement his pledge last year.

Objective studies of regulatory programs by the Brookings Institution, the American Enterprise Institute and university economists show beyond doubt that the costs of many programs far outweigh their benefits. Excessive regulation is costing Americans tens of billions of dollars a year in lost production. Superfluous paperwork, delays in decisions, a pile-up of litigation over government rules and mis-allocation of resources have contributed to an alarming decline in the productivity of our economy. Most ominous is a sapping of the innovative drive of business managers, and a loss of flexibility in adapting to new conditions. "Management-statsis"—inability of managers to act—is becoming an epidemic disease. The fastest growing part of the American Corporation is its Legal Department.

COMPETITIVE MARKETS VERSUS BUREAUCRATIC COERCION

In his Godkin Lectures at Harvard University last year, Charles Schultze, the distinguished economist who served as Budget Director for President Johnson and who is now Chairman of President Carter's Council of Economic Advisers, asserted his belief that much governmental intervention is ineffective. He cited the failures of railroad regulation, of federal job training programs, of Medicare, and of many anti-poverty programs as examples. He asked why public intervention so often fails. What forces in our society account for the apparently inexorable tendency of governments to over-regulate?[3]

Schultze's response to these questions was that governmental intervention would be more effective if three conditions were met: First, if we had rules to distinguish the frivolous from the important occasions for intervention. Second, if we substituted market incentives for governmental coercion, whenever possible. Third, if we stopped modifying intervention undertaken primarily to control the allocation of resources in order to achieve "equity" and a redistribution of incomes. Matters of efficiency should be dealt with separately from matters of equity. We can concur wholeheartedly in these perceptive observations.

Schultze did not examine explicitly what I suggest is the basic cause of over-regulation—the widespread ignorance and mistrust of competitive markets as efficient allocators of resources.

When government seeks to change the behavior of business firms, it usually has two options open: One is to provide incentives which will induce firms competing in open markets voluntarily to behave in the desired way. The alternative is to coerce firms to change their behavior by command-and-control type regulation. Wherever this choice exists, it is clearly more consistent with the ideals of a democratic society and a free economy to choose market incentives over coercion. Markets involve voluntary relationships and mutual consent, rely on self-interest, obviate need for cost-benefit analysis, do not impede change, and direct innovation into socially desired channels. Yet the U.S. economy presents many examples of coercive regulation in situations where market competition would clearly produce a superior solution.

Consider the ceilings on rents imposed by the city of New York. The laudable objective of the city fathers was to make rental housing available at reasonable prices. They might have achieved this result by offering tax or other incentives to firms in the building industry to induce them to build and offer more housing in the competitive rental market. Instead, they employed the police power of the state to coerce apartment owners to rent at less than competitive market rates. What happened was predictable. Whenever government holds price below the market level, it creates a shortage. Rental housing became scarce for many reasons. Small families in large apartments kept them because their rentals were artificially low. Owners stopped maintaining existing buildings because their revenues were too small, and these buildings were progressively abandoned. Apartments were converted into condominiums to avoid controls. And builders were reluctant to construct new rental housing because of uncertainty over future controls. The supply of housing shrank, and available housing was badly allocated.

Consider the serious problem of youth unemployment. The straight-foward market solution would be to expand business investment and employment by a cut in federal taxes on business income, and to offer tax inducements to employ youths. But what did the Administration and Congress do in response to the pressure of organized labor? They raised the minimum wage from $2.30 per hour to $3.35 per hour over a three-year period, thereby expanding youth unemployment! Just as a below-market price produced a shortage, so an above-market price generates a surplus. The surplus here is of untrained, inexperienced and often uneducated youths whose labor is worth less than the minimum wage. The evidence is indisputable that raising the minimum wage adds hundreds of thousands of the ranks of the unemployed. Even Secretary of Labor Marshall agrees. Then, to offset the adverse effects of its higher minimum wage, the Administration proposes to spend billions to create and administer "public service" jobs!

Finally, consider our critical problem of energy supply. The Administration proposes to regulate prices of oil and gas. It chooses coercion instead of a market solution. It advances two reasons for holding domestic energy prices below the world market level: First, that domestic supplies of oil and gas are inelastic would not expand under the stimulus of higher prices. Second, that to permit U.S. prices to rise to world levels would give "windfall' gains to companies owning oil and gas reserve at "the expense of consumers" and would be inequitable. Neither argument withstands close examination.

By mandating below-market prices for domestic oil and gas, government is generating shortages in two ways. Consumption is higher than it would be in unregulated markets, because prices are artificially low. Supply is less than it would be in an unregulated market because producers lack adequate incentives to invest in finding new reserves. Experience shows that, given several years of time, oil and gas reserves are highly responsive to the level of investment, and such investment, in turn, is highly responsive to the prospectve rate of return which is largely determined by the price of the product.

Oil reserves are not like underground lakes containing a fixed number of barrels of oil which are pumped up through wells until the lake is empty. Oil reserves are like giant underground sponges holding oil in their fissures. The harder this sponge is squeezed—by tapping lower zones or injecting gas, water, steam or chemicals—the more oil it will yield. But cost of recovery per barrel increases. Only about 30 percent of the oil in place underground has been produced from developed American oil fields. Double that amount of oil possibly could be produced from old fields by known technologies, involving higher investment per barrel. And immense reserves could be developed from new fields, onshore and offshore, given price incentives. If American oil and gas companies were offered world market prices for all production, the expansion of domestic output would be astonishing over a five-year period. We could cut our imports of OPEC oil and foreign gas, which are producing a mountainous deficit in the U.S. international balance of payments and a hemorrhage in the value of the dollar.

ENERGY OR "EQUITY"—THAT IS THE QUESTION

Would a market solution to the energy problem be inequitable? To be sure, companies owning oil and gas reserves would realize higher profits. American stockholders would have higher incomes instead of the Arabians, Iranians, Indonesians and Venezuelans who are now getting the money we pay for imported oil. But the U.S. government would reap most of the gain. Between the corporate income tax and the personal income tax on dividends, about 70 cents out of each $1 of additional profits would be returned to the federal and state treasuries. And most of the remaining 30 cents would be spent on exploration and development of new reserves that the nation needs.

But the basic flaw in the Administration's argument lies deeper. In principle, should the government of a democratic nation with a market economy appropriate all unexpected (i.e., windfall) profits? If so, it follows logically that government should also subsidize all unexpected losses.

It also follows that all of the tens of billions of dollars of unexpected gains in the values of American farms, homes, coal and uranium mines and other real property should be appropriated by government. To penalize owners of oil and gas reserves while allowing owners of other kinds of property to go free would be manifestly unfair. The truth is that uncertainty and windfall gains and losses inescapably pervade a free economy, and they do not call for government intervention. The argument that energy taxes are needed to produce "equity" is invalid.

The Administration's energy proposals illustrate that serious flaw in governmental intervention noted by Charles Schultze—a confusion in the same legislative program of resource allocation and income distribution measures which so often frustrates the attainment of both goals. If we need more energy, let us allow the competitive market to do its work. If higher energy prices burden the poor, let us adjust welfare payments as needed.

IS COMPETITION EFFECTIVE?

The Administration's energy program also reflects ignorance or mistrust of the presence of competition in the energy industries and of the power of competitive markets to reallocate resources to satisfy social demands. It is widely believed that competition is not effective in those parts of the U.S. economy in which large corporations are dominant, that monopoly and oligopoly prevail, and that they result in high prices and restricted output. Government must intervene and employ bureaucratic coercion, it is said, to protect the interests of consumers.

The facts refute these views of the U.S. economy. They show that competition today is generally effective and that it is growing keener every day, as technology opens up new options to consumers and as markets become international in scope.[4] Without citing the evidence here, we may merely note the emergence of fierce foreign competition in our auto, steel, electronic, apparel, textile and shoe markets. Not only is competition effective in allocating resources. It performs that function at far less cost and without the undesirable side effects that accompany bureaucratic regulation.

Why is ignorance of the nature of competition and mistrust of competitive markets so widespread? One reason is that most Americans never completed a course in market economics in high school or college. Those who took elementary economics in college usually received a distorted impression that the U.S. economy is shot through with monopolistic imperfections, allocates resources inefficiently, and requires governmental intervention to remedy its alleged "market failures."

Economics textbooks commonly present a theoretical model of "perfect competition" as the goal of public policy. This calls for "atomistic" competition among a very large number of firms, all selling identical products—a situation in which economies of scale, new products and improvements in products would be impossible. The truth is that economic progress requires oligopoly. As Professor R. A. Gordon told the American Economic Association in his presidential address of December 1975, "the outstanding example of the failure of economic theory to adapt its analytical tools to the changing institutional environment must be the stubborn adherence to the assumption of perfect competition."[5] Small wonder that bureaucratic instead of market solutions to problems of resource allocation command wide support.

BUREAUCRATIC IMPERIALISM

Another basic cause of excessive governmental regulation is simply bureaucratic imperialism. This is the inherent tendency of bureaucracies—long noted by political theorists—to expand their size and their power. Politicians and bureaucrats understandably prefer governmental coercion to market competition as an instrument of resource allocation. Regulation concentrates political and economic power in the bureaucracy, whereas markets disperse power in private hands. The expansion of regulation means more civil servants to appoint, bigger budgets to command, and more power over the private sector. Every person strives to expand his influence over his environment, and government officials—elected and appointed—are not lacking in entrepreneurial drive. Federal agencies compete in activism.

Bureaucratic power at all levels of government has attained new peaks in recent years, and it has become difficult to contain. That power derives from a sharp rise in numbers of public employees, in their educational qualifications and in their compensation. The United States today has the largest, best educated and highest paid governmental bureaucracy in its history. It has acquired a forward momentum of its own that has defied the power of Congress to restrain and of presidents to reorganize. Too often our civil servants assume that they alone are the morally superior custodians of the "public interest;" all others being suspect as "special interests" to be opposed and disciplined.

MEASURES TO REDUCE AND INHIBIT EXCESSIVE INTERVENTION

Our brief inquiry into some fundamental causes of excessive governmental intervention into business suggests practical measures that would help to reduce existing overregulation and to inhibit its emergence in the future. I propose the following five actions: First, require instruction in market economics in our high schools. Second, modernize the treatment of competition in economics courses. Third, require prior cost-benefit analysis of all proposed new governmental intervention into business. Fourth, pass Senator Percy's Regulatory Reform Act, calling for proof of net social benefit from existing intervention. Fifth, treat resource allocation and income redistribution problems separately in future legislation and regulation. May I comment briefly on each of these actions:

1. Required instruction in economics in high schools

Jefferson rightly observed that the central role of public education in a democracy is to prepare youth for citizenship. Understanding the basic principles of our market economy and of our political democracy surely are an indispensable part of that preparation. The deplorable neglect of basic market economics in the American high school curriculum should be remedied. In 1976 the State of Tennessee led the way when its Board of Education mandated a course in "Classical economics" to be completed by every student in a Tennessee high school before graduation. Other states should emulate this action. We should now begin to generate knowledge of the way in which our market economy operates, and of the ability of competitive markets to allocate resources efficiently and inexpensively.

2. Modernization of the theory of competition and monopoly

Economists should modernize accepted theories of competition and monopoly. They should revise textbooks to present a truer and more relevant description of contemporary competition, its social and economic consequences, and the penalties suffered as a result of political interferences with market forces. Unless our economic textbooks utilize valid concepts that lead to constructive public attitudes, efforts to expand the teaching of economics will avail little, and could even worsen the situation.

3. Prior cost-benefit analysis of proposed intervention

One of the valuable social innovations of our age—though sometimes abused—has been the environmental impact report. It requires those proposing major new construction projects to assess the long-term direct, indirect and side effects of their proposal upon the physical environment, and to demonstrate a surplus of social benefits over costs before a permit to proceed is issued. It is a way of institutionalizing the maxim "look before you leap." We need an analogous institution for the assessment of the effects of proposed new governmental interventions upon the social environment. Congress should require the President to withhold approval of any new law or regulation affecting business unless thorough analysis demonstrates that, in the long run, its social benefits exceed its social costs. Had this requirement been in effect in the past, such disastrous regulatory errors as price ceilings on natural gas might have been avoided.

4. Enactment of the Regulatory Reform Act of 1976

It is as necessary to subject existing regulatory programs to rigorous cost-benefit analysis as proposed programs. In essence, this would be required by a bill introduced into the U.S. Senate during December 1975 by Senator Percy of Illinois entitled the Regulatory Reform Act of 1976.[6] It proposed to establish a time table for review by Congress over a five-year period of every federal regulatory agency, and to bring forth for each agency plans to eliminate unnecessary or harmful regulation, including possible termination of an agency. This legislation should be passed by the Congress. It would be desirable as well for state legislatures to establish similar programs of regulatory review.

5. Separation of resource allocation and income redistribution measures

There has been a tendency during recent years to use every new law, whatever its subject and purpose, as a device for redistributing income from the richer to the poorer members of society. While concern for the poor is commendable, experience shows that attempts to mix "equity" with economic efficiency in the same legislation are usually unsatisfactory. We have noted this result in the current energy proposals of the federal administration. Another example was the effort in the California legislature during 1977 to combine reduction of property taxes on homes with refunds scaled to homeowners' incomes, which was finally rejected as a result of popular disapproval. Measures intended to improve the allocation of resources should be designed to attain that objective. Measures to redistribute incomes should be separately formulated to carry out that aim.

Taken together, the proposed measures should help our country attain a more productive relationship between the public and the private sectors—between business and government. By enabling us to avoid excessive and wasteful intervention by government into the internal decision-making processes of business, they should help to restore vitality and productivity to our business system. There is a strong presumption that the network of voluntary relationships known as markets are the preferable way for a free people to carry on their activities.●

PROPOSED ARMS SALES

● Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, on behalf of the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, Mr. SPARKMAN, I ask to have printed in the RECORD the following statement and the attachments referred to therein.

The material follows:

STATEMENT BY MR. SPARKMAN

Mr. President, section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act requires that Congress receive advance notification of proposed arms sales under that act in excess of $25 million or, in the case of major defense equipment as defined in the Act, those in excess of $7 million. Upon such notification, the Congress has 30 calendar days during which the sale may be prohibited by means of a concurrent resolution. The provision stipulated that, in the Senate, the notification of proposed sales shall be sent to the Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

In keeping with my intention to see that such information is immediately available to the full Senate, I ask to have printed in the Record at this point the notification I have just received. A portion of the notification, which is classified information, has been deleted for publication, but is available to Senators in the office of the Foreign Relations Committee, Room S-116 in the Capitol.

DEFENSE SECURITY ASSISTANCE AGENCY,
Washington, D.C., Mar. 20, 1978.

Hon. JOHN J. SPARKMAN,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Pursuant to the reporting requirements of Section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act, we are forwarding under separate cover, Transmittal No. 78-24, concerning the Department of the Army's proposed co-production Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) with the Federal Republic of Germany which will provide, over a period of time, for sales under FMS procedures, defense equipment estimated to cost in excess of $25 million and for commercial defense equipment estimated to cost $105.0 million. The MOU will also provide that the equipment may be co-produced only for the Armed Forces of the Federal Republic of Germany and for other members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Sincerely,

Lt. Gen. ERNEST GRAVES,
Director.

TRANSMITTAL NO. 78-24

STAFF OF WPHC/WVRY RADIO IN WAVERLY, TENN., CONGRATULATED

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, people across the country have heard by now about the tragedy which struck at Waverly, Tenn., when a railroad car carrying liquid propane gas exploded, killing at least 15 people.

The courage shown by the people of Waverly and neighboring areas has left a lasting impression on me. During this crisis, hundreds of volunteers offered whatever assistance they could to reduce suffering experienced at Waverly.

I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the staff of WPHC/WVRY radio in Waverly. Their untiring effort to keep the people of Waverly informed was a great service to that community. The work done by WPHC/WVRY provides all the media with an example of the good public service which can be performed in times of adverse circumstances.

Mr. Dean Bush, general manager of WPHC/WVRY, has written an article for the monthly publication of the Tennessee Association of Broadcasters which details the role of the radio station in the crisis. I submit the article for the RECORD for the consideration of my colleagues.

The article follows:

WAVERLY SAYS, "THANK YOU WPHC/WVRY"

Friday, February 24, 1978 started like most Fridays at WPHC/WVRY Radio in Waverly, Tennessee. The usual hustle and bustle of a week ending and the entering of the last few days of the month was apparent. Our lead news story was a massive train derailment in the south end of town. Twenty-three cars of an L & N freight had derailed in a populated and business section of town on Wednesday night. There were no injuries and no property damage other than railroad property. One house, the James Center for training retarded young adults, had been evacuated due to its proximity to the accident. The only real concern was that 2 tankers containing 22,000 gallons each of liquid propane gas were involved in the accident. Complete inspection of the tank had been made and it was determined that there were no leaks and no apparent danger. The train derailment headlined our news on Thursday and Friday through noon. Several side stories had emerged regarding the clean-up operations.

Then it came time to unload the propane gas which had to be transferred to its final destination over a 2-day period. Our radio station was asked by police officers and firemen to announce that transfer operations were ready to begin and requested the station to announce that persons living in the quarter mile area south of the tracks to please leave the area. Officials were concerned that a leak could occur during the transfer operations. Firemen and police were on hand to control any leaks, but at 2:55 p.m., Friday, the 24th, for a still unknown reason, a tank containing 22,000 gallons of propane gas exploded.

The station's police monitor chattered, their phone rang—we knew the damage and destruction was massive. The next 39 hours were ones that the staff of WPHC/WVRY will never forget. For the next 36 consecutive hours, Daryl Lynn, our station's program director, remained at the station to direct the Emergency Broadcast. "We were the only link to the general public," Lynn said. "We handled upwards to 1800 phone calls. Our primary concern was to get the city evacuated as soon as possible because there was another tanker in the wreckage. It could blow at any time."

Joey Parker, an account executive of the station, was downtown when the tank exploded. He was the first person to make the initial "on the scene report" by phone. Dean Bush, station manager, and his son, Douglas, a broadcasting student at Freed-Hardeman College and home for the weekend set up remote broadcasting facilities from the Civil Defense headquarters at City Hall. Waverly's mayor Jimmy Powers, requested the AM station remain on the air on emergency operations until the area could be cleared. The station operated until 9:00 p.m. and then continued round the clock on the full time FM station. Five people were killed, 45 badly injured and 15 buildings destroyed by the initial blast. Since then, 8 more have died. The station called in extra help; others volunteered. Our staff remained on duty during the entire operation—Some sleeping at the studios. Neighbors and friends supplied them with food and coffee. "It was one of the most cooperative efforts I've ever seen," said the station manager; "I can't commend our staff enough. It was a situation we had never dreamed of facing. It was a completely new experience, but our staff handled it like troupers." Two of the employees lived in the blast area, but after their families were secured, they reported back and worked continuously until the emergency was over.

We are still carrying stories about railroad claims, the conditions of the injured and the investigation of the cause of the derailment and explosion. We are also carrying stories regarding the conditions of the fire department and police department and equipment that was lost in the blast.

The station covered the memorial services for Waverly's Police Chief, Guy Barnett, who lost his life serving his city in the tragedy.

Our sincere appreciation and thanks to our terrific staff at WPHC/WVRY: Joey Parker, Renee Stevens, Cecilia Collins, Vicki Fowlkes, Jim McArthur Barry Bronson, Randall Thompson, Walt Hestend and Daryl Lynn.

Also, many thanks to the volunteers who gave of their time to help in this emergency: Douglas Bush, George Despins, Diana Hotchkiss, Perry Lewis and Alan Bush.

There were many others outside the station who also deserve a special "thank you" for suppling our news department with many, many details that needed to be known by the Waverly citizens.●

HISTORY OF FARM POLICY MAY AID PERSPECTIVE

● Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, there recently came to my attention an excellent article from the March 3 edition of the Delta Farm Press newspaper, which I bring to the attention of the Senate.

This article points out the importance of U.S. agriculture and agribusiness to our Nation's economy and security, and traces the history of U.S. farm policy from 1921 to the present.

This is an excellent documentation. It is very timely and I request that it be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

HISTORY OF FARM POLICY MAY AID PERSPECTIVE

(By Wm. S. McNamee, publisher)

With the most serious farm problem the nation has had since the Great Depression upon us, and with a constant debate raging over the land as to what to do about it, Delta Farm Press thought a complete history of farm programs; how and why they came into being, and how each worked, would be helpful background information for all those individuals and organizations who are interested seriously in trying to help farmers and others affected by a sick farm economy.

Associate Editor Ed Phillips spent the better part of three months compiling and documenting this history, ranging from 1921 to the present, and it appears complete in this issue of Delta Farm Press beginning on page 46 and ending on page 49.

We repeated in a recent editorial a very wise saying: "He who refuses to learn by his mistakes is doomed to repeat them."

Perhaps the ominous parallels with our current situation, evident in this history, will help our leaders remember the circumstances preceding and during the Great Depression, that began for the entire nation in 1929, but began on American farms in 1921. It is our opinion the lesson was so strong that it burned itself into our minds and protected us from serious farm policy mistakes from 1933 until 1973, a period of 40 years.

We believe most sincerely that the radical change in philosophy embodied in the Farm Law of 1973 and continued in the Farm Law of 1977 is the root cause of our present problems.

We all desire expanded export and domestic markets, but we cannot afford to "buy" these markets with the financial losses of individual farmers. And if we're going to have to "buy" expanded export markets with government funds and force reduction of domestic production with mandatory set-asides, what, we would like to know, is so "free" and-or "market-oriented" about these procedures?

If we're going to have to force the "free-market" to work, then why not go ahead and provide a stable, high loan program that will give individual farmers some stability, the tools for orderly marketing, and let the federal government sell any surpluses on the export market?

If the "free market" is such a wonderful idea why doesn't it work naturally and without all this help and force? Looks to us as though a number of very important people, from the President on down, are sticking by a bad idea no matter how much it costs you. . . . Neither labor nor industry operates in a true "free market." Why us?

We believe these same problems will continue for U.S. agriculture and agribusiness until the law is changed. Things may improve occasionally, but we will have no real farm stability or consistent farm prosperity until we have relearned our lesson.

How long will it take? We hope a careful reading of the farm policy history in this week's issue will reduce the time.

HISTORY OF U.S. FARM POLICY FROM 1921 TO PRESENT DOCUMENTED

(By Ed Phillips, associate editor)

In the midst of a surging national economy, gross U.S. farm income reached $16 billion in 1920. In 1932, little more than a decade later, it had crashed to a low of $4.7 billion.

During its economic collapse in the 1920s, agriculture stood haplessly alone against the approaching depression. Other segments of the economy did not feel the depression until the stock market crash in late 1929.

As one observer put it, "All the red flags of distress were flying throughout the farm states during all the years of the industrial and financial boom."

Under government urging, American agriculture had expanded production enormously during World War I. In the brief depression after the war, domestic markets shrank and export markets all but disappeared.

OVERPRODUCTION

Yet farmers continued to plant as much as they had during the war, resulting in damaging overproduction—warehouses loaded with unsalable cotton, mountains of wheat and corn rotting on the ground alongside railroad sidings, and disastrous price declines for most farm commodities.

Wheat, which had sold for $2.94 a bushel in 1920, dropped to $1 in 1929 and 30 cents in 1932; choice cattle on the hoof dropped from $14.95 per hundredweight in 1920 to $11 in 1929 and $5.78 in 1932; and cotton prices fell from 37 cents a pound in 1920 to 12 cents in 1929 and 6½ cents in 1932.

CRUEL ILLUSION

When, in 1929, the entire economy was dashed upon the rocks, the prosperity of the past decade was revealed as no more than a cruel illusion. In its wake were left the harsh realities of financial ruin, unemployment, poverty, and hunger.

The Great Depression is seen by some as the quelling of the industrial revolution which transformed the world during the first part of the 20th century. In that new world, concern over capacity to produce was replaced by concern over capacity to consume—a turnabout which shook the foundation of the theory of supply and demand balance.

Also, while productivity was rising at a rate 2½ times greater than the nation's population, wages rose only 20 percent.

"The profits of a hugely productive industry went not into higher wages or lower prices but into dividends, into more machines and factories—and into speculation," said a highly respected economist. "The money didn't go where the people could use it to buy the things they had produced."

MONOPOLIES

The growth of monopolies during that time was also a reality which hampered the distribution of income. According to one report, there were more than 1,000 mergers of local utility companies in 1926 alone. By 1930, half the total electrical output in the nation was controlled by just three holding companies.

Another study revealed that in 1930 nearly half of the nonbanking corporate wealth in the country was held by the 200 largest corporations, which in turn, were controlled by about 2,000 individuals.

While corporate and speculative profits were setting record growth rates, farm income fell. The value of farm land decreased from $80 billion to about $55 billion annually, and the rate of farm bankruptcies multiplied six times.

A few attempts were made during the 1920s to pass legislation which would boost the farm economy. One of the earliest was introduced in 1920 by Rep. Charles Christopherson (D–S.D.)

His plan proposed the creation of a government commission to fix minimum prices for staple crops on the basis of costs of production plus fair profits. The government would buy unsold surpluses at the end of the year and sell them abroad. Congress rejected the plan.

Harry N. Owen, editor of a farm publication, was one of the first to advocate production controls. In a 1923 editorial he said, "Controlled production does not mean growing nothing at all, yet an appalling number of people seem to have that idea."

REDUCED ACREAGE

"Controlled production does not mean deliberately bring about a famine, as President Harding and others seem to think. It simply means trying to match supply to demand by having every farmer reduce his acreage. . . ."

The most widely-known proposal of the 1920s was the McNary-Haugin bill, developed by George Peek and Hugh Johnson, both executives of the Moline Plow Company and later directors of federal agencies.

Their plan had four fundamental points: (1) establish each year the fair exchange value on the domestic market for each principal crop; (2) protect that price through fluctuating tariffs; (3) organize a federal corporation to buy carryover stock and sell them for export at world prices; and (4) finance losses on those sales through a tax on the commodities sold by farmers domestically.

Peek and Johnson said so long as industry prices were protected through tariffs, so must agricultural prices be protected if the relationship between the two was to be maintained.

FAIR VALUE

"When supply equals demand, price of an article is its fair value in terms of things for which it is exchanged. Industry obtains fair exchange value because it can regulate production to domestic demand," they said.

"Agriculture cannot regulate production to domestic demand because the elements are a factor and because there is no coordination among six million producing units."

As the depression tightened its grip on the farming segment, farm bloc members of Congress were able to pass the McNary-Haugin bill in both 1927 and 1928. Each time, Republican President Calvin Coolidge vetoed it.

Ignoring the exigency of the situation, President Coolidge clung to inaccurate theories of agricultural economic laws. In his veto message, he said farmers would not benefit from the plan in the long run, due to the law of supply and demand, and that higher prices would decrease consumption.

CAPPER-VOLSTEAD

One of the few major pieces of farm legislation passed in the 1920s was the Capper-Volstead Act (1923). It provided that individual producers, acting together through a cooperative association, would not constitute a violation of anti-trust laws.

The Agricultural Marketing Act of 1929 was President Herbert Hoover's answer to continued pleas for relief to agriculture. During the 1928 campaign, Hoover had committed himself to the support of a federal farm board which would sponsor national cooperative marketing associations and stabilization corporations for carrying the surpluses of large crops from year to year.

REVOLVING FUNDS

The cooperatives were to be financed in the temporary withholding of supplies from the market in the interest of stabilizing prices. Since the seasonal or other price depressing surpluses were not expected to all occur at the same time, the fund was considered a revolving fund to be loaned over and over again to the different cooperatives.

Sponsors of the plan believed national cooperatives, with access to funds for price stabilization purposes, would be able to promote the orderly marketing of farm products in such a way as to return the most to the producer.

During its first year, the Federal Farm Board organized a grain stabilization corporation and a cotton stabilization corporation and made loans to them and to cooperatives of $265 million from its $500 million revolving fund.

The $500 million proved to be far from enough to halt the declines in farm prices. Furthermore, the board had no authority to control production. The board ultimately had to discontinue buying and let prices drift even lower.

BLACK THURSDAY

While the depression had been building for more than a decade, the climax came during one catastrophic week in October 1929. On "Black Thursday" (Oct. 24) an unprecedented 12.8 million shares of stock changed hands. As prices fell, tens of thousands of investors were wiped out. The financial ruin soon became universal.

From the market's peak in September, 1929 to its precipitious decline just one month later, more than $32 billion worth of equities disappeared in the United States. The great stock market boom was over.

The illusion of easy riches, the product of President Coolidge's "New Economic Era," had vanished, leaving behind the grim spectre of poverty.

Industrial production fell; losses replaced profits; dividends were cut; wages were reduced and employees laid off; capital improvements ceased; and inventories were cut.

ECONOMIC STAGNATION

On observer said, "Like a snake eating its tail, the process of economic stagnation fed upon itself."

In the three years between 1929 and 1932, an already troubled farm income dropped 50 percent. In 1932, one out of every five persons in the labor market was unemployed and millions more were underemployed.

It was a time of want in the midst of plenty. While the jobless wore threadbare clothing, farmers could not market 13 million bales of cotton; while people went hungry, crops rotted in fields. Ranchers were forced to destroy livestock they could not sell, nor afford to keep; breadlines marched under grain elevators filled with wheat.

PANIC AND FEAR

Above the nation hovered the dark clouds of panic, utter hopelessness about the future, and a mood of apprehension. Many said the end of this nation had arrived.

Although President Hoover was not blind to the suffering, he was hindered from providing relief by personal philosophical shackles. He and Secretary of the Treasury Andrew Mellon—one of the world's richest men—were convinced that periodic depressions were inevitable in a capitalist system and must be endured until corrected by natural economic laws.

They further believed any relief coming from the government should be applied at the top of the economic ladder, from where it would eventually trickle down to employees and consumers.

Implementing that belief, President Hoover created the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and persuaded Congress to allocate it $2 billion, to be lent to private businesses. The sum is staggering since the entire proposed budget for that year (1932) was less than $5 billion.

AGAINST DOLE

The President stood firm against anything he viewed as a "dole" for the unemployed and hungry. To him, it would be both economically and morally unsound.

Direct relief, he said, would sap the initiative and independence of the working class. He was prepared to fight to preserve his conception of the "rugged individualism of the American character."

At a 1932 press conference, President Hoover said, "We cannot squander ourselves into prosperity. The people will, of course, provide against distress, but the purpose of the national government must be to restore employment by economic recovery. The reduction of government expenditures and the stability of government finance is the most fundamental step toward this end."

His words fell as empty platitudes on a nation crying out in pain. As the ailment seemed to dictate major surgery, the physician offered no more than a salve.

INVALID THEORIES

"President Hoover and his men had been trapped by the failure of an outdated philosophy. The capitalist system as they had known it was incapable of adjusting automatically to the mountainous stresses that had piled on it since 1921," wrote one observer.

A despairing nation turned to the presidential election of 1932 and placed its dying hopes in the selection of a new leader.

BREAK TRADITIONS

The nominee of the Democratic Party, Franklin D. Roosevelt, had begun his campaign by saying, "Let it be from now on the task of our party to break foolish traditions . . . Our Republican leaders tell us (that) economic laws, sacred, unvariable, unchangeable, cause panics which no one can prevent. But while they prate of economic laws, men and women are starving."

President Hoover was soundly rejected by the electorate. Roosevelt received seven million more popular votes than did his Republican opponent and won the electoral college 472 to 59.

As an anxious nation awaited Roosevelt's inauguration, the economy declined even further. A lame duck Republican Congress opened in December 1932 amid public demonstrations.

Six weeks into 1933, the nation's banks began to fold. Foreign investors withdrew gold from the country. As inaugural day—March 4—neared, the nation stood paralyzed at the depths of the depression.

RESTORES FAITH

In his first address as President, Roosevelt undertook the task of restoring confidence in the country. "This is preeminently the time to speak the truth, the whole truth, frankly and boldly; nor need we shrink from honestly facing the conditions in our country today. This great nation will endure, as it has endured; will revive and prosper."

"So first of all, let me assert my firm belief that the only thing we have to fear is fear itself—nameless, unreasoning, unjustified terror, which paralyzes needed effort to convert retreat into advance . . ."

The new President immediately launched his attack on the depression, stocking his "New Deal" arsenal with fresh ideas and innovative programs. His tacticians were a relatively small group of scholars and technicians he had gathered during his campaign. Collectively, they became known as the "Brain Trust."

BASIC PRINCIPLES

Three concepts guided their thinking: (1) The root cause of the depression was domestic in origin, not international, and the remedies would also have to be domestic; (2) the regulatory powers of the government should not be used just to correct abuses to the economy, but to stimulate and stabilize the economic system for the benefit of all; and (3) an industrial economy with huge aggregates of productive capacity was established, and the obligation of the government was to invest that mighty force with a new measure of social responsibility.

As they shaped an attack on the problem. President Roosevelt's advisors argued the free market had ceased to function and no longer balanced carefully on the fulcrum of supply and demand, as theory dictated it should.

CONTROLLED ECONOMY

They further asserted that monopoly and oligopoly had become the rule rather than the exception, with the result that 2,000 men controlled the American economy through manipulated prices and production.

"We are stricken by no plagues of locusts . . . Plenty is at our doorsteps, but a generous use of it languishes in the very sight of supply. Primarily, this is because rulers of the exchange of mankind's goods have failed through their own stubbornness and their own incompetence; have admitted their own failure and abdicated," said President Roosevelt.

The advisors sought balance in the nation's economy. The best society, they said, was one in which no important element had excessive power. The depression was precipitated by a series of such imbalances.

Above all, they were disturbed by the disproportionate power business held compared to agriculture. They gave priority to raising farm prices in order to restore the balance.

MOVE TO ACTION

The President and his team wasted no time in implementing their plans. In the first three months of his administration, President Roosevelt presented 15 major pieces of legislation—and all were passed by Congress.

In May, 1933, Congress passed the Agricultural Adjustment Act. One month later, the Farm Credit Act was passed, providing for relief against foreclosures (within 18 months the Farm Credit Administration refinanced 20 percent of all farm mortgages in the United States).

Under the AAA of 1933, farmers could enter into contracts with the government to adjust production in specified commodities in return for benefit payments. The payments were financed primarily through taxes levied against processors of the commodities.

PRICE SUPPORTS

The farm law also authorized price support loans by the Commodity Credit Corporation (CCC) on the designated "basic" commodities—corn and cotton. Permissive supports were authorized for other commodities upon recommendation by the Secretary of Agriculture and approval by the President.

In response to calls for compulsory production controls, Congress passed the Bankhead Cotton Control Act in 1934. It placed strict lids on production of cotton over a certain level, taxing all overproduction by as much as 50 percent of the market price.

The Supreme Court ruled in early 1936 that the original AAA legislation, providing for the collection of processing taxes and individual grower adjustment contracts, was unconstitutional.

CONSERVATION

Congress then reoriented the adjustment program toward shifting land into soil-conserving practices through the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act of 1936. Farmers were not offered contracts, but if they grew acreages of the various crops which fitted the diversion requirements of the program, they were eligible for the substantial benefit payments.

During President Roosevelt's first term in office (1933–36), gross farm income rose 50 percent, crop prices climbed, and rural debts were reduced. Against the small base to which it had to be compared, no great triumph had been achieved, but progress was definitely indicated.

The Agricultural Marketing Agreement, passed in 1937, was designed to boost the income of producers of milk, fruits, and vegetables without the use of price supports.

MINIMUM PRICE

It gave the Secretary of Agriculture authority to establish a minimum price that processors in any local marketing area could pay for milk. For fruits and vegtables it gave the Secretary of Agriculture authority to limit the amount of produce which might be sent to market.

The problems of surplus production and low prices following large wheat and cotton crops in 1937 led to the passage of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938.

The AAA of 1938 provided for: (1) mandatory price support loans on certain basic commodities so they could be stored in times of plenty and returned to the market when supplies became scarce (this was Secretary of Agriculture Henry Wallace's idea of an "ever-normal granary"); and (2) marketing quotas on certain basic commodities, keyed to acreage allotments intended to keep supplies in line with market demand.

MANDATORY SUPPORTS

The act made supports (through nonrecourse loans) mandatory at 52 to 75 percent of parity for corn, wheat, and cotton. It also authorized the CCC to make loans on virtually any agricultural commodity.

Permissive commodities supported during the 1938–40 period included butter, dates, figs, hops, turpentine, resin, pecans, prunes, raisins, barley, rye, grain sorghums, wool, winter cover crop seeds, mohair, peanuts, and tobacco. There were no specific limits on supports of those commodities set in the law.

NATIONAL ALLOTMENT

In the case of allotments and quotas, the law provided that the Secretary of Agriculture would determine the number of acres nationally required to produce enough for normal consumption. Allotments were divided among individual farmers on the basis of their production history.

The penalty for overplanting under the allotment system was the loss of the right to receive price supports. Overplanting under the quota system meant the loss of price supports and the imposition of monetary fines. Under both systems, the goal was to limit acres, not pounds, bales, or bushels.

The parity concept for determining price supports was used for the first time in the AAA of 1938. According to the idea, at some time in the past, American farmers' labors had brought them a "fair" return in terms of their purchasing power and standards of life.

The aim was to determine what prices farmers would have to receive to enjoy the same relative purchasing power as during the time when things were fair. At 100 percent of parity, the relationship was considered equal. The 1938 act established 1910–14 as the base period for most crops.

IMPROVEMENTS MADE

As the 1930s were ending, agriculture was again approaching the levels of prosperity it had enjoyed some twenty years earlier. The New Deal programs had rescued the nation from the economic chaos of depression and laid the foundation for a more stable future.

Though critics later denied it, the facts were there.

The improvement, which had been gradual during the 1930s, accelerated during World War II. The demands of armed forces, allied nations, and a domestic population back at work changed surpluses into shortages. To shift production in the direction desired by the government, prices were set at levels which would induce the volumes sought.

For the basic nonperishable products (cotton, wheat, corn, rice, tobacco, and peanuts) the method used was that of loans to farmers at the support price.

STEAGALL COMMODITIES

In 1941, Congress passed the Steagall Amendment, which directed that support prices be applied to all products urgently needed during the war, such as livestock products and meats, soybeans, peas, beans, and flax.

Support prices of the basics were made mandatory through two years after the war's end at 90 percent of parity. That was intended to give farmers assurance prices would not collapse immediately after the war, as had happened following World War I.

Steagall commodities were also protected for two years after the war at no less than 90 percent of parity. In addition, the Secretary of Agriculture still had the power to support any other crop at any price and to impose production limits on them.

FLEXIBLE SUPPORTS

The first major postwar price support debate came in 1948. Democratic President Harry Truman asked for a permanent, long-range system of flexible price supports (a sliding scale based on fluctuations in supply and demand). He found backing from most Republicans and a few Democrats.

A solid bloc of southern and western Democrats fought to maintain price supports at mandatory high levels. They said a transition to flexible supports would mean sharp drops in income and, ultimately, the ruin of many farmers. Such a drop, they said, would lead to a farm depression and drag the entire economy to collapse—as it had done in the 1920s.

Momentarily, the high supports advocates had their way. Farm legislation in 1948 continued price supports for the basics at 90 percent of parity through 1949. At the same time, the parity formula was changed to reflect shifts in the price relationships among the different crops since the base period.

FINALLY PASSED

A flexible price support system was finally passed in the Agricultural Act of 1949. Its implementation was forestalled, however, by Congress, which froze supports for the basic commodities at 90 percent of parity for 1950 crops.

Basic commodities—cotton, corn, wheat, peanuts, and rice—were to be supported in 1951 at a level somewhere between 80 and 90 percent of parity.

The specific level was to be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture, based on the supply percentage at the beginning of the marketing year. In 1952, and after, the range of price supports for the basics was to be from 75 to 90 percent of parity.

The 1949 law also discontinued mandatory price supports for Steagall commodities, but set up new categories for milk products, tung nuts, honey, and potatoes.

COMPLIANCE REQUIRED

Eligibility for any price supports under the 1949 legislation was dependent upon compliance with any production or marketing controls that might be in effect. The Secretary of Agriculture still retained the power to impose allotments on almost any crop.

The implementation of the flexible price support system was again delayed in 1951—by the Korean War. As part of the United Nations defense effort, the Agriculture Department maintained supports on all basic crops at the 90 percent of parity level to stimulate production in 1951.

PRICE CEILINGS

Price ceilings had been authorized on a standby basis in 1950. Legislation in 1952 provided for price supports to be maintained at 90 percent of parity on basics as long as the act authorizing price controls was in effect (it expired in April, 1953).

An amendment to the AA of 1949 froze price supports yet again at 90 percent of parity for the 1953 and 1954 crops years.

In the 1952 election, Dwight David Eisenhower became the first Republican President since the depression days of President Hoover. In the same election, the Republican Party also gained control of both congressional chambers.

With the Korean War ended, the nation again faced the problem of formulating a basic farm policy in 1954. The long-postponed sliding scale for price supports on basics was scheduled to go into effect with the 1955 crops.

The Agricultural Act of 1954 set the support price range at 82.5 to 90 percent of parity for cotton, corn, wheat, peanuts, and rice in 1955 and between 75 and 90 percent thereafter. The sixth basic, tobacco, was to be supported at 90 percent of parity.

OTHER SUPPORTS

Supports were also set up for dairy products, honey, tung nuts, and wool. The Secretary of Agriculture retained the power to support all other farm goods at up to 90 percent of parity.

In the 1950s, surpluses were beginning to mount in the hands of an Administration which opposed what it viewed as "dumping" in foreign markets.

Farmers found themselves caught in a cost-price squeeze as farm prices fell and production costs rose.

The parity ratio for national farm income dropped to 91 in 1953, the first time below 100 since 1941. By 1955, it had dropped to 84 percent.

SECRETARY BENSON

During his eight years as Secretary of Agriculture in the Eisenhower Administration, Ezra Taft Benson continuously loosened production controls and lowered price supports.

His policies proved costly to both farmers and taxpayers. When President Eisenhower took office in 1953, federal ownership of surplus commodity stocks amounted to less than $1 billion.

The Benson policy, by 1960, had increased CCC stocks to $8.6 billion and loans were held on nearly $4 billion of additional stocks. The "Food for Peace" program (PL 480) enacted in 1954, prevented the surpluses from being even greater.

Democratic members of Congress criticized the Republican Administration for failure to move the growing CCC stocks: "Congress authorized sales in world trade at such prices as it might take to move these commodities."

"Certainly Congress never intended for the CCC to restrict United States production to the domestic market by keeping its commodities off world markets at competitive prices," said Rep. Jamie Whitten (D-Miss.), in a 1955 House committee meeting with Secretary Benson.

The Soil Bank, an Eisenhower Administration proposal, was authorized in the Agricultural Act of 1956. Under one part of the program—the acreage reserve—farmers could retire land previously planted to basic commodities and receive compensatory payments from the government.

The other part of the Soil Bank—the conservation reserve—provided for contracts for the retirement of any type of productive land and its conversion to specified conservation practices for periods of 3 to 15 years. Participating farmers were paid for retiring the land and for up to 80 percent of the costs of the conservation practices.

SOIL BANK EXPIRES

When the basic authority for the Soil Bank expired, it was not extended. Southern Democrats particularly opposed it on the grounds that it had been ineffective in reducing production, because only the less productive land was retired; that it had resulted in the retirement of entire farms in some areas, leading to economic decay of those areas; that it created widespread resentment among non-farmers; and that it was used as a Republican device to ward off proper measures to raise farm income.

The AA of 1956 required corn producers to comply with farm base acreages and to divert certain acreage in order to receive price supports at the full rate. Price supports were made mandatory for feed grains (grain sorghums, barley, rye, and oats) on the 1956 and 1957 crops.

REDUCED SURPLUSES

The new law also had a provision aimed at reducing cotton surpluses the government had been building over the past years.

It directed the CCC to sell its stock of cotton for export at the world market price and absorb the difference between that and the higher domestic market price. The Agriculture Department, under Secretary Benson, already had the authority to do that, but had refused to do so.

Other provisions of the Agricultural Act of 1956 blocked scheduled acreage cutbacks of the national allotments for price and cotton, and created a two-price plan for rice, which maintained high domestic prices and permitted rice to move into overseas markets at a lower price.

LOWER SUPPORTS

In early 1958, President Eisenhower pushed to have price support levels lowered even more than they had been in the past three years. He proposed that supports for the basics and dairy products be lowered to a scale of 60 to 90 percent of parity, instead of the existing 70 to 90 percent.

From the opposite philosophical viewpoint, Democrats pushed for a freeze on price supports and acreage restrictions. The resulting legislation represented something of a compromise.

The Agricultural Act of 1958 established a permanent minium national cotton acreage allotment and required that cotton be supported at 80 percent of parity, or more, in 1959. The minimum support would drop to 70 percent of parity in 1961 and 65 percent in subsequent years.

For rice, beginning with the 1959 crop, the minimum level of support was not based on the supply percentage. For the 1961 crop, the support price range was to be from 70 to 90 percent of parity and for the 1962 and subsequent crops, the range was to be from 60 to 90 percent.

REFERENDUM

The Agricultural Act of 1958 provided for a referendum for corn producers to determine if they favored continuing the then-current price support program, based on the parity concept, or shifting to a new program which discontinued acreage allotments and related support levels to average market prices.

In a referendum held in November, 1958, a majority of the growers voting favored the new program and it became effective with the 1959 crop. The AA of 1958 took oats, barley, rye, and grain sorghums out of the permissive price support category and, in effect, made them designated non-basics. They were to be supported at levels in a fair relationship to corn.

FULL PARITY

The platform of the Democratic Party in the 1960 presidential election pledged to guarantee farmers full parity of income. Candidate John F. Kennedy said that would be achieved through the most stringent production or sales limitations ever used.

In his first year in office, President Kennedy attacked the problem of the surplus stocks which had grown under the two prior Eisenhower Administrations. Immediately the new President sought passage of an emergency grain program.

Under the law which eventually passed, the Secretary of Agriculture was permitted to sell a portion of the government's stocks at current market prices.

ACREAGE DIVERSION

An acreage diversion program for corn and grain sorghums was created, under which payments could be made to producers who diverted acreage to conserving uses. That particular legislation was the forerunner of the feed grain programs which were to be in effect for most of the 1960s.

The emergency measure had a significant impact on national production. Acreage in 1961 was reduced about 20 million acres from the 1960 level; production was about 420 million bushels less; and 781 million bushels of feed grains were taken out of CCC inventories.

The Agricultural Act of 1961 continued the feed grain provisions basically unchanged from the emergency measure.

The act also continued the level of support for 1962-crop wheat within 75 to 90 percent of parity range, but tightened eligibility requirements for price supports. Acreage diversion payments were extended to wheat, also.

TWO PROGRAMS

The Food and Agricultural Act of 1962 authorized two feed grain programs—one for 1963 and another for 1964 and after.

For 1963-crop feed grains, price support eligibility provisions for acreage diversion of corn, grain sorghums, and barley were continued. The minimum support for corn was set at 65 percent of parity.

For 1964 and subsequent crops of corn, the act provided for price supports to be set between 50 and 90 percent of parity, at a level which the Secretary of Agriculture determined would not result in increased CCC stocks.

Two different programs were also set up for wheat. For 1963 wheat, the legislation provided for an emergency program which included voluntary diversion of wheat acreage. Participants were eligible for a price support payment higher than the loan level.

SUBSEQUENT CROPS

For 1964 and subsequent crops of wheat, the act provided for a marketing certificate program, with price supports between 65 and 90 percent of parity on wheat used for food domestically, and on a share of the exports as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Remaining wheat was to be supported at a level related to its feed grain value and the world wheat price. The program was dependent upon marketing quotas being in effect (however, wheat producers in a 1963 referendum did not approve marketing quotas).

One feature of the 1962 act eliminated the minimum national wheat acreage allotment plan and substituted authorization for the Secretary of Agriculture to estimate a year's requirement for wheat and set an acreage allotment to meet that need.

PROGRAM CONTINUED

The Feed Grain Act of 1963 permitted the continuation in 1964 and 1965 of the feed grains program then in effect. It postponed the implementation of provisions of earlier legislation, which would have allowed price supports to drop as low as 50 percent of parity for corn.

On October 9, 1963, President Kennedy announced the U.S. government planned to authorize large sales of wheat to the Soviet Union. He said as much as $250 million worth of wheat would be involved and American merchants involved would be eligible for export credit guarantees through the Export-Import Bank.

Immediately, Republican members of Congress criticized the President's decision and for months delayed the sale.

As a result of a very strong stand taken by the new President, Lyndon B. Johnson, legislation was passed which permitted Export-Import Bank guarantees of credit to communist nations, if the President notified Congress within 30 days of such action.

PAID CASH

In the end, the Soviet Union paid cash for the wheat and 65.6 million bushels of surplus stocks were shipped by U.S. exporters in 1964.

The major agricultural issues facing Congress in early 1964 were the cotton and wheat programs. Domestic price supports for cotton were about eight cents per pound higher than the world market price.

U.S. exporters were being paid a subsidy so they could buy cotton and sell it abroad without a loss. Domestic textile manufacturers said because they had to buy at the domestic price, they were at a disadvantage in competing with foreign manufacturers.

Because wheat farmers had rejected in a national referendum the proposed new strict marketing quotas and two-price certificate plan, wheat support prices were scheduled—under much earlier legislation—to drop drastically in 1964.

DOMESTIC SUBSIDY

President Johnson asked Congress for legislation providing subsidies to domestic cotton mills and for emergency legislation whcih would block a sharp drop in wheat price supports. Despite nearly unanimous Republican opposition, Congress passed the President's programs in April 1964.

In his first major speech on agriculture, President Johnson set the tone for his future programs. Basically he asked for a shift away from price support and production control programs alone to use of American agriculture to combat world poverty and hunger.

THREE GOALS

He outlined three broad goals: ". . . to maintain and improve farm income . . . to use U.S. food abundance to raise the standards of living both at home and around the world . . . (and) to accelerate the development and conservation of material and human resources in rural America."

In addition to subsidy payments to domestic buyers of cotton, the Agricultural Act of 1964 established a "farm domestic allotment" for each cotton farm, which would be about two-thirds as large as the farm's regular allotment.

Price support levels were set in the act for the 1964 crop for farmers complying with their regular acreage allotments.

The Secretary of Agriculture was allowed to set the support price between 65 and 90 percent of parity for the 1965 crop. Up to 15 percent higher price supports were provided for farmers who harvested only their domestic cotton allotment in 1964 and 1965.

EXPORT ONLY

In each of the years, if farmers wished to plant extra cotton for sale into export channels at the world price only, they were allowed to do so at the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture.

The 1964 law also set up a voluntary wheat marketing certificate program for 1964 and 1965, under which farmers who complied with their acreage allotments and agreed to participate in a land-diversion program would receive both price support and diversion payments. Non-compliers would receive neither.

The Secretary of Agriculture would allocate (by issuing marketing certificates) a share of the export market and a share of the domestic food market to each complying farmer. Food exporters and processors were required to buy certificates to cover all the bushels of wheat they exported or processed.

REVISED SYSTEM

President Johnson asked for—and received—in 1965 a revision of the system of production limitations and price support devices. It was designed, as well, to reduce surplus government stocks of cotton, corn, and wheat.

Farmers were asked to reitre a certain portion of their farms from production of the surplus crops and put that portion to soil-conserving purposes. Those who complied were eligible for price supports on their crops plus special, direct cash payments.

The price support was to be set at a level which would keep U.S. commodities competitive in world markets, while additional direct payments would be used to maintain farm income at desirable levels.

SOPHISTICATED SYSTEM

President Johnson's new system was a more sophisticated variation of the basic price support system that had been in effect since the New Deal days of the early 1930s.

By 1968, the program had achieved much of what it was designed to do. Corn, cotton, and wheat surpluses had all dropped sharply. At the same time, farm income was at a high level and the cost of the program was not excessive, in the opinion of many.

Even at $2 billion to $4 billion a year, supporters of the program said, it was a small price to pay to guarantee an abundant supply of food and fiber and avoid the economic calamities which would result if too many farmers were forced out of business.

The Food and Agricultural Act of 1965 also authorized the long-term diversion of cropland under a Cropland Adjustment Program. Its goal was to retire 40 million acres of land from production through five to ten year contracts. Payments on the contracts would be up to 40 percent of the annual market value of the crop that would have been produced on the land.

ACT EXTENDED

Legislation in 1968 extended the Food and Agricultural Act of 1965 through the end of 1970.

There developed in 1968 a powerful upsurge of sentiment for some kind of payment limitations on government aid to individual farmers. Supporters of the limitations—primarily Republican members of Congress (particularly Reps. Paul Findley (R-Ill.) and Silvio Conte (R-Mass.) and the American Farm Bureau Federation—believed that to impose a tight upper limit on government payments would cause the larger producers to turn against the existing farm program and kill it.

Johnson Administration officials responded that the purpose of existing farm programs was to restrict production and thus avoid price-breaking surpluses.

If the biggest farms were forced to drop out of the programs by payment limitations, their production would soar and the surplus would probably crack the entire market, with disastrous consequences for the entire economy.

PAYMENT LIMITATIONS

The payment limitations advocates managed to get through the House of Representatives in 1968 a $20,000 annual limit on payments, but the provision was dropped by House-Senate conferees.

With the election of Republican Richard M. Nixon to the presidency in 1968, national farm policy became embroiled in the overall struggles between a Republican Administration and a Democratic-controlled Congress. During his first term in office, President Nixon was able to produce a halfway move toward the Republican ideology of a market-oriented farm policy.

END TO PARITY

The Nixon Administration sought to end parity guarantees for price supports and replace them with flexible supports related to world market prices. Most farm groups fought for higher parity guarantees and argued that farm income would be lowered drastically by the Administration's proposals.

The Agricultural Act of 1970, enacted after 16 months of controversy, was a compromise between Democratic advocates of continued crop and price controls and the Administration and its allies, who wanted to loosen government restrictions and let prices rise and fall with the world market.

Congress was able to retain the general supply management approach of the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations. The Nixon Administration, however, won a major concession in what is known as the "set-aside" feature. Under it, participating farmers could be required to set aside acreage in order to become eligible for loans and payments.

WORLD PRICES

Price support levels were related to world market prices as the President had desired. Existing marketing quotas and acreage allotments were suspended for the 1971–73 crop years on wheat and cotton.

Republicans also succeeded in their efforts to impose payment limitations. The President agreed on a compromise ceiling of $55,000 per crop.

The 1970 law also allowed additional voluntary set-aside and public recreational access payments under the wheat, feed grains, and cotton programs. Cropland and conversion and other long-term land retirement programs were continued for three years.

In 1972, crop failures around the world set off global food shortages and sky-rocketing prices. World grain production was down 42 million tons in 1972. Amid a torrent of controversies, the Soviet Union purchased more than 700 million bushels of grain from the United States—including a fourth of the total wheat crop.

EXPORT CONTROLS

In 1973, the Nixon Administration—heavily influenced by the Departments of State, Treasury, and Commerce—imposed export controls in an attempt to keep farm products at home. Import quotas were lifted or eased. Price controls were implemented.

American farmers were hard pressed in 1973 to produce enough to supply domestic and foreign needs. President Nixon gambled that the shortages were long-term and relaxed production controls. Farmers were exhorted to produce as much as they could

FREE MARKET

Against the backdrop of impending world starvation, the Agriculture and Consumer Protection Act of 1973 was passed, amending the 1970 law. Through it, the Republican Administration succeeded in moving American agriculture into the "free market."

"Target prices," closely tied to world market prices, replaced direct price supports for wheat, feed grains, and cotton. No target payments were allowed if the average market price received by producers during the first five months of the marketing year (calendar year for cotton) remained at or above the target price level.

Specific target prices for 1974 and 1975 were set in the law. Target prices for 1976 and 1977 crops were to be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture to reflect changes in production costs and productivity.

The 1973 law strengthened the Secretary's authority to impose cropland set-asides and additional acreage diversions. Secretary of Agriculture Earl Butz suspended for the life of the act (through 1977) the conserving base requirement for program participants.

PAYMENTS CEILING

Payment limitation forces, led by Reps. Findley and Conte, scored a victory in the act by lowering the ceiling of total payments a person could receive under one or more of the wheat, feed grains, or cotton programs to $20,000.

Disaster payments for prevented planting and reduced yields were also authorized by the 1973 law.

Supplies continued to be tight for most farm products through the harvest of 1976 and prices remained relatively favorable.

The free market appeared to be working, but its success was predicated on the failure of agriculture somewhere in the world (domestically, in the case of cotton).

Most farmers, at that time, were pleased with the free market and made it clear during the 1976 presidential campaign they wanted it continued.

SYSTEM CONTINUED

The Food and Agriculture Act of 1977, passed under President Jimmy Carter, generally continued the system farmers said they wanted. It did, however, raise some loan levels, target prices, and payment limitation ceilings. The wheat loan price remained the same at $2.25 per bushel and the cotton loan price, figured under a complicated formula, recommended by the National Cotton Council, actually fell.

Yet, just as the free market concept had benefited from a series of crop failures from 1972 to 1975, it suffered under bumper crops in 1976 and 1977. Stocks were replenished and prices plummeted.

FALLACY EXPOSED

The fallacy of the free market concept was exposed. American farmers found prices would not cover their costs of production. Barring serious crop failures in 1978, or major policy changes, surpluses will continue and prices will remain low.

The alternatives under the present system are distressing: healthy production and low prices, or higher prices through crop failures.

It is alarming that the predicament American farmers find themselves in today so closely resembles their position during the 1920s. It should sound an alarm for the general public as well.

Solutions are being proffered from all corners. And, once again, the diverse philosophies of national farm policies are being debated in the American forum.●

ORIGIN OF THE SOLAR SYSTEM

● Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, as we strive to find solutions to the problems of man's interaction with man on Earth, there is a continuing search for knowledge about the universe and our place within that universe. The value of this search cannot be measured, nor can it be questioned. Its value is measured by history, by the inevitable though sometimes tortuous and delayed sequence from scientific discovery to the betterment of the human condition.

One of those rare discoveries of clear revolutionary importance to science has recently been made, and I wish to draw the attention of my colleagues to it.

Until very recently it has been generally assumed that the solar system was formed by the condensation of a homogenous collection of elements in space. Recent work, however, by Dr. Gerald J. Wasserburg and his colleagues at the California Institute of Technology indicates that a nearby stellar explosion (supernova) may have driven considerable alien debris into our youthful solar system. This finding, if finally confirmed, is one of the primer scientific discoveries of the space age.

Mr. President, I submit for the RECORD, two abstracts of papers to be published in the February issues of Astrophysical Journal letters.

The material follows.

CALCIUM ISOTOPIC ANAMOLIES IN THE ALLENDE METEORITE

(By Typhoon Lee, D.A. Papanastassiou, and G. J. Wasserburg)

We report isotopic anomalies in Ca which were found in two Ca-Al-rich inclusions of the Allende meteorite. These inclusions previously had been shown to contain special anomalies for Mg and O which were attributed to fractionation and unknown nuclear effects. The Ca data, when corrected for mass fractionation using $^{40}Ca/^{44}Ca$ as a standard, show non-linear isotopic effects in ^{48}Ca of +13.5 per mil and in ^{42}Ca of +1.7 per mil for one sample. The second sample shows a ^{48}Ca depletion of —2.9 per mil, but with all other isotopes being normal. Samples with large excesses in ^{26}Mg show no Ca anomalies. The effects demonstrate that isotopic anomalies exist for higher atomic number refractory elements in solar system materials and do not appear readily explainable by a simple model. The correlation of O, Mg and Ca results on the same inclusions requires the addition and preservation in the solar system of components from diverse nucleosynthetic sources. Observed anomalous Mg and Ca compositions for coexisting mineral phases are uniform within each inclusion and require initial isotopic homogeneity within an inclusion, but the preservation of wide variations between inclusions. Assuming formation of these inclusions by condensation from a gaseous part of the solar nebula, this implies isotopic heterogeneity on a scale of $10–10^2$ km within the nebula.

BARIUM AND NEODYMIUM ISOTOPIC ANOMALIES IN THE ALLENDE METEORITE

(By M. T. McCulloch and G. J. Wasserburg)

Isotopic anomalies have been found for Ba and Nd in two inclusions from the Allende meteorite. These inclusions are typical Ca-Al rich objects associated with early condensates from the solar nebula but have distinctive O and Mg isotopic anomalies of the FUN type. Sample C1 shows a depletion only in ^{135}Ba of 2 parts in 10^4 and normal Nd. Sample EK1–4–1 shows large positive excesses in the unshielded isotopes ^{135}Ba and ^{137}Ba of 13.4 and 12.3 parts in 10^4, respectively. The Nd isotopic composition in EK1–4–1 is highly aberrant in at least five isotopes. Both the Ba and Nd anomalies can be explained by a model of r-process addition. These anomalies are found to be uniform between coexisting mineral phases. These observations show the existence of substantial isotopic anomalies in refractory elements in the neighborhood of Xe and extend the range of elements showing isotopic effects to O, Ne, Mg, Ca, Kr, Xe, Ba and Nd. The observations, in conjunction with the presence of ^{26}Al ($\tau_{1/2}=7\times10^5$ years), are interpreted as the result of a nearby supernova explosion which produced elements over a wide mass range and injected them into the early solar nebula shortly before condensation.●

THE SPECIAL PROBLEMS OF WOMEN ALCOHOLICS

● Mr. HATHAWAY. Mr. President, I commend to my colleagues' attention an article written by James H. Winchester entitled "The Special Problems of Women Alcoholics," which appeared in the March 1978 issue of Reader's Digest. It presents an excellent and concise summary of the nature, extent, and impact of alcoholism among women and offers sound suggestions to address this growing problem.

The disease of alcoholism is found among more and more women. As Mr. Winchester points out, a 1974 survey showed that women accounted for 1 out of 3 new members of Alcoholics Anonymous, while in 1971 the ratio was only 1 out of 4. At present, an estimated 1 out of every 30 American women, between 2 and 3 million total, is an active alcoholic.

The Subcommittee on Alcoholism and Drug Abuse has been concerned with this problem for some time. In July 1976, we held hearings to explore the issue and concluded that attention must be focused on this underserved population. In that same year, the subcommittee revised the Comprehensive Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism Prevention, Treatment and Rehabilitation Act to provide a statutory priority on alcoholism programs for women at both the Federal and State levels. Whether this legislative mandate has made a difference so far in the prevention, identification, and treatment of the problem among women will be one of the foci at field hearings to be held tomorrow.

The impact of alcoholism is not simply limited to the woman alcoholic herself. Alcoholism has been found to be a significant factor in our high divorce rate, the incidence of battered children and spouses, and the number of runaway children. And most recently, we have become aware of the serious detrimental effect alcohol consumption by a pregnant woman can have on her unborn child. Testimony by scientific experts at subcommittee hearings last month revealed that maternal drinking can produce the so-called fetal alcohol syndrome, causing mental retardation and physical deformity, and may even be a significant cause of minimal brain dysfunction.

While the problem is growing, efforts to address and alleviate it are increasing as well. Some of these are outlined in Mr. Winchester's article.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of this article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

THE SPECIAL PROBLEMS OF WOMEN ALCOHOLICS

(By James H. Winchester)

A housewife and mother in Mississippi comes out of a mental blackout to realize with horror that she is driving the family car around the countryside with her three small children in the back seat. A middle-aged Kansas City woman sits every day at the shadowy end of the neighborhood bar. A ten-year-old Texas boy arrives home from school to find his mother passed out on the kitchen floor.

These joyless and lamentable women live in the world of the alcoholic, a world increasingly shared with other females. Consider:

In the last 20 years, the number of women in the United States who drink alcoholic beverages has increased greatly. A 1958 Gallup survey reported that 55 percent of American females drank; a 1976 study indicated that the percentage had risen to 71.

According to a 1974 survey, women were accounting for one out of every three new members of Alcoholics Anonymous. In 1971, the ratio was only one out of four.

The National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism (NIAAA) now estimates that one out of every 30 women in the United States—at between two and three million in all, more than the total populations of Idaho, Nevada and Montana—is an active alcoholic.

Why are so many women drinking? Experts cite a number of factors:

Women, more than men, pinpoint a specific, distressing situation as the source of their alcoholism—the death of a loved one, divorce, grown children leaving home, obstetrical and gynecological problems, mastectomy, even the menstrual cycle.

As husbands move forward in life, many women feel left out, and their drinking shifts from social to compulsive. Marianne Brickley, who was once married to the lieutenant governor of Michigan and is the mother of six, told a meeting of the National Council on Alcoholism: "A man calls his wife 'the little woman,' and too often that is exactly the way she feels. While my husband was climbing his political ladder to success, the only changing I did was of diapers. Trying to ease my frustrations, I graduated from beer to martinis. I became an alcoholic."

Other women take up heavy drinking out of a need to make themselves feel more feminine. Says Sharon Wilsnack, adjunct assistant professor of psychology at the University of Indiana: "Many alcoholic women have a fragile sense of their adequacy as women. They drink to gain heightened feelings of womanliness. The tragedy, of course, is that the typical consequences of heavy drinking—neglect of appearance, reduced ability to meet the demands of home or work, disapproval of friends and family—eventually make her feel less of a woman, causing her to drink even more heavily."

Many other kinds of frustration cause women to turn to alcohol as an outlet: A young wife grieving over her inability to have children; a doctor with her nerves tensed by the life-and-death decisions she has to make; a schoolteacher needing a morning pickup before facing her charges. Nearly 4.8 million families in the United States today are headed by single women who have children to raise, homes to run and, for many, full-time jobs. Says one of these caught-in-a-trap solo parents: "Try being a 27-year-old with no husband, three kids, and a job that doesn't even begin to pay the bills. Maybe you would drink, too!"

As more and more women turn to drink, there is a growing (and long-overdue) recognition that women alcoholics are special people with special needs. Says Sharon Wilsnack: "Women alcoholics differ so significantly from men that their drinking problems might almost be considered a separate illness." For example, studies have indicated that women alcoholics may have a greater vulnerability than men to liver diseases resulting from prolonged alcohol abuse and that they may run a higher risk of pneumonia. Their alcohol consumption compounds the problems of miscarriages and difficulties in conception, and increases the incidence of hysterectomies.

Forty-four percent of the offspring of chronically alcoholic women have serious problems in development, according to well-documented scientific findings reported last year. These include mental retardation, physical deformities, stunted growth, and eye defects. Warns Dr. Joseph R. Cruse, an obstetrician-gynecologist at the University of Southern California: "The only 100-percent-safe course for a pregnant woman is to abstain."

Alcohol affects women more during the days immediately prior to menstruation than during the remainder of the monthly cycle, and women taking oral contraceptives metabolize alcohol more slowly than those not on the pill. This means that women taking oral contraceptives will probably become intoxicated faster and remain drunk longer.

All these problems are made still worse by the fact that many doctors misdiagnose a woman's alcoholism as "nerves" or depression. Thus treatment may be only a tranquilizer, which complicates an already serious situation. Consider the case of a 36-year-old recovered alcoholic.

"I was having husband problems," she told me. "My nerves were at a breaking point. On a doctor's advice I started having a drink before bedtime every night to help me relax, and it wasn't long before I was also drinking in the daytime. Liquor was my friend. It didn't talk back.

"I was still tense, though, and another doctor prescribed tranquilizers. I started taking two or three at a time and washing them down with beer or whiskey. One night I went into a coma, was taken to a hospital, and didn't regain consciousness for two days. It was a close thing."

The problem of alcoholism for the working woman is compounded to a large degree by employer attitudes. Although most experts agree that the percentage of women alcoholics in the work force is rising, only a few of the larger companies and major unions recognize this trend. Indeed, surveys of occupational alcoholism programs in New York State show that less than ten percent of all employe referrals to company or union-run rehabilitation programs are women.

"It's the old double standard," says Karen Zuckerman, labor liaison for New York State's Division of Alcoholism. "Alcoholism as a problem at work first has to be recognized by a supervisor, most likely a man. He can spot job performance in a woman which is adversely affected by drinking easily enough, but he may feel uneasy about confronting her. Too often, he sweeps it under the rug as 'women's problems.' "

There is today, however, a growing awareness in business and industry that early detection and help are needed as much for women alcoholics as they are for men. Treatment programs designated just for women are opening, and results from previous programs indicate that at least 70 percent of all women getting such help will eventually return to productive work.

Still, on a nationwide basis the lack of understanding of the problems of women alcoholics remains scandalous. For example, the Department of Health, Education and Welfare funds 540 alcoholic rehabilitation programs in the United States, but only 17 of them are specifically for women. And since the great majority of studies on alcoholism are still all-male, most women alcoholics, despite their special problems, are treated the same as men.

As the scope of this problem becomes more apparent, attempts to help are increasing. Task forces in 49 states are now working to develop special research, education and treatment programs on alcoholism geared exclusively to women. Private groups are also being formed. One of them is the non-profit Women for Sobriety, with headquarters in Quakertown, Pa., and 100 chapters in 40 states. At Family House, a residential facility in Norristown, Pa., mothers can keep their children with them while they get treatment for their alcoholism.

Many more such treatment centers are needed to meet the unique needs of women alcoholics. Better training of physicians and social workers in recognizing women alcoholics and their unique problems is another priority. Says the NIAAA:

"A woman alcoholic is today most likely to seek help for such difficulties as marital instability, depression, physical ailments or financial troubles. She will make the rounds of marriage counselors, child-guidance clinics, clergymen and doctors, none of whom is likely to identify her real problem, which is the abuse of alcohol. Instead, she is referred from agency to agency, from professional to professional, never getting the kind of help she really needs. It's time this sad situation was changed." ●

SUPPORT FOR THE HART BUILDING SOLAR FEASIBILITY STUDY

● Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, on March 13, Senator HART and I introduced Senate Resolution 414 requesting the Architect of the Capitol to study the feasibility of installing a solar energy system in the new Hart Office Building. The resolution was referred to the Rules and Administration Committee, which will have final approval over the commissioning of this study. However, the Senate Office Building Commission, under the chairmanship of my distinguished colleague Senator SPARKMAN, is most closely associated with this matter. And so, on March 17, a letter was sent to Senator SPARKMAN stating reasons for studying the feasibility of a solar system.

Mr. President, 25 U.S. Senators signed that letter. Since then, two more of my colleagues—Senator ZORINSKY and Senator INOUYE—have indicated their support by becoming cosponsors of Senate Resolution 414. Such broad, bipartisan support argues strongly for spending a few thousand dollars now to determine whether a solar-assisted hot water heating system can save hundreds of thousands of dollars over the lifetime of the building.

Mr. President, I submit the letter to Senator SPARKMAN for the RECORD.

The letter follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., March 17, 1978.

HON. JOHN SPARKMAN,
Chairman, Senate Office Building Commission, U.S. Senate, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR SPARKMAN: The Senate's commitment to solar energy is well established in existing legislation. The Senate now has the opportunity to express its commitment by installing solar collectors on the new Phillip Hart Senate Office Building. Solar panels can be used to assist the building's hot water heating system. We urge the Senate Office Building Commission to request a detailed study to determine whether the installation of a solar system would save money as well as energy. The study would be a very inexpensive way to find out whether, over the long run, the hot water heating costs of this building can be decreased.

Along with the economic and technical factors that would be addressed in a feasibility study, we urge the Senate Office Building Commission to consider the demonstration value of this project and its assistance to the fledgling solar energy industry. There are few better places in the country to demonstrate a solar energy system than on the roof of a Senate Office Building. Hundreds of thousands of visitors each year would see this practical application of solar energy. Press coverage would expose it to millions more. Such a demonstration would underscore the Senate's commitment to the conservation of scarce energy resources and the utilization of renewable ones. It would testify convincingly that the Senate keeps its own house in the order it legislates for the rest of the country.

The Architect of the Capitol is already in the process of studying the feasibility of installing solar collectors on the House Office Building Annex No. 2. The need for the Senate to demonstrate the same technology is, therefore, somewhat lessened. However, thousands more visitors are likely to see the Hart Office Building each year than House Office Building Annex No. 2, which is a shuttle-bus ride from the Capitol and has no offices of Members. Senators could much more easily demonstrate a working solar energy system by sending their visiting constituents upstairs than by trying to direct them to House Office Building Annex 2.

The strongest argument for installing a solar system on the Hart Office Building, however, may be economic. Clearly, the addition of solar collectors to the Hart Office Building would be appropriate if this alternative is more economical than traditional energy sources. Thus our request that the Senate Office Building Commission direct the Architect to conduct a detailed feasibility study.

The Senate, House of Representatives, and now the conferees on the conservation provisions of the National Energy Act have adopted a measure sponsored by Senators Hart and Matsunaga requiring all federal buildings to achieve maximum energy and cost efficiency by 1990. With the passage of this legislation, all federal agencies will be required to make design, construction, equipment, building modification, and operating procedure decisions on the basis of life-cycle costs. Life-cycle costs take into account all the factors that make up the capital and maintenance cost of a building over its economic lifetime.

In accord with these principles, we would recommend a study to compare the costs of a solar assisted hot water system to a purely conventional system over the lifetime of the Hart Office Building. Among the factors that need to be considered are escalating fuel rates. Federal and private designers now calculate a fuel rate escalation of between 10% and 20% per year. Whether a solar system is economical over the life-cycle of a building depends to a large extent on the length of time assumed for that cycle. George White, the Architect of the Capitol, makes the point that Capitol Hill buildings are designed and constructed to last considerably longer than commercial office buildings. Therefore we suggest that lifecycles of 30, 50 and 70 years, at least, be studied.

Fuel prices and life cycles are two variables among many. In order to give the Senate a clear choice, we would expect ths study to present several scenarios, each based on different sets of assumptions. From these scenarios, the Senate can see the conditions under which solar hot water heating makes economic sense.

It is important that this study be done by qualified analysts. Consultants with little hands-on experience in solar collector installation may not know the most efficient methods, and so may plan a needlessly costly system. The decision to install solar collectors will, in many ways, be an investment decision. Proper assessment of life-cycle data requires expertise in economic, as well as engineering, analysis. Should your commission authorize a feasibility study, we hope you take care to see that it is done by qualified consultants.

The Architect has already received a very preliminary estimate of the cost of installing solar collectors on the Hart Office Building. The estimated cost was $75 per square foot of solar panels installed and operating. Other solar hot water projects in the D.C. area have already been bid and constructed at one-half to one-third that price. In developing figures for actual construction budgeting, we hope that a feasibility study can either explain or discredit these discrepancies.

No study can answer aesthetic questions. The preliminary estimate assumed that only 10,000 sq. ft. of solar collectors can be installed on the roof of the Hart Office Building. The report to the Architect states: "In calculating the 10,000 sq. ft., we have assumed setting the panels back from the roof parapet to allow a clear line of sight of 30°, to maintain a reasonable amount of screening of the collector panels from pedestrian view." Whether collector panels should be screened from view is a matter of taste. If collectors are designed carefully and proportionately, they can be visible and attractive elements consistent with the rest of the building. The amount of solar panels shoud not automatically be limited by an aesthetic judgment to shield them from sight. In any case, a final judgment should be made by the Senate Office Building Commission and the Committee on Rules and Administration. We feel that, if a solar system can be made much more economical by adding more square footage and exposing the system to pedestrian view, that possibility should at least be considered.

Attached to this letter is a Senate resolution requesting the feasibility study. We very much hope that the resolution will have your full cooperation and support. If there is a way to authorize the study without a resolution, we hope you will proceed immediately.

The Senate has an opportunity to display its commitment to the use of renewable resources. A comprehensive feasibility study will give the Senate Office Building Commission the information it needs to determine whether to take that opportunity. We urge you and your commission to authorize the Architect to prepare that study.

Sincerely,

MR. LOUIS SPILMAN

● Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, several years ago the Waynesboro News-Virginian of Waynesboro, Va. was acquired by the publishers of the News and Post as well as the the Evening Post of Charleston, S.C. Mr. Louis Spilman, the distinguished former publisher of the Waynesboro paper, continues to write his beloved daily column, "The Old Armchair," in the News-Virginian.

Recently Mr. and Mrs. Spilman spent several days in Charleston. His reports back to Waynesboro reveal the warmth that have long made "The Old Armchair" a favorite part of the day for his countless readers. While his stay in Charleston was brief, his reports reflect his great reportorial skills in portraying the "virile, active city" of Charleston.

On behalf of the city of Charleston, I want to express our appreciation to Mr. and Mrs. Spilman for visiting our great city and urge them to return as quickly as possible.

Mr. President, I insert "The Old Armchair" articles dated March 18, 20, and 21, 1978 in the RECORD so that my colleagues can enjoy this impartial viewpoint of my hometown:

[The News-Virginian, Mar. 18, 1978]

THE OLD ARMCHAIR: WE PAY A LONG DELAYED VISIT TO THE HEADQUARTERS OF NEWS-VIRGINIAN OWNERS

(By Louis Spilman)

CHARLESTON, S.C.—At long last we are in this charming southern city that emanates such a peaceful, friendly atmosphere of early America. We've truly sought to visit here for over 3½ years. Thanks to the snow and ice covering Waynesboro and the frigid air invading our lungs, we rushesd south shortly after returning from summer in South America. We feel so much closer to Charleston than we did in earlier years. It was from Charleston that the new owners of The News-Virginian came. They have been insisting since The News-Virginian officially changed hands (Sept. 1, 1974) that Emily and I come to this historic city for a visit.

We arrived Sunday (Mar. 12) and found ourselves housed in the famed Mills Hyatt House where "antebellum ambiance and contemporary comforts" are united to provide a friendly, delightful environment. The hotel is located in the very center of historic Charleston with its wealth of 18th and 19th Century homes, churches and public buildings, walled gardens, parks and its beautiful high Battery overlooking the placid, calm harbor. There, across the water, is unforgettable Fort Moultrie where in 1776, Col. William Moultrie with just 400 South Carolina patriots, beat off a squadron of nine British warships to record the first decisive victory of the American Revolution. Yonder is Fort Sumter, where the first shots of the Civil War were fired; and there on the end of Sullivan's Island is historic Sullivan's Island Lighthouse, maintained by the U.S. Coast Guard. This lighthouse is on the National Register of Historic Places.

Our schedule had been carefully arranged by Hall McGee, one of the major executives of the News and Courier, Charleston's morning newspaper that began its existence in 1802, and The Evening Post, owned by the same group who now also own The Waynesboro News-Virginian. On the evening of our arrival we were dinner guests of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Gilbreth, also a major executive of the Charleston newspaper corporation. Mr. Gilbreth is also one of the 12 children made famous by the book, "Cheaper By the Dozen" which he, himself, coauthored. Monday was full of excitement and activity.

The day started with a personally conducted tour of Charleston by one of the most capable registered guides in the city . . . Mrs. Joseph Rutledge Young. Her husband is one of Charleston's outstanding attorneys and Mrs. Young continues her contribution to acquainting visitors with the city primarily because she loves its history and enjoys its present-day atmosphere as a place to live. At noon, Peter Manigault, whose grandfather started the Manigault family in the newspaper business, entertained Emily and me at lunch in a delightful little Greek Restaurant tourists never seem to find, but where we were served a delicious Greek salad, some fresh shrimp right out of the ocean, and some matchless Greek pastry.

Following lunch we were transported by Mr. Manigault to the huge and impressive plant and offices of the newspapers. Here Mr. McGee took us on tour. We were breathless as we proceeded from department to department and saw the modern machinery already installed and being installed. Chief attention-compeller was the new 10-unit offset press. It will be ready for use May 1 and will help place the Charleston newspapers in an even more dominant position in South Carolina. Our Monday was complete with dinner at the charming Old Colony House as guests of Mr. and Mrs. McGee. We have known Hall for nearly four years but this was our first opportunity to meet and become acquainted with Mrs. McGee. What a lovely, beautiful lady she is; a native, incidentally, of Rhodesia in Africa. She exudes deep interest in just about everything and her blonde attractiveness, sparkling eyes and flashing smile exude a friendliness that captivated us.

THE OLD ARMCHAIR: CHARLESTON, S.C., BREATH OF EARLY DAYS, IS NOW LINKED CLOSELY WITH WAYNESBORO

CHARLESTON, S.C.—How fortunate for Waynesboro and vicinity it is that the present owners and operators of The News-Virginian consist of these magnificent "directors of action" and "maintenance of tradition" in Charleston. But let us continue a brief recitation, at least, of the glimpse these exciting few days have provided us in this "dream city" of the past and this virile, active city of the present. If it were possible to share with you the complete story of Charleston's greatness as told us with such enthusiasm by Mrs. Elisabeth Young, our captivating guide, it would require an entire edition of The News-Virginian.

Among other things that remains firmly imbedded in my mind is the fact that the front doors of the scores of charming antebellum homes that still arouse unallayed fascination, are lovely beyond compare. Of supreme interest to me is that every door is different; there are no two alike. Those who doubt this are privileged to spend the many, many days that would be required to make an exhaustive door-to-door check. But we believe it! We were told that all new buildings, all restorations, all remodelling, all painting etc., must be approved in Charleston by the City's Restoration Commission.

Every effort is made to oppose construction of "skyscrapers" in Charleston. Before control of building activities was begun, however, a tall hotel was constructed along the waterfront. The Mills Hyatt House in which we so comfortably reside is 79-feet high. However, no further buildings more than 50 feet high are permitted. Gardens are lavish and well-kept. If is truly a paradise for expert gardeners and landscape artists. Most of the early settlers in Charleston were English but many followed from the Barbados Islands; French Huguenots, German, Dutch, Irish, Scottish, and Jewish followed all seeking a new way of life. Later came an influx of refugees from the French cosmopolitan community and religious tolerance was evidenced by the fact that one of its early Governors, John Archdale, was a Quaker.

There are approximately 300 churches in Charleston. The original, St. Phillips (Protestant Episcopal) was established in 1690. The Southern Baptist Church probably had its origin in Charleston where the First Baptist Church was organized by the first Baptist congregation in South Carolina. The Lutherans, Unitarians, Congregational, Roman Catholic, Christian and Presbyterian were all begun early as was the Methodist Episcopal (now United Methodist). Of extreme personal interest to Emily and me was our visit to the Manigault Mansion, which was begun in 1802 and is an outstanding example of Adam architecture.

Charleston was the home and birthplace of innumerable patriots before and during the Revolutionary War. We cannot name them all but four were signers of the Declaration of Independence . . . Thomas Heyward Jr., Thomas Lynch, Jr., (who signed the Declaration in his father's stead, his father becoming seriously ill at the time), Arthur Middleton and Edward Rutledge. In 1788, South Carolina became the 8th of the original 13 colonies to ratify the Federal Constitution of "infant U.S.A." On December 20, 1860, South Carolina became the first state to secede from the Union.

THE OLD ARMCHAIR: FAREWELL CHARLESTON! WE FEEL AS IF WE HAVE BEEN LIVING IN COLONIAL DAYS

CHARLESTON, S.C.—Within a few hours we'll be taking reluctant leave of this colorful, dramatic and historic city of the "Old South." We've enjoyed every minute except, perhaps, the 15 minutes we had to stand in line, here at the hotel, to be seated for breakfast this morning. Tourism is the source of Charleston's biggest income. It likewise insures regular employment for hundreds of Charlestonians. It seems the tourist season is beginning to operate in a big way now, as the matchlessly beautiful Charleston gardens begin to blossom . . . blossoming late, we are told, because of the past two rather severe winters.

South Carolina, as a State, probably symbolizes the New South more than any other State. South Carolina refused to recognize the end of the Civil War (it's still called the War of Northern Aggression by many here in Charleston). The result was that U.S. troops took over the State at the conclusion of the War and remained here until 1877. South Carolina, as a result, required years for recovery. But today the State is bristling with industry (remember when Du Pont established a plant at Camden, S.C., and transferred many from the Waynesboro plant to get it underway?

But Charleston apparently is undisturbed about change. The goal here is apparently continued revival of the early days. This area was one of the wealthiest and most aggressive of any city in the entire 13 Colonies. Efforts to establish a permanent settlement at Charleston (it was first called Charles Town) were made unsuccessfully in 1526 and 1562 and it was 1670 before a permanent settlement was actually started. Even this first settlement had to be moved from Albemarle Point, where it was susceptible to attack by marauding Spaniards, to the present location on the peninsula between the Ashley and the Cooper rivers . . . the magnificent Charleston Bay resulting when the two rivers merge.

Gardens are everywhere in Charleston. Three gardens . . . Middleton, Magnolia and Cypress . . . have attained national fame. They are visited annually by hundreds of thousands who are eager to absorb the beauty that radiates therefrom. The southern end of Charleston with its narrow, crooked streets and lovely 18th and 19th century houses that have been so skillfully maintained or restored, remains the favorite residential district of the City. Indicative of the early vision of greatness emanating from its citizenry, the first Chamber of Commerce in the United States was founded here in 1773.

Charleston is likewise the birthplace of Scottish Rite Masonry . . . a plaque on the side of a building at Church and Broad streets proclaims this fact. By 1775 Charleston had become one of the most important Atlantic Coast seaports in North America. The city was also the capital of South Carolina until 1790 when the capital was moved to Columbia, which is much more centrally located. In 1736 the Dock Street Theatre was opened . . . the first building in America constructed solely for theatrical purposes. The city's oldest building, the Old Powder Magazine, built in 1713, is still extant and houses, as so many preserved Charleston buildings do, a museum. It's a real treat to visit Charleston . . . try it sometime!●

TAXPAYER ASSISTANCE FAIRNESS ACT

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, last year I introduced S. 1379, the Taxpayer Assistance Fairness Act. This bill seeks to address a fundamental wrong in our tax system: People who turn to the Internal Revenue Service for tax advice often cannot depend on that advice to be correct.

My legislation attempts to provide protection for taxpayers who need the IRS assistance. It prohibits the IRS from assessing interest and penalties on back taxes owed if those taxes were owed as a result of incorrect IRS advice. It also mandates that the IRS upgrade the standards for its taxpayer assistance program.

A statement released yesterday by the General Accounting Office shows that the IRS has made some improvement in its taxpayer assistance programs. But the GAO statement also underscores the need for taxpayer protection against IRS errors.

I ask that an article in yesterday's Washington Star on this subject be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

The article follows:

CALLING IRS FOR TAX RETURN HELP?

(By John Holusha)

If you call the Internal Revenue Service for help on certain areas of your tax return, the odds are only about 60–40 you will get the right answer.

And if you accept the wrong answer, it's your fault. The IRS does not stand behind its own answers.

Although IRS taxpayer assistance is generally 87 percent correct, a test conducted by the General Accounting Office early this month showed that accuracy varies sharply with the question asked and the IRS center giving the answer.

The results of the GAO survey were presented today to the House Commerce consumer protection subcommittee headed by Rep. Benjamin Rosenthal, D-N.Y.

IRS Commissioner Jerome Kurtz said "in light of the referral error rates identified . . . we will establish a mandatory quality review system to identify error rates for referral assistors on a separate basis."

IRS has established a system of 70 offices reachable through toll-free telephone lines to assist the millions of Americans struggling to meet the April 15 filing deadline for their tax returns. Last year IRS was contacted 29 million times for help by taxpayers.

Kurtz claimed that the answers given over the phone have been 91 percent accurate this year, but conceded that the average was padded by simple questions such as taxpayers asking which form to use.

GAO tested the workings of the taxpayer advice system by calling 20 of the 70 centers on a random basis and asking one of 14 pre-selected questions dealing with issues changed by the 1976 tax reform act. Since this was the section of law most recently changed, it would logically be the one most confusing to taxpayers.

Overall. the survey found that 87 percent of the responses were correct, but that the accuracy rate fell off to 79 percent when the question involved was at all complex.

These represent averages. The actual accuracy varied widely, depending on the question and the office.

A puzzled taxpayer calling IRS' Jackson, Miss., office had only a 74.4 percent chance of getting a right answer, while one calling Richmond was running 88.9 percent odds. The Dallas office took the honors with a 94.3 percent accuracy rate.

Somecne who wanted to know how to deduct alimony payments was fortunate. IRS scored 100 percent on that one.

But an unfortunate taxpayer with this problem was in for trouble:

Question: I was transferred from New York last March. I spent $650 looking for a house and $985 on meals and a motel while waiting for my house to be ready. I was not reimbursed for any of this. Can I take this as a deduction?

Only 59 percent of the responses were correct. (The answer is yes, subject to a maximum deduction of $1,500 and a 30-day time limit on meals and lodging.)

GAO commented that "the accuracy rates of the tax assistors . . . were sufficiently low to warrant IRS attention." The watchdog agency added that the low rates were "particularly noteworthy since IRS considers telephone referrals to be a critical factor in providing quality service to taxpayers."

The GAO survey did note that it will be easier to get through to the inquiry centers, with an average wait of about a minute, and it found that the tax assistors were courteous 89 percent of the time.

However, Kurtz noted that the limitations of the IRS budget mean that "between 7 and 8 million taxpayers calling in for answers to questions . . . may not be answered this year."

Kurtz also said that the simplification of some areas of tax law have increased the use of the short form return and that the error rate on the short form was down to 4.3 percent so far this year from 11.3 percent last year.

Kurtz also said early returns this year indicate that more taxpayers are filling out their own forms. Only 32 percent showed the signature of a commercial tax preparer compared to 42 percent last year.

However, a representative of some retired peoples associations said that IRS assumed that Congress would pass the Technical Corrections Act last year when it made up this year's forms.

The act was not passed, James Hacking said, and as a result couples living in community property states stand to lose tax credits as a result of the erroneous instructions.●

A TRIBUTE TO HUBERT HUMPHREY

● Mr. MUSKIE. Mr. President, on February 2, 1978, a service of thanksgiving for the life and work of Hubert Humphrey was held at the American Church in London, England. The service was attended by the Prime Minister, members of the Cabinet, Ambassador Brewster, and Mrs. Thatcher, leader of the opposition, among others.

Hubert Humphrey touched the hearts not only of Americans but people throughout the world. The service in London is eloquent testimony to that fact.

Mr. Anthony Hyde, chairman of the Democratic Party Committee Abroad, delivered a moving eulogy at the service "Reflections on Hubert H. Humphrey."

I ask that Mr. Hyde's remarks be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

REFLECTIONS ON HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

There is a dream—an old fashioned American Dream—that every American boy can grow up to be President.

Part of that dream—and it is not yet dead in America—is that courage and loyalty; decency and kindness; and the willingness to work and to work hard will be rewarded by success.

Hubert Horatio Humphrey had that dream; and although the ultimate prize three times escaped him, who is to say that his life was not a success?

Success is, after all, not a destination. It is a journey. And Hubert's journey, as the record shows, ran true and straight. Even in moments of failure and frustration—including the ultimate frustration of death—the spirit of this remarkable and remarkably successful man shone through with a strong and steady light.

I never asked him how he got the name of "Horatio." My own opinion is: it was an echo of the turn-of-the-century optimism of America as the "can-do" country. America has a sense of the possible and Humphrey was the embodiment of this. His bounce, his buoyancy, his "can-do" spirit came to him as a priceless personal legacy from his mother and father and before that from his Yankee and immigrant forebears.

Over the years I have had some experience with that "priceless personal legacy"! It dates from the time our close friend, Bill Benton, asked me to help in Humphrey's first Senate re-election campaign in 1954 and includes the time when some of us gave a dinner in his honour, and afterwards went on to Annabels. At three in the morning, I remember his son Skip saying to him: "Dad, we better go home and let these good people get some sleep." Hubert knew how to play hard as well as work hard.

His career is pure Americana. For some it may seem corny. If it does, so be it.

He was born in 1911 in Wallace, South Dakota, in a room over a drug store, the fourth child of Hubert and Christine Humphrey. Much of his early life he spent on a farm and all of his life he had a feeling for the land and for the people who work on the land.

At 10 years of age we see him working in his father's drug store, washing dishes and serving sodas. This is almost the classic American pattern of its day.

What was not so usual, was his father's deep interest in politics and in the issues of the day, which he discussed with his customers. They used to say about him: with every pill, he sold or tried to sell an idea—an idea about the "good society." The young Hubert grew up in this cracker-barrel atmosphere.

In 1926 he went through an early Mid-West Bank closing and lost his life's savings. At 15 he got off lightly: his life's savings were $140!

The next year the Depression struck the Mid-West in earnest and his father had to sell his house to pay his bills.

But his father had that irrepressible spirit and energy which all of us recognize in his famous son. He made a new start.

At high school Hubert's record was outstanding: athlete, star debater, top student and class valedictorian. This was a taste of early success. But Hubert was no stranger to failure—even if it was not his own.

Oh yes, he knew failure: failure of the American Dream to stand up to the harsh realities of the 20's: failure of the land to produce: failure of businesses: of financial institutions: the failure of Government to act in response to the needs of the American People.

Hubert was very much a child of the Great Depression and of the New Deal.

He knew what it was like to hitchhike because there was no money for fares;

To have to leave university twice: once because, even with his own earnings, there was no money to pay for tuition: a second time, after he had been able to return on a scholarship, because his father was ill and both he and his brother had to leave to run the family business.

He knew about duty and loyalty, too . . . a characteristic for which he was to be criticised in later political life.

All this left its mark on the boy and the young man who was to become one of the most useful, compassionate, effective and successful men in public life, in our time.

It left its mark but it never touched the core of the man: his optimism, his bounce, his warmth, his belief in himself and in other people.

He had a dream of going to Washington, of doing things . . . big things; and of being "someone" in the world, as he would put it. It bubbled to the surface in a letter he wrote from Washington to Muriel Buck, the girl he was to marry. He wrote:

"I can see how someday, if you and I just apply ourselves and make up our minds to work for bigger things, how we can someday live here in Washington and probably be here in Government politics or service. I intend to set my aim for Congress. Together we can do things, I am sure. Never let me get lazy or discouraged. You be my inspirational force, Muriel."

Lazy or discouraged, he never was.

They say that behind every great man, there stands a woman. Hubert was luckier than that. His Muriel walked beside him . . . grew with him . . . shared his triumphs and endured his defeats. She is the kind of a wife that if a man reached out in the dark, her hand would be there.

I have "sketched-in" Hubert Humphrey as a boy and as a young man because it helps to explain the mature man.

He was a man of international stature and outlook, yet he was intensely American. He stood for the old fashioned virtues which have helped to make America great.

For the can-do spirit.
For hard work.
For loyalty.
For courage.
For determination.
For compassion for the weak and needy.
For the equality—yes, and for the brotherhood of man.

He loved his family. He cared. He cared passionately . . . but not just for his family and friends . . . for America . . . for mankind.

He knew how to accept defeat and yet remain undefeated.

He had the ability to live and to fight without rancor. He was forgiving. There was no malice in the man. No envy; no bitterness; no self-pity. What a man!

Of the thousands of letters he received during his stays in hospital, one that he particularly treasured was from Sugar Ray Robinson, which ended with the line: "Keep on punching, old buddy." Hubert kept on punching; not just for himself but for all of us. My friend Archie MacLeish has called this "a special kind of gallantry."

There will always be a warm place in the hearts of those who knew him either in person, as I did, or by his services to the Nation. And when those hearts no longer beat, he will move softly into the pages of history. Though he could not quite make the American Dream come true for himself, he did for millions of others. His eloquence and energy made the dream become the law: for Equal Opportunity: for Equal Rights: for Human Rights. And this was true for much of the major legislation in America of the past quarter century.

He will be known as the man who loved his fellow man . . . who gave all he had to give: to America . . . and to the world. Gave it with joy and without restraint. Oh, yes. The bounce and the joy will be remembered. The Happy Warrior has left the scene. The World is not a poorer place. It is a richer place because he passed here and the American Dream still lives.●

INDIANAPOLIS RUBBER COMPANY

○ Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, as the Congress prepares to embark on an extensive national debate about ways in which existing jobs might be saved and new jobs created in our large cities, a quite remarkable success story has unfolded in my home city of Indianapolis. The Uniroyal Rubber Plant, employing 600 people within a few blocks of the center of the city, was given final notice of closing by Uniroyal headquarters located, ironically, in New York City.

Behind the visionary leadership of Beurt SerVaas, who serves Indianapolis as both businessman and city-county council president, the workers and management of the plant combined forces with the city's three largest banks to effect a purchase of the factory. Under a new title, the Indianapolis Rubber Co., and a unique arrangement in which profits and management decisions will be shared with the employees, the business and the 600 jobs will be preserved.

Extensive plant modernization has been pledged by management, a plan to increase productivity is being formulated by the plant's union workers, and even the possibility of future expansion and new job creation seems plausible.

Like many developments in the dramatic revival of downtown Indianapolis over the last decade, the saving of Indianapolis Rubber Co. was a self-help project, accomplished without a "bail-out" from any other level of government. Let us hope that this same spirit can be fostered in many other large American cities by future Federal policies.

An excellent article by Jonathan Kwitny, describing the efforts to save the Indianapolis Rubber Co., appeared in the Wall Street Journal on March 22. I submit this article to be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

TUBE PLANT, 600 JOBS SAVED IN INDIANAPOLIS—IN THE NICK OF TIME

(By Jonathan Kwitny)

INDIANAPOLIS.—A few blocks from the towering new municipal building that symbolizes this city's growth, a homely 87-year-old rubber factor hums away, a symbol of the city's spirit.

The factory has long been the country's leading producer of inner tubes. It operates profitably. Its $7 million to $8 million annual payroll sustains the families of nearly 600 employes. Perhaps more important, the factory, if it lasts, may show other communities a way to save jobs and avoid human displacement.

Three months ago, the factory almost closed down. Its owner, Uniroyal Inc., the multinational tire and chemical concern based in the New York area, had been threatening to close its Indianapolis plant for many years. Then, last Dec. 16, the firm gave one week's final notice.

Like Western towns that have lost mines, and Ohio towns that have lost mills, Indianapolis was faced with an economic blow because the faraway executives of a giant corporation had decided to rid themselves of what to them was just another plant in the hinterland.

CAPITALISM AND SOCIALISM

But now the plant has been saved, by a bold experiment, with an unusual assortment of characters applying a combination of economic philosophies. Now known as the Indianapolis Rubber Co., the plant relies partly on capitalism: It is headed by a free-wheeling entrepreneur who has made millions from his knack of reviving failing businesses. It also relies partly on socialism: The workers will participate in management and share the profits 50–50.

And there is an additional factor that some people regard as more important than economic systems—a spirit of goodwill in the form of concerned city officials and the cooperation of several local bankers who seem startled and pleased by their own apparent show of civic spirit.

To many persons here, Uniroyal's decision to close the plant seemed heartless: The plant was making a profit; many of its workers were in sight of retirement and needed the factory to fill out their careers and qualify them for pensions; and the city needed the payroll.

Uniroyal declined numerous requests for an interview with an executive who knows about the Indianapolis situation. The company said it would agree only to issue formal statements in reply to questions submitted in advance. This reporter declined to operate under such strictures, but first he did ask why Uniroyal closed the plant. The company, in a formal statement, cited "high labor costs" and "steadily declining demand."

"TOO BIG TO LOOK"

Union and management officials who worked at the plant tell another story. They say that Uniroyal could have kept the plant operating profitably if it wanted to but that, under pressure from the securities markets, management decided to concentrate its energy on higher-growth chemical lines. Interviews with securities analysts support this theory. Richard Haydon, an analyst at Goldman, Sachs & Co., says:

"You have one very large entity looking at a very small entity, but the small entity being very large to those people that work there. I think it's a truism that many companies have grown too big to look at the small market. In order to protect the health of the company, they have to look at markets with major growth potential."

Whatever the motive for a shutdown, those who are hurt by one aren't apt to take a charitable view of it. Today, though, Indianapolis may have the last laugh on the financial moguls who gave up on inner-tube production.

"It's developed into a community-type thing," says Ralph Frey, 61, the industrial-relations manager at the plant who was dumped from the Uniroyal payroll after 37 years but has taken the same job at Indianoplis Rubber. "The employes are behind it and the managers are going to be behind it," Mr. Frey says. "Everything I have heard is basically favorable."

OPENED IN 1892

Ironically, Indianapolis Rubber Co. is the name the plant bore when it opened in 1892. Uniroyal (then called U.S. Rubber Co.) bought the plant in 1905. It now consists of 17 to 19 brick buildings interconnected so confusingly that even the managers aren't sure how many there are. Most were built around 1910 and 1920.

Longtime employes say they have heard threats of a shutdown since the 1940s. But the threat that came true was first issued on Jan. 12, 1977; Uniroyal announced it had tentatively decided to phase out production at Indianapolis. It didn't say when.

A local Chamber of Commerce official wrote Uniroyal, complaining. He mailed copies to Mayor William H. Hudnut III, a former Presbyterian minister, and to City Council President Beurt SerVass, the free-wheeling entrepreneur. Mr. SerVaas's best-known acquisition was Curtis Publishing Co., which owns The Saturday Evening Post, but far more profitable are several big forging plants and a chemical company. Mr. SerVass's own father had been a salesman at the Uniroyal plant for 10 years and was laid off in the Depression.

At the request of Mayor Hudnut and Mr. SerVaas, W. H. Schmalz, president of Uniroyal's tire division, flew to Indianapolis on Feb. 7, 1977, to discuss the plant. But he shunned their suggestions of aid (such as a city bond issue) and let them know he thought that costs, particularly for labor, were impossibly high; that tubeless tires and the energy shortage had made tubes almost obsolete; and that, anyway, tubes could be made cheaper elsewhere. "It was a rather gloomy forecast," the mayor recalls.

Undaunted, he and Mr. SerVaas hoped to find a buyer for the plant. They met there with a delegation from the union to see if the workers would negotiate with a new management. "The employees were skeptical and unwilling to trust them, but said they would talk it over," a note-taker for the mayor recorded. Uniroyal talked of selling the plant to a Canadian firm and to a group of tire dealers, but the negotiations collapsed. Last July, Uniroyal announced that it would "phase out all production . . . gradually over the coming year."

Meanwhile, Mr. SerVaas had kept talking with the company and the union. He soon decided that productivity at the plant had suffered because of workers' hostility toward Uniroyal, hostility engendered largely by the repeated threats of a shutdown and by what the workers saw as corporate incompetence and red tape.

Even the president of the United Rubber Workers' local, James Carmichael, 33, concedes that workers seemed to delight in finding new ways to goof off on the job, such as by drawing out grievance procedures. Mr. Carmichael says the workers weren't convinced that Uniroyal meant to get out. "They kept the threat hanging over the people's heads till they were immune to it," he says.

Mr. Carmichael and other workers say profits were modest because Uniroyal withheld needed upkeep and equipment from the plant, having decided years ago to switch resources to chemicals; the workers felt that the company didn't care, so they didn't either. "There's still plenty of market out there," Mr. Carmichael says.

AGREEMENT EXPRESSED

In recent interviews, several men who had been executives at the plant for Uniroyal agreed with these statements by Mr. Carmichael. Most of the executives were let go by Uniroyal when the firm abandoned the plant, but one of them, Herbert Kohls, is still with the company. Mr. Kohls, who was the plant manager, now is a Uniroyal division executive in Detroit.

As for Uniroyal's statement that high labor costs made the plant unviable, Mr. Carmichael says the union approached a Uniroyal tire-division official last year with an offer to renegotiate the costly contract to improve productivity if Uniroyal would keep the plant open. "I asked Uniroyal if they would give us a commitment in writing if we made concessions," Mr. Carmichael says. "I asked them point blank how much money it would take to keep the plant open. They wouldn't give me a figure. They wouldn't give me any guarantee." Mr. Kohls confirmed this.

Mr. SerVaas was so impressed with Mr. Carmichael that he went to Akron with him to see union president Peter Bommarito. Mr. Bommarito convinced Mr. SerVaas that the rubber workers would negotiate a reasonable contract to save the jobs.

Unable to interest Uniroyal in keeping the plant, Mr. SerVaas asked the firm for a purchase price and got a ballpark figure of $5 million. He tried to form a syndicate of Indianapolis businessmen, but they wouldn't invest. If Uniroyal couldn't make it, how could we? they asked. Then Mr. SerVaas decided he might put up $1 million himself and borrow the rest. American Fletcher National Bank, where he is a director, was interested, but it said the remaining $4 million was too big a bite.

A HUDDLE WITH THREE BANKS

So in June, Mr. SerVaas brought together top officers of the city's three major banks—American Fletcher, Indiana National and Merchants National—appealing to their civic spirit to save 600 jobs. The banks, fierce competitors, say they had never participated jointly in a commercial venture. But they agreed to consider a deal if one came.

Then Mr. SerVaas persuaded Uniroyal to finance the purchase of the real estate—$650,000, over 10 years, so the banks would have to put up only about $1 million each. And he asked Uniroyal to contract to buy inner tubes from him (it would have to buy them somewhere) if he could match the prices of competitors in the South and in Taiwan. He thought he was making headway in August when the plant shut down for its annual vacation. Then Uniroyal suddenly announced that it had sold much of the machinery and was about to ship it off. The plant might not reopen.

"This came as a terrible blow to the workers," Mr. SerVaas says, "They called me over to the union hall and I told them I'd try to get management to hook it all up again." Management did.

In September, Mr. SerVaas and the union agreed on a contingency contract. It was ratified early in October. Wages weren't cut ("I don't believe you can cut a man's wages," Mr. SerVaas says), and some incomes could even rise due to piecework bonuses. But the workday was lengthened in effect by ending pay for lunch, cleanup and union business periods. Also, there is no pension plan or supplemental unemployment pay for layoffs.

After taxes and debt retirement, however, 50% of the profits must be passed out among the workers, prorated according to pay. The union will have two seats on the 12-man board of directors. "They're entitled to decide, along with the rest of management how we're going to run this factory," Mr. SerVaas says. Mr. SerVaas pledged to plow his 50% of the profit back into plant improvements for the three years of the contract.

On Oct. 12 he showed the contingency contract to the bankers, who were impressed, though some grumbled about having workers in the board room. ("As a Goldwaterite, I would have to say 'no comment'," says one.)

A DEMAND FOR DATA

Next, the banks demanded intricate financial data, including appraisals of the machinery and inventory that would collateralize the loans. To compile this, Mr. SerVaas hired a former local banker they all respected.

Meanwhile, in off the street walked Donald Alsop, a young former executive at Firestone, now a consultant. He had heard that Mr. SerVaas might be buying a rubber company and wanted to know if he could help. Mr. Alsop went on the SerVaas payroll to line up customers and think of other products the plant could make with its big rubber-mixing capacity. Mr. SerVaas took off to tour successful inner-tube plants in Taiwan.

The bankers' last demand was for a contract from Uniroyal to buy 50% of the inner-tube production. (Mr. SerVaas could sell the rest to independent tire-makers or service-station suppliers who had been buying from the plant all along.) Negotiations were slow.

On Dec. 15, while the talks dragged on, Mr. SerVaas, back from Taiwan, heard about the shutdown announcement coming the next day. He assembled the bankers again, gave them a detailed package and asked for a quick okay, contingent on the tube-sales deal. The bankers said they would think about it.

The next day, news of the closing, scheduled for Dec. 23, broke like a bombshell at the plant. Uniroyal said it would keep only one employe—Mr. Kohls, the manager.

About a third of the union workers were 55, or had worked there 30 years, so were entitled to at least partial retirement pay. A third had been at the plant less than 10 years. As for the rest—"The ones I feel sorry for are the ones who have been here 15 or 20 years and aren't eligible for retirement," says John Misch, the plant's former labor-relations supervisor, who lost his own job after four years. The union estimates that 45 or 50 workers fell just a few years short of qualifying for pensions. Now they still won't get them, but at least they have jobs.

OTHERS ALSO HURT

Management employes, too, were hard hit. One, who wasn't far from retirement, pulls out a table and tells a reporter he now qualifies to receive $493 a month from Uniroyal after he turns 65, whereas if he had been able to work until then, he would have received $867 a month.

Some managers had a clear early sense that the plant would fold, but they still couldn't find work. Uniroyal, they say, told them that if they took a job with another rubber company—the kind of job they'd be most experienced at—they would lose all pension rights. Age was another problem.

"Nobody, regardless of the age discrimination laws, is willing to hire you when you're seven years from retirement," says Bertram Baker, 56, a foreman at the plant 26 years, as he flips through a file of form letter rejections.

"You've raised your kids, you're reaching a point where you can just sit around and enjoy life a little bit and look forward to retirement," Mr. Baker says, "and suddenly somebody pulls the rug out from under you."

That well describes the morale at the plant the last week before Christmas. There were only the scantiest rumors of the discussions that were going on behind the scenes. If a deal hadn't been sealed by Dec. 23, the scheduled closing day, Mr. SerVaas says, he would have gone elsewhere.

On Wednesday, Dec. 21, two of the banks said they'd put up their $1 million. But the third bank, Indiana National, held out for what it says were "technical requirements" about "who would police it."

On Friday morning, the last day, Thomas Miller, president of Indiana National, "was out making a Christmas call on one of our branches. George Clark, the executive vice president, called and asked if I would agree to drop the requirement. I said okay."

GETS THE GOOD WORD

At 11 a.m. the good news was phoned to Mr. SerVaas, who was still negotiating with Uniroyal for a commitment to buy inner tubes. At 11:10, Uniroyal—now the only apparent obstacle to the plant's survival—agreed; obviously the price was right. At noon Mr. SerVaas told a press conference at his city council office that if everyone lived up to his word, the workers could come back to their jobs after a three-week break for reorganization and inventory. Some 97% applied to return. Everyone lived up to his word, and the plant was saved. Mr. SerVaas was the proud owner and president of the Indianapolis Rubber Co.

Over the three-week break, union president Carmichael and consultant Alsop, who by that time had been named Mr. SerVaas's plant manager, chatted optimistically with each other and with a reporter about new machinery, new customers, new products and improved efficiency. They seemed to be talking not as adversaries but as partners—which, in light of the 50–50 profit split, they are.

Mr. Carmichael says the profit sharing has caused a turnaround in employee resentfulness. "We got some people here, you're not going to change them," he says, "but those people are going to find themselves out in the cold. The guy that's just a troublemaker, I don't see the people going along with him once the profit-sharing is established."

Mr. SerVaas has forecast that after one year, about $500,000 in profits will be distributed among the workers and a matching $500,000 will be invested in new machinery. That pleases Mr. Carmichael who talks disparagingly of production foul-ups and lost business in the past caused, he says, by Uniroyal's refusal to spend for needed parts or repairs. Local management, Mr. Carmichael says, had neither the budget nor the authority to run the plant.

"LAST ON THE TOTEM POLE"

Mr. Kohls, the outgoing manager who now is a divisional executive for Uniroyal, seems to agree. "This plant was last on the totem pole and always has been as far as capital expenditures are concerned," he says. "We needed a Banbury body (an expensive piece of rubber-mixing equipment whose absence was cited by Mr. Carmichael as a cause of lost sales). We needed it badly for three or four years. Uniroyal just had a better place to put the money."

Mr. Kohls joins Messrs. Carmichael and Alsop and a reporter on a tour of the plant. Mr. Carmichael complains that Uniroyal caused its own problems with bad management. Mr. Alsop points out unused space and equipment and says he is researching new products, including two that Uniroyal once made and dropped—valves for tubeless tires and camelback (or tread) rubber. He says Uniroyal just never looked at the right markets for these products and others.

Stopping by a machine that turns out rubber fittings for truck wheels, Mr. Alsop says the plant can increase sales of these items by 50 percent.

"You should be able to," Mr. Kohls agrees.

Then why didn't Uniroyal do it? the reporter asks.

"I always wanted to," Mr. Kohls shrugs. "The in-house needs were all I was told to worry about."●

THE FARMERS

● Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, in recent weeks we have discussed the financial difficulties of farmers and steps that might be taken by the Federal Government to help them. I recognize their need, but I fear we are unable to agree on the answers. Our conversations with farmers have been honest. They deserve and most want an open exchange of views, not misleading evasions. I have told them that while I shared their goal of fair prices and a decent income, I did not believe that this could be achieved by legislation that would guarantee prices set at 100 percent of parity, regardless of the realities of the marketplace, nor could I support legislation that would encourage drastic cuts in production, risking famine in a hungry, turbulent world. On the contrary, I believe we should be rewarding the American farmer for his productivity. We should be penetrating foreign markets with his crops, not pricing ourselves out of them.

For these reasons I regret the action taken by the Senate this week in passing the conglomerate Talmadge set-aside bill with the Dole "flexible parity" amendment. The Talmadge bill as reported by the Agriculture Committee was a defensible emergency 1-year measure, and I would have supported it on that basis. It would have brought immediate help to hard-pressed farmers, and it had been fairly assessed both by the Department of Agriculture and the Congressional Budget Office. The McGovern amendment raising target prices and loan levels for wheat, feed grains, and upland cotton to more realistic levels also would have helped, and I supported it.

I would not have supported the Dole bill if we had been given an opportunity to vote on it as a separate and alternative measure. I voted against it as an amendment. It would have caused prices to rise to heights that would cause distress for livestock, dairy, and poultry farmers. American wheat and feed grains would have been squeezed out of world markets. In the end the farmer would suffer, and along with him, the taxpayers and consumers. The cost of the program would be borne not only at the supermarket but in taxes paid to cover the public expense. Citizens are willing to pay so that farmers will earn a fair return, but not for unworkable programs that do not help farmers in the long run.

Combining the Talmadge and Dole bills by adding the Dole bill as an amendment to the Talmadge bill created a monster. I agree with the distinguished Senator from Iowa (Mr. CLARK) who called it "a kind of cruel hoax." Even though the two proposals are mutually contradictory, the Senate has deluded some farmers into believing that the combination gives them the best of both worlds. In fact, even with the wisdom of experience and the help of the most advanced computer it would be almost impossible for a farmer to choose among the variety of paths the bill would set before him. Equally difficult would be any assessment of the bill's effects on prices, supplies, or the national treasury.

Mr. President, H.R. 6782 is now in the lap of the House. It is not likely that the package we have sent will be welcome. Possibly it could be stripped back to the basic Talmadge proposal and signed by the President, but this will take time. In the meanwhile, farmers must make planting decisions, uncertain whether or when help will come. The Senate has played a game at their expense by voting for everything and hence for nothing.

In offering additional rewards to the farmer for not producing, we are neglecting a major key to solving his problem—the role of agricultural exports. About 100 million acres, almost one in three of our harvested cropland, are devoted to production for export. In dollar value farm exports amount to between $20 and $25 billion. In a good export year like 1974 each dollar of agricultural exports stimulated an additional 96 cents of output in the national economy. But export growth has been sluggish since 1974, and American farmers have encountered growing competition.

Mr. President, it would be foolish and shortsighted to rely only on drought and crop failure in other parts of the world to create prosperous export markets for American farmers. With some help from their Government in promoting export sales and removing artificial barriers, they can lead in developing new markets.

I had hoped to offer an amendment to provide such practical help, but the unanimous consent agreement barring nongermane amendments during consideration of the Talmadge bill made it impossible to do so. The distinguished chairman of the Agriculture Committee (Mr. TALMADGE) has assured me, however, that the committee will soon consider my proposals. Briefly, Mr. President, I believe we must remove the 3-year credit limitation in the statute under which the Commodity Credit Corporation's export sales program operates, and, instead, offer intermediate terms up to 10 years, similar to the terms offered by several competing countries. We should end the 50-percent cargo preference requirement for commercial shipments financed under the export credit sales program, and we should eliminate barriers that make nonmarket economy countries ineligible to participate in CCC credit programs.

The Subcommittee on International Finance, which I chair, has been holding hearings on U.S. export policy. We have heard testimony on the importance of agricultural exports, and at my request the Department of Agriculture has prepared a report entitled, "Competitiveness of U.S. Exports and Means to Close the Trade Gap." I look forward to working with the Agriculture Committee and the Department in developing serious legislative proposals to promote agricultural exports and insure a fair return to the American farmer.●

INFLATION AND TAXES

● Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, the burden of taxation grows ever more heavy upon the average American. Each year, with inexorable force, inflation drives the wages of our people into higher tax brackets, automatically increasing tax revenues and reducing the amounts available for spending. In a sense, Americans are held hostage to the willingness of Congress to enact tax relief legislation—for as Congress fails to act over the long term—tax levels are rising to impossible levels through inflation.

A general attitude seems to have developed in Congress, that those in the middle and upper income brackets have escaped their fair share of taxation through the use of loopholes and complicated tax shelters. As a result, changes in tax policy have tended to increase the burden upon middle and upper income earners.

Mr. President, this is a trend that has continued too long. It is high time for Congress to recognize that the American who traditionally pays for government is overtaxed. Changes in tax policy must be made that will result in a reduction in the tax burden of all people. It is high time for us to restore some fairness to the Nation's system of taxation and with that fairness greatly increased economic vitality.

A recent article in the Washington Post offers a valuable insight into the lack of balance and proportion in the distribution of taxes. The article reports on Treasury Department statistics, which show that those in the upper half of the Nation's income brackets are paying 94 percent of the personal income taxes.

Clearly, Mr. President, if Congress is to extend tax relief so desired by the American people, it should be directed to those who bear the great burden of taxation—the middle American—and it should be permanent relief.

Mr. President, I submit for the RECORD the Washington Post article.

The article follows:

RICHER HALF OF U.S. PAYS 94 PERCENT OF INCOME TAXES

(By Art Pine)

The richest one-fourth of American households—those with incomes of $17,000 a year or higher—took home half the income in this country in 1976 and paid more than 70 percent of all personal income taxes.

By contrast, those in the poorest one-fourth—wage earners making less than $5,000 a year—received less than 5 percent of the nation's income that year and paid a minuscule 0.1 percent or less of the income tax tab.

Those in the richest 5 percent of the country—taxpayers with incomes of $30,000 or more—earned 22 percent of the income in 1976 and paid 39.2 percent of all income taxes.

By contrast, the poorer half of all persons filing tax returns earned 19 percent of all income and paid 6 per cent of the personal income taxes in 1976, while the richer half paid 94 percent.

Those figures, compiled by the Treasury Department from estimates based on 1976 income levels, show a stark fact about the way the tax burden is distributed in this country:

While it's true, as some studies show, that wealthier persons enjoy the biggest tax breaks and deductions, they also shoulder a disproportionate share of the tax burden—far beyond what is perceived generally.

Moreover, the distortion has been heightened by the tendency of Congress in recent years to skew most of the tax breaks it has enacted to those at the lower end of the income scale.

To make up for inflation and higher Social Security payroll taxes, the lawmakers have cut income taxes. But most of the cuts have benefited lower- and lower-middle-income taxpayers—not the middle or the top.

The result of all this has been a significant tax squeeze on the so-called "middle" and "upper-middle" income brackets—the 10.7 million taxpayers whose income fall between $20,000 and $35,000 a year.

While the proportion of Americans' personal income eaten up by the income tax has remained relatively constant over the past few years, at about 13 percent, the burden of that tax load has shifted to higher-income brackets.

For example, figures compiled by the Tax Foundation show that the richest 25 percent of the nation's taxpayers paid 68.3 percent of all taxes in 1970. By 1975, that figure had risen to 72 percent.

Those in the richer 50 percent paid 89.7 percent of the total tax in 1970. By 1975, that had increased to 92.9 percent. All taxpayers in the richer 50 percent bracket saw their share of the total tax tab rise.

At the same time, those in the poorer half enjoyed a shrinking tax burden during the period. The taxes paid by the lower half fell from 10.3 percent in 1970 to 7.1 percent in 1975.

For the poorest 25 percent of all taxpayers, the proportion of the total tax bill fell to 0.4 percent in 1975, from 0.9 percent in 1970. In any case, the trend is clear.

President Carter's new tax-cut package would only heighten the disparity. Carter has proposed replacing the present $750-a-dependent personal exemption with a new $240 credit that would shift the burden further toward the middle- and upper-middle-income brackets.

The battle in Congress now is precisely over how far that shift should be allowed to go. Members of the House Ways and Means Committee have indicated that they are concerned about the tax burden borne by upper-income brackets and most likely will revamp the Carter proposals.

Moreover, the heavier tax burden continually is reaching downward to include people who used to be in lower-middle-income brackets. As inflation pushes incomes higher, taxpayers are thrust into higher brackets.

With the combination of inflation and higher tax rates in the upper brackets, the wealthiest of the nation's taxpayers pay disproportionately high shares of the total tax burden—even including their shelters and deductions.

For example, the richest 1.4 per cent of the nation's citizens—some 985,000 whose incomes total $50,000 or more a year—take home 10.7 percent of the income, but pay 23 percent of the taxes.

The wealthiest 0.3 percent—those in the $100,000-and-up category—receive 4.5 percent of the total income, but pay 10.5 percent of the tax burden. (The poorest 0.3 percent escape taxes altogether.)

The breakdown portrayed by these figures pertains only to personal income taxes. With Social Security payroll taxes included, the pattern is different but the point remains the same.

The figures used in the computations include income from capital gains—profits from the sale of stocks or other assets—only half of which are subject to tax. The totals for tax liability include writeoffs and deductions.

But the fact remains that, for all the complaining about wealthy taxpayers, those in the richer half of the nation's income brackets are paying 94 percent of the personal income taxes. The other half is paying the rest.●

PROJECT "FOLLOWTHROUGH" SUCCESS IN MINNESOTA

● Mrs. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, fortunately for our society, we have awakened in our thinking about education to the fact that even very young children have a great capacity to learn about the world around them.

The Head Start program has provided for many children the beginnings of an intellectual curiosity that otherwise may not have been. This special boost may be in jeopardy when these children enter into the regular elementary classroom experience. A continued enrichment program often may be the only means of preserving this "headstart."

At one of our schools in Minnesota, in the city of Montevideo, a wonderful program has demonstrated that with only a modest measure of special care the enrichment program provided by Head Start may be sustained. The program at Montevideo Elementary School is funded by the U.S. Office of Education as part of Project Followthrough. Children in the primary grades who have participated in Head Start or a similar program are given individualized instruction and other special attention. The results have been special achievement by these children in the important basic skills of reading and mathematics.

This program has been so successful that the Office of Education has described it as an exemplary education program worthy of being copied in other schools around the country.

I submit the March 1978 news release of "Education in Action" from the U.S. Office of Education to be printed in the RECORD.

The news release follows:

"The prettiest thing in school is our circle mobile," says Peter. And the other children agree. After all, they cut out the geometric designs and that makes it extra special for them.

"That's my red circle," says Jimmy. "And that's my blue half circle," says Tina, who is fascinated by pieces and how they fit together to make a whole. For her, fractions pose no problem.

These children participate in the Montevideo, Minnesota, Elementary School's program for individualized math and reading. This Follow Through program, funded by the U.S. Office of Education, focuses on children in grades K through 3 who have had Head Start or similar preschool experience. It gives them all sorts of extra educational, social and psychological, medical and dental services. The idea is to help these children in every way possible so they get a good start in school.

The program enables children to think as they learn basic skills. They become particularly adept at seeing and hearing and at exploring their environment. At home they often play games with their parents, naming all the round objects in a room. Sometimes they play the game at dinner when the table is set with round plates, cups, saucers, and glasses. Sometimes the food on the plate is round too—hamburgers, rolls, and slices of tomato, onion, and pickle.

In the primary reading program, most of the children learn oral reading skills through story books. Cassette lessons, tapebooks, and pencil-paper tasks assist the teacher in teaching the daily lessons which are developed for each child. And always the child is allowed to progress at his or her own rate.

A clock, a pair of scales, bingo cards, blocks, flash cards, and play money all have their places in the self-directed and independent learning of math. And with these—and other devices—the children learn to add, subtract, multiply, and divide. They also learn geometric applications, the systems of measurement, and the value of money.

"Math helps you have more fun," says Eric. "I can measure with a ruler and build things, and I can use a measuring cup and bake cookies." The Individually Prescribed Instruction Math curriculum is built on seven levels of increasing difficulty. Each do-it-yourself skills booklet is designed to teach one instructional objective. No student receives instruction for an objective which he has already mastered or for an objective for which he is not yet prepared.

The parents of nearly 80 percent of the children have visited a classroom, and 50 percent of the parents serve as classroom volunteers each year.

Involvement in the program has resulted in several parents completing their high school education and one resuming a college education program. A number of parents who completed the parent training program have become employed in the school system or elsewhere. Such involvement has resulted in better communications between the school and parents as well as between the school and community. Many outside community agencies have provided health services, and medical and dental clinics are contacted frequently by the school nurse.

The program has gained nationwide attention in recent months. A panel of education experts in HEW has cited it as one of some 200 exemplary education programs across the country which are worthy of adoption by other school districts.

Teachers and administrators from 22 school systems have visited the Montevideo program. The staff has conducted an Awareness Day Workshop attended by eight area schools. It has prepared brochures, presented its program before classes at two State universities, spoken before the local Kiwanis Club, and sponsored exhibits at five national education conferences.●

A PASSIVE SOLAR ENERGY SYSTEM

● Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, one exciting aspect of solar energy is its appeal to the do-it-yourself spirit so much a part of so many Americans. Take the example of Wade Green's passive solar system as he describes it in the New York Times of March 9. A passive solar system is generally one with no moving parts. Mr. Green's system has a few—the most important of which is Mr. Green himself.

Attached to the thick black concrete south wall of Mr. Green's house is a greenhouse. There are four vents between the greenhouse and the house on the top and bottom of the south wall. When the sun is shining, Mr. Green opens them. Cold air from the house flows into the greenhouse through the floor-level vents, and warm air from the greenhouse flows into the house through the ceiling-level ducts. Once constructed, the system costs nothing to operate. A squeaky vent hinge is about the worst thing that could ever go wrong with it. Mr. Green is an integral part of the system, but his tasks are neither difficult nor time consuming. And on sunny winter days no matter how cold, the greenhouse heats his entire house.

Passive solar systems are one of many ways to capture and use the Sun's energy. Like other solar technologies, most people are not aware of passive systems. Mr. Green reports that most visitors to his house were surprised to find no flat-plate collectors, mirrors, pipes, or tubes.

Sun Day, the day that will focus the Nation's attention on solar energy, should place terms like "passive solar systems" in the national vocabulary. Among other things, it should awaken many do-it-yourselfers to the ease, economics, and fun of solar energy. Sun Day is Wednesday, May 3.

The Congress has declared its support of Sun Day by overwhelmingly passing a resolution officially proclaiming the day. The Sun Day resolution now awaits the President's signature.

Mr. President, I ask that Wade Green's article, "Solar Heating the Passive Way," be printed in the RECORD.

SOLAR HEATING THE PASSIVE WAY

(By Wade Green)

Word got around, largely through an article in the Nantucket Inquirer and Mirror, that we were building a solar-heated house, the first on the island as far as anybody knew. For weeks thereafter, my wife and I repeatedly put down levels, hammers, crowbars and try squares to guide an intermittent parade of curious visitors. After the first handful, however, I sensed unfulfillment, as though something valuable had been lost, but the visitor wasn't quite sure what or even if he were searching for it in the right county. "Where are the collector plates?" an M.I.T. graduate student asked at one point, and it finally dawned on us that our inspectors, and perhaps most other people as well, harbored Sunday-supplemented expectations that solar heating required a wondrous, Rube Goldberg array of shiny surfaces, pipes, motors and God knows what else to extract heat out of the mere stuff that suntans come from.

We apologized. We had none of the above—no motors, no flat-plate collectors, no heat-transfer devices, or photo-voltaic cells or parabolic mirrors. Yet soon after we finished building the house, in the midst of last year's bitter cold winter, when the Coast Guard icebreakers were bulling open the island's solidified harbor and a friend had to pay the Nantucket Electric Company $200 a month to keep her modest house heated, our solar-heating system, on sunny days, kept us in the mid-60's. It comforted us as well with the profound warmth of accomplished parsimony.

Our system, which like most solar do-it-yourselves we improvised from a smattering of vague book and magazine guidances, not only works well, but its approach appears today to be the hottest thing among solar-heating enthusiasts. It's what's known as a "passive" system, as opposed to an "active" system. Instead of using a lot of equipment to collect, store and circulate the sun's heat, it does the job just by sitting there. And what it may be lacking by some of the criteria of advanced solar-heating effectiveness—maximum B.T.U.'s absorbed per collector square-footage, that sort of thing—it makes up for in simplicity, carefree functioning and low cost.

The price tag on active solar space-heating systems can easily run into five figures, and years of use have to be assumed to rank them competitively with conventional heating systems. But our system cost us $1,000. We can recover that much in savings on heating bills over three or four winters.

Our system's main ingredients are a lean-to greenhouse and two-thirds of the south wall of our house, against which the greenhouse leans. The greenhouse is a double-walled acrylic Vegetable Factory model, 20 feet long, 5 feet deep and 8 feet high. Its cost was the basic expense in our system. The south wall section it sits against is made of ordinary cement blocks with their faces painted black; it's "free" as a solar-energy element, because it's a structural wall of the house. We needed it, or something like it.

At the top of the wall, where the greenhouse roof connects to the house, we left out four blocks at evenly spaced intervals and replaced them with small hinged doors so that these gaps can be opened or closed at will. We also left four gaps, without doors, at the base of the wall. That's basically it, and this is how it works.

(Wade Green is an Alicia Patterson fellow this year, doing research on the alternative energy movement.)

As any greenhouse gardener would expect, a considerable amount of heat builds up in a greenhouse when the sun is shining, even dimly. Usually, greenhouse heat is simply vented to the outdoors. Instead, it flows into the house through the gaps at the top of the cement wall. The warm air moves into the house naturally by what are called convection currents and is replaced in the greenhouse by cooler air pulled from the house through the gaps at the wall's base. When the sun is out, the flow amply heats the whole house. In fact, we sometimes have to close the wood doors to keep the house from getting too hot.

But what, everybody asks, about nighttime and cloudy days? Here the cement-block wall gets further into the act. In addition to functioning as an adjustable barrier to the flow of the sun's heat, it can store this heat for many hours. At the end of a sunny day, the wall is nearly as hot as a steam radiator, and, like a sauna's rocks, it will slowly give off its warmth throughout the night.

Eventually, we plan to be able to store more solar heat by pulling hot greenhouse air down into a rock-filled insulated chamber in the basement; this should keep us warm for two or three days without sun. For longer periods, ours, like all solar systems, requires a backup nonsolar heat source. We use a wood-burning parlor stove.

Experts estimate, and our experience attests to their reckonings, that even without extra heat-storage capacity, a passive system can reduce heating-fuel or electricity needs by 40 to 50 percent, even in climates considerably colder than Nantucket's (which is generally quite moderate because of nature's own solar-heat storage in the water that surrounds the island). A larger, more refined passive system designed as an integral part of his new house in Princeton, N.J., saved Douglas Kelbaugh, an architect, no less than 85 percent of his fuel bills last winter.

Few passive systems are 100 percent passive, and neither is ours. In addition to the wooden vent traps, which we open and close by hand, we have one other moving, active part. It's an aluminized mylar curtain that can be drawn across the face of the black cement-block wall. It's designed to deal with what is perhaps the major experimental frontier in passive solar technology—revolving around the fact that transparent or translucent surfaces of glass or plastic, needed to let the sun's rays in, are also notoriously poor insulators: They can let a lot of heat escape when the sun isn't shining and the outside is colder than the inside. In order to cut down on this heat loss—one gets exquisitely stingy about heat when the heavens are controlling the main supply of it—we draw the curtain at night and try to remember to do so during other sunless hours.

The curtain serves an opposite function, too, in warm weather; when pulled, it keeps the sun from hitting the wall and adding unwanted heat to the house. To help keep the sun from getting into the greenhouse in summer, we've planted deciduous silverlace vines along its outside base. In summer, the vines should shade out much of the sun; when they've lost their leaves, they let the sunshine in. Getting double duty out of several ingredients in our system is, not incidentally, basic to the philosophy of passive solar heating, one of whose enticements is, after all, getting something for nothing.●

S. 2600—REHABILITATION AMENDMENTS OF 1978

● Mr. HATHAWAY. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my colleagues in sponsoring S. 2600, the Rehabilitation Amendments of 1978, to express my support for continued Federal attention to the needs of handicapped and disabled individuals.

Title I of this bill extends the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 for 5 years and increases appropriations for vocational rehabilitation services, research, and training.

Title II, called the Severely Handicapped Comprehensive Services Act of 1978, authorizes a wide range of programs and services for severely handicapped individuals. While revising and replacing the Developmental Disabilities Services and Facilities Construction Act, it retains some of the more significant sections of that law. These include provisions establishing a bill of rights, and requiring individualized plans for each person served, protection and advocacy programs, and affirmative action to employ and advance qualified handicapped individuals. It provides for special financial and technical assistance for rural and urban poverty areas and mandates State programs to eliminate inappropriate institutionalization and improve the quality of care and environment in institutions.

The Severely Handicapped Comprehensive Services Act also establishes some new services and innovative programs worthy of mention. For example, the bill authorizes model projects for independent living. This demonstration will explore the alternative living arrangements possible for severely handicapped individuals.

This legislation also provides assistance for the creation and operation of area centers for the employment of severely handicapped. While some handicapped persons have little employment potential, many have the ability to contribute much if given the necessary support and training. This bill extends the Rehabilitation Act to include training not only in sheltered workshops, but also for competitive employment.

In addition, a demonstration program of models for services for preschool severely handicapped children is authorized. This program will develop and provide examples of services such as early intervention, parent counseling, infant stimulation, and early identification, diagnosis, and evaluation.

Finally, the legislation establishes a Federal Council on Handicapped Individuals. This Council will provide advice and assistance to the President concerning the problems and needs of handicapped and severely disabled individuals. The Council will be responsible for reviewing Federal policy; function as ombudsman; educate the public; and will provide a public forum for discussing and publicizing the problems and needs of the handicapped.

The Severely Handicapped Comprehensive Services Act has many excellent provisions and reflects a firm congressional commitment to addressing the needs of handicapped persons. At the same time, however, there are several provisions of great concern to me. Particularly troublesome is the omission of the requirement that States establish State planning councils as required in the Developmental Disabilities Act. These councils have played a valuable role in the State planning process and have served as advocates for developmentally disabled persons. I seriously question the deletion of the planning council requirement in the new legislation. We must also review carefully the decision to replace the concept of "developmentally disabled" with "severely handicapped." Further, we must consider whether the definition of "severely handicapped" is appropriate and desirable. We must insure that attention to the problems and needs of developmentally disabled persons are not diluted as a result of this revision.

While there are other provisions in this legislation which I feel require careful scrutiny, I support its intent to extend services and expand our effort to serve handicapped individuals, create prevention programs, and provide for research and education activities. I look forward to developing further and revising as necessary this important legislation when it comes before the Committee on Human Resources, on which I serve.●

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 118—EMERGENCY MEDICAL SERVICES WEEK

● Mr. HATHAWAY. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues in sponsoring the resolution to proclaim the week of November 6–12, 1978 as "Emergency Medical Services Week."

The resolution recognizes the accomplishments and contributions of the emergency medical service personnel. Since the enactment of the EMS program in 1973, these dedicated individuals have meant the difference between life and death for people all over America. As an original cosponsor of the legislation authorizing the EMS program, I am gratified to know that the service has greatly improved immediate access to health care to those traumatically injured in accidents, suddenly taken ill, or living in rural areas some distance from medical facilities.

The emergency medical service trained personnel perform their life saving tasks at the time and place of need. Frequently, it is this quick response to a call for help which saves the victim's life or prevents permanent injury. For some rural residents, these services have represented the first reasonable access to health care. The emergency medical service not only provides immediate response, but also expands the availability of medical care outside the hospital, clinic, and doctor's office into the community and the home when and where it is needed. Furthermore, EMS paraprofessionals perform the important function of insuring linkages among different parts of the health care system, from initial contact through followup care. They also perform the vital task of educating the public in first aid and health care, a function I hope to see expand in scope and content.

The life sustaining contributions of the EMS personnel are a vital and necessary part of our health care system. I am pleased and honored to cosponsor this resolution in recognition of these health care providers and their important place in our health care system.●

REMARKS BY SENATOR HEINZ ON GOVERNMENT SPENDING

● Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, last Friday, my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania, JOHN HEINZ, undertook the first of several hearings to examine an area of wasteful and illogical Government spending. The hearings are designed to ask why the U.S. Government spends vast sums abroad, not in aid to underdeveloped countries, but for purchases and contracts for materials to be used in the United States, while at the same time, American industry continues to suffer serious economic problems arising in large part from foreign competition. The message is clear: Buy American. Last November, I cosponsored the Buy American Act Amendments of 1977 along with Senator HEINZ, and I heartily endorse the effort he is now undertaking in these hearings under the Governmental Affairs Subcommittee on Federal Spending Practices. I commend to my colleagues his opening statement at the first of these hearings on March 17 in Pittsburgh and ask that its text be printed in the RECORD.

The text follows:

ADDRESS BY SENATOR HEINZ

In 1933, the Congress passed and President Hoover signed the Buy American Act. This law was an attempt to alleviate the tremendous economic dislocations of the Great Depression by ensuring that federal expenditures would be used to provide badly needed jobs to American workers.

In passing the law, Congress recognized that the purchase of government expenditures is more than to purchase goods and services which the government needs. The Congress recognized that federal expenditures are a means to another end. In conducting fiscal policy, the federal government has the power to affect the whole of economic life. Federal expenditures properly made can mean the difference between a depression and economic prosperity.

The Buy American Act that Congress passed in 1933 is a very broad mandate which directs the executive branch to buy from American sources those goods it purchases, consistent with the public interest. The words that Congress chose to use are also broad. They are not restrictive. They leave considerable room for broad interpretation by the executive branch.

But their intent is clear: Buy American.

Since 1933, times have changed. Our economy is no longer mired in a deep depression. Economists have called into question the real effects of fiscal policy. The federal government purchases the things it needs differently. Executive interpretations of the law has changed.

But we still have a buy American Act. That mandate still exists. We still have recessions. We still have economic dislocations in certain industries. We still use fiscal policies to affect economic life.

Today we begin three days of hearings on a bill to amend the Buy American Act. Last November, when I co-sponsored the Buy American Act Amendments of 1977, I was concerned that the Executive Branch was ignoring this law. I was concerned because I found that:

Steel—In the past few months, four federally-funded bridges around the country were built with Japanese steel. American jobs lost: 3,800+.

Rail transit cars—French and Canadian firms now control 67 percent of the American market. The Atlanta mass transit system recently spent $56 million (80 percent federal funds) to buy French rail transit cars rather than cars made by General Electric or Boeing-Vertol in Delware County. Other Pennsylvania rail transit car manufacturers are Budd in Philadelphia and Pullman in Butler.

Turbine generators—A $5.5 million dollar contract for hydro-turbine generators for the Grand Coulee Dam went to a Japanese firm instead of the Pennsylvania based Westinghouse Corporation.

These are only a few examples of federal dollars being used to purchase foreign made goods.

What I hope to find out today and on the two more days of hearings in Washington is:

How extensive are these foreign purchases with federal funds?

What effect these purchases have on unemployment?

What effect these purchases have on the economy?

Why are these purchases made from foreign sources?

How does the Carter Administration interpret the Buy American Act?

How can we amend the Buy American Act to ensure that the principles embodied in that law will be best carried out?

That last question is crucial. That is the reason for the amendments and for these hearings. The law is broad and it has been broadly interpreted. But federal funds are still going to foreign suppliers. Jobs are still being lost because of these purchases. Why?●

RHODESIA—A COMPARISON OF THE INTERNAL SETTLEMENT AND THE ANGLO-AMERICAN PROPOSAL

● Mrs. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the recent internal agreement between three African leaders and Ian Smith on the future of Rhodesia has generated considerable interest in the U.S. Senate.

In light of this interest, I believe it would be prudent for us to examine the differences between the Anglo-American proposals for a Rhodesian settlement, published last September, and the recently negotiated internal settlement.

The United States is naturally concerned over the possibility of large-scale Soviet and Cuban intervention in the Rhodesian conflict. However, to view the Patriotic Front and its leaders, Mr. Joshua Nkomo and Mr. Robert Mugabe, as the instrument of Communist penetration is to misread the last two decades of Zimbabwe nationalism.

As is the case with many liberation movements in Africa, the Patriotic Front has had little choice but to turn to the Communist countries for support, especially during those years when the United States was propping up the Rhodesian Government of Ian Smith by importing chrome and other strategic materials in violation of United Nations sanctions. It is not, however, the Patriotic Front which has rejected the Anglo-American settlement proposals—it is the parties to the internal agreement who have done so. Mr. Colin Legum, a British correspondent with long African experience, argues convincingly in an article in the London Observer that Western recognition of the internal settlement could become a self-fulfilling prophesy by opening the door for Soviet and Cuban intervention.

Mr. President, a number of articles have been written on the Rhodesian proposals, including a comparison of the Anglo-American proposals and the internal settlement. First, I would like to point out some of the most significant differences between the two initiatives.

First. Power during the transition period—until December 31, 1978—will be exercised jointly by Smith and three African leaders under the internal settlement. With decisions taken by consensus, Smith will retain the power over anything with which he may disagree. The present white Parliament will remain in power, and retain such prerogatives as acting on legislation for the registration of voters.

Under the Anglo-American proposals, Smith would have stepped down, and the British would have resumed their legal role through a British Resident Commissioner.

Second. The internal settlement provides 72 seats for Africans in the new Parliament, 28 seats for the whites—who represent 4 percent of the population. It will require 78 votes to change entrenched provisions relating to the judiciary, police, civil service, defense, prisons, and private property. This blocking percentage does not give a new government much room to alter the structure of a society permeated by racism. For example, schools, hospitals, and housing are segregated, and the white population owns 50 percent of the land.

Third. The Rhodesian Armed Forces, as presently constituted, are to be preserved. The Anglo-American proposals called for a restructuring of the Rhodesian Army comprised of the liberation forces and acceptable elements of the present armed forces. A U.N. force would monitor police activities during the transition.

Fourth. There is no international presence during transition under the internal settlement. However, the existing state of emergency will apparently remain in force.

Fifth. Minority economic rights are to be preserved through the guarantee against expropriation without prompt compensation under the internal settlement. Majority rights, severely circumscribed in the past, are touched on in passing as "the further removal of discrimination." The Anglo-American proposals spelled out a specific bill of rights applicable to all citizens, black and white.

Sixth. Constitutional proposals were carefully elaborated under the Anglo-American plan. The internal settlement assigns the drafting of the constitution to the transitional government with no opportunity for ratification by the black majority.

It is not surprising that the New York Times characterized the internal settlement as "little more than a device for keeping real power in the hands of Rhodesia's small white minority and is rightly suspect in black African eyes." The editorial stated that—

"Majority rule" so hobbled by minority rights means no real transfer of power, no matter how many blacks acquire ministerial trappings.

I am as devoted to the cause of peace in Rhodesia as any of my colleagues. However, a lasting solution in Rhodesia must be based upon a meaningful transfer of power to African hands.

Mr. President. I submit the text of the internal settlement and an article appearing in the New York Times; a comparison of the Anglo-American proposals and the internal settlement; an analysis of the two proposals prepared by the Washington Office on Africa; an article from the London Observer; and an editorial from the New York Times on Rhodesia be printed in the RECORD:

TEXT OF RHODESIAN AGREEMENT PREPARING THE WAY FOR MAJORITY RULE

SALISBURY, RHODESIA, March 3.—Following is the text of an agreement signed today by Prime Minister Ian D. Smith of Rhodesia, the Rev. Ndabaningi Sithole, Bishop Abel Muzorewa and Senator Jerimiah Chirau.)

Whereas the present constitutional situation in Rhodesia has led to the imposition of economic and other sanctions by the international community against Rhodesia and to armed conflict within Rhodesia and from neighboring territories;

And Whereas it is necessary in the interests of our country that an agreement should be reached that would lead to the termination of such sanctions and the cessation of the armed conflict;

And Whereas, in an endeavor to reach such an agreement, delegates from the Rhodesian Government, African National Council (Sithole), United African National Council and Zimbabwe United People's Organization have met during the last two months in Salisbury and, having discussed fully the proposals put forward by the various delegations have reached agreement on certain fundamental principles to be embodied in a new constitution that will lead to the termination of the aforementioned sanctions and the cessation of the armed conflict.

A

It is hereby agreed that a constitution will be drafted and enacted which will provide for majority rule on the basis of universal adult suffrage on the following terms:

[1]

There will be a legislative assembly consisting of 100 members and the following provisions will apply thereto:

(a) There will be a common voters' roll, with all citizens of 18 years and over being eligible for registration as voters, subject to certain recognized disqualifications.

(b) 72 of the seats in the legislative assembly will be reserved for blacks who will be elected by voters who are enrolled on the common roll.

(c) 28 of the seats in the legislative assembly will be reserved for whites (i.e., Europeans as defined in the 1969 Constitution) who will be elected as follows:

(i.) 20 will be elected on a preferential voting system by white voters who are enrolled on the common roll.

(ii.) Eight will be elected by voters who are enrolled on the common roll from 16 candidates who will be nominated, in the case of the first parliament, by an electoral college composed of the white members of the present House of Assembly and, in the case of any subsequent parliament, by an electoral college composed of the 28 whites who are members of the parliament dissolved immediately prior to the general election.

(d) The, reserved seats referred to in (c) above shall be retained for a period of at least 10 years or of two parliaments, whichever is the longer, and shall be reviewed at the expiration of that period, at which time a commission shall be appointed, the chairman of which shall be a judge of the High Court, to undertake this review. If that commission recommends that the arrangements regarding the said reserved seats should be changed:

(i.) An amendment to the constitution to effect such change may be made by a bill which receives the affirmative votes of not less than 51 members.

(ii.) The said bill shall also provide that the 72 seats referred to in (b) above shall not be reserved for blacks.

(e) The members filling the seats referred to in (c) above will be prohibited from forming a coalition with any single minority party for the purpose of forming a government.

There will be a just declaration of rights which will protect the rights and freedoms of individuals and, inter alia, will provide for protection from deprivation of property unless adequate compensation is paid prompty, and for protection of pension rights of persons who are members of pension funds.

[3]

The independence and qualifications of the judiciary will be entrenched and judges will have security of tenure.

[4]

There will be an independent public services board, the members of which will have security of tenure. The board will be responsible for appointments to, promotions in and discharges from the public service.

[5]

The public service, police force, defense forces and prison service will be maintained in a high state of efficiency and free from political interference.

[6]

Pensions which are payable from the consolidated revenue fund will be guaranteed and charged on the consolidated revenue fund and will be remittable outside the country.

[7]

Citizens who at present are entitled to dual citizenship will not be deprived of their present entitlement.

[8]

The above-mentioned provisions will be set out or provided for in the constitution and will be regarded as specially entrenched provisions which may only be amended by a bill which receives the affirmative votes of not less than 78 members.

B

It is hereby also agreed that, following the agreement set out above, the next step will be the setting up of a transitional government. The prime function of the transitional government will be:

(a) To bring about a ceasefire, and

(b) To deal with related matters such as:

(i) The composition of the future military forces, including those members of the nationalist forces who wish to take up a military career, and the rehabilitation of others;

(ii) The rehabilitation of those affected by the war.

C

It is also hereby agreed that it will be the duty of the transitional government to determine and deal with the following matters:

(a) The release of detainees;

(b) The review of sentences for offenses of a political character;

(c) The further removal of discrimination;

(d) The creation of a climate conductive to the holding of free and democratic elections;

(e) The drafting of the new constitution in terms of this agreement;

(f) Procedures for registration of voters with a view to the holding of a general election at the earliest possible date.

D

It is also hereby agreed that the transitional government will comprise an executive council and a ministerial council, and the following provisions will apply thereto:

[1]

Executive council

(a) Composition:

The executive council will be composed of the prime minister and three black ministers, being the heads of those delegations engaged in the negotiations. The members will take turns in presiding as chairman of the executive council in such sequence and for such period as that council may determine. Decision of the executive council will be by consensus.

(b) Functions:

(i) The executive council will be responsible for insuring that the functions given to and the duties imposed on the transitional government by the constitutional agreement are dealt with as expeditiously as possible. It will take policy decisions in connection with the preparation and drafting of the new constitution and the other matters set out in sections B and C of this agreement and with any other matters which may arise.

(ii) The executive council may refer the matters set out in sections B and C of this agreement, or any other matter, to the ministerial council for examination and recommendation.

(iii) The executive council will review decisions or recommendations of the ministerial council and may confirm such decisions or recommendations or refer them back to the ministerial council for further consideration.

Ministerial Council

(a) Composition:

The ministerial council will be composed of equal numbers of black and white ministers. The black ministers will be nominated in equal proportions by the heads of those delegations engaged in the negotiations. The white ministers will be nominated by the prime minister. The chairmanship of the ministerial council will alternate between black and white ministers. The prime minister will nominate which white minister shall take the chair, and the heads of those delegations engaged in the negotiations will nominate which of the black ministers shall take the chair in the sequence and for the period determined by the ministerial council.

(b) Functions:

(i.) The ministerial council will operate on the cabinet system. For each portfolio, or group of portfolios, there will be a black and a white minister who will share responsibility.

(ii.) The ministerial council will be responsible for initiating legislation and for supervising the preparation of such legislation as may be directed by the executive council.

(iii.) The ministerial council will make recommendations to the executive council on all matters referred to it by the executive council and on any other matter it thinks fit.

(iv.) Decisions of the ministerial council will be by majority vote and subject to review by the executive council.

[3]

Parliament

(a) Parliament will continue to function during the life of the transitional government and will meet for the following purposes as and when the executive council considers it should be summoned:

(i.) To pass a constitution amendment act enabling ministers who have not been elected to parliament to serve for periods in excess of four months;

(ii.) To pass legislation for the registration of voters;

(iii.) To pass the 1978–79 budget;

(iv.) To enact any legislation or deal with any other matter brought forward by the transitional government (e.g. for the further removal of discrimination);

(v.) To enact the new constitution;

(vi.) To nominate 16 whites for election by voters on the common roll to eight of the seats reserved for whites.

(b) The work of the various select committees and of the Senate Legal Committee will proceed as normal.

E

It is also hereby agreed that independence day shall be Dec. 31, 1978.

Signed at Salisbury, this third day of March 1978.

RHODESIAN PACK: HOW EFFECTIVE?

(By John F. Burns)

SALISBURY, RHODESIA, March 22.—The Rhodesia Herald, normally a cautious newspaper, proclaimed in a banner headline today, "End to white rule." But on the day after three black leaders joined Prime Minister Ian D. Smith in a transitional government, it was being asked here whether the nationalists would have real authority or have been coopted into an administration that will perpetuate the preferment of white interests to black.

The early portents were mixed. Mr. Smith, sounding at times satisfied and at times reigned, told reporters after the swearing-in ceremony that he alone could not answer their questions on such crucial issues as the conduct of the war and the transition to majority rule. "Those are questions for the Executive Council," he said, referring to the new body composed of himself and the black leaders that has taken nominal control of the government.

After meeting for its first session, however, the Executive Council adjourned for eight days. Since Mr. Smith will retain the post of Prime Minister and its statutory powers throughout the transitional period, the implication was that, at the outset at least, no real power has been transferred. Only later will it become apparent whether the 58-year-old white leader, who spent a decade devising stratagems against black rule, will honor his pledge to treat his new partners as equals.

CABINET APPOINTMENTS AWAITED

Next week, the Executive Council will appoint the second tier of the transitional administration, an 18-member ministerial council, or cabinet, in which white and blacks will be equally represented, with each of the nine posts being held jointly by a black and white minister.

This will require the appointment of blacks to such key agencies as the Ministry of Combined Operations, which supervises the war against black guerrillas, and to the Ministry of Law and Order, which oversees a judicial system that has been one of a bulwark of white domination.

Under the agreement signed by Mr. Smith and the black leaders three weeks ago, overall authority in the provisional government will rest with the Executive Council. But the agreement also provided that the ruling body will operate by consensus, meaning that each of the four leaders retain a veto. On some issues, such as desegragation in education, in health care and in housing, there will be powerful pressure on Mr. Smith to block moves toward black emanciaption.

Another divisive issue could be the war. Black suspicions have been aroused by the disclosure that Mr. Smith recently scrapped the 11-member war council that has been setting policy and approving major operations passing day-to-day control of the military and the police to a smaller body composed of the commanding officers and senior civil servants. Since Mr. Smith and other white ministers sat on the war council, the decision appeared to remove politicians from immediate involvement in military matters.

CRUCIAL ISSUE FOR BLACKS

The concern among blacks was that the change could block them from effective influence on military policy, a crucial matter for them since they hope to persuade the 5,000 guerrillas now ranging the country to lay down their arms. To make the appeal credible, the government forces almost certainly will have to abandon some of their harsher tactics. Such as the rough treatment of guerrillas who have surrendered or been captured and raids that have killed thousands of guerrilla recruits at camps in Zambia and Mozambique.

Another problem facing the three blacks on the Executive Council, Bishop Abel Muzorewa, the Rev. Ndabaningi Sithole and Senator Jeremiah Chirau, is that the bureaucracy, military and civil, is entirely in white hands. The agreement makes no provision for blacks to be appointed to senior posts and effectively blocks any rapid advancement by requiring the maintenance of a white-controlled civil service board that will make all appointments, promotions and discharges. Until now, the bureaucracy has been a bastion of white conservation.

Blacks also are asking whether Mr. Smith gave his partners access to all pertinent government information. Already, officials have been pointing anxiously to the black leaders' habit of passing minutes of confidential negotiations with Mr. Smith to the press, implying that the practice will have to be kept in mind now that they are in positions of nominal authority. Without full briefings, the nationalists could find themselves like officers on the bridge of a storm-tossed ship who have no line to the engine room.

In addition, the black leaders are divided among themselves, each looking forward to the one-man, one-vote election provided for in the constitutional accord. No date for the vote has been set, but the government that emerges from it is due to take office on Dec. 31.

Against the pressures to stick together in face of the challenge by the Patriotic Front, the guerrilla alliance, there will be strong temptations for each of the black leaders to make political capital by taking an independent line on sensitive issues.

Finally, Mr. Smith has to present the accord for approval to the existing, white dominated electorate, a requirement that he may cite as a reason for not moving swiftly to dismantle racial discrimination and release black political prisoners, another matter entrusted to the Executive Council. already, a right-wing white faction, the Rhodesia Action Party, has begun campaigning against the agreement, calling it a capitulaton.

Among blacks in urban centers such as Salisbury, widespread approval of the accord has been balanced by anxieties over its shortcomings. Bishop Muzorewa, addressing the largest political gathering ever held in the country, acknowledged at the weekend that the agreement was "far from perfect."

How it is carried out in the transitional period—whether Mr. Smith exploits the loopholes or cooperates in a manner that satisfies black aspirations—may determine whether the months ahead come to be seen as a historical curiosity, like the Kerensky period in the Soviet Union, or as the period in which whites finally came to terms with the inevitability of black rule.

COMPARISON OF THE ANGLO-AMERICAN PROPOSALS AND THE INTERNAL SETTLEMENT (SALISBURY ARRANGEMENTS)

I. Transition

Organization of Transition

ANGLO-AMERICAN PLAN	SALISBURY ARRANGEMENTS
Transfer of power to British Resident Commissioner, assisted by a UN presence and advised by a governing council.	Transitional Government comprised of an Executive Council and a Ministerial Council. Executive Council composed of Smith, Muzorewa, Sithole and Chirau; rotating chairmanship. Ministerial Council composed of equal number of black and white ministers; white ministers nonminated by Smith, black nominated proportionally by nationalists. Chairmanship to alternate between black and white. Each ministerial post is to be shared responsibility of one black and one white. During transition, present Parliament will continue to funciton; can be called for purposes enumerated in agreement, including to enact legislation proposed by the transitional government and to enact the new constitution.

Ceasefire

A ceasefire, negotiated in advance by the parties, would go into effect at the outset of the transition period, and would be monitored by the Resident Commissioner supported by the UN peacekeeping force.	No definite plan of action indicated but first duty of transitional government is listed as "to bring about a ceasefire."

Elections

Electoral process to be free and impartial, administered by the Resident Commissioner, supported by the police and the UN presence.	Agreed that the transitional government will have the responsibility for "the creation of a climate conducive to the holding of free and democratic elections" and to develop procedures for registration of voters "with a view to the holding of a general election at the earliest possible date." December 31, 1978, agreed as "independence day."

Police and Armed Forces

At the beginning of transition, the Resident Commissioner will appoint a new police commissioner, and UN police observers will monitor police activities. The armed forces, under command of the Resident Commissioner and monitored by the UN force, will be restructured into the new Zimbabwe National Army, based on the liberation forces with acceptable elements of the current Rhodesian Defense Forces.	Agreed that the "public service, police force, defense forces, and prison service will be maintained in a high state of efficiency." A prime concern to the transitional government is to be the issue of the composition of "future military forces," to include the question of members of nationalist forces "who wish to take up a military career, and the rehabilitation of others." No further details provided.

International Presence

The Anglo-American plan calls for a Special Representative of the UN Secretary General, who would assist the Resident Commissioner, a UN peacekeeping force, UN civilian police observers, and additional UN presence to observe the election.	No mention of international presence during transition or regarding elections. Preamble expresses that among major purposes of reaching agreement is to bring about a termination of sanctions imposed by the international community.

II. Constitutional principles

Form of Government

Mixed Presidential-Parliamentary system. President is chief executive, elected by an absolute majority of the newly elected members of Parliament, who must have declared their Presidential preferences in advance.	Parliamentary system based on unicameral legislature.

Representation

100-person National Assembly to be chosen in 1-man, 1-vote elections; 20 specially elected members to represent interests of minorities. Specially elected seats can be eliminated after 8 years.	100-person National Assembly, divided between 72 seats chosen on common roll, 20 seats chosen by whites-only roll, 8 seats nominated by present white members of Parliament and subsequently by 28 white members of Assembly (this ensures all 28 seats will be controlled by present government.) Continuation of white seats to be reviewed after 10 years or two parliaments, whichever longer.

Constitutional Amendment

Some constitutional provisions (Bill of Rights, Specially Elected Members, Amendment of Constitution) are "entrenched" and cannot be amended for 4–8 years, and then only after general election, and must gain two-thirds vote in Parliament.	"Entrenched" provisions in constitution require 78 or more votes to amend.

Bill of Rights

Provides for right to life, liberty; protection from slavery and deprivation of property without compensation; privacy of home and property; fair trials; freedom of conscience and expression; private schools; freedom of association, freedom of movement, and freedom from discrimination.	Agreement has been reached that the constitution should have a Bill of Rights, but no details on what rights should be protected have emerged, other than protection from deprivation of property without compensation and pension rights.

Independent Judiciary

Judges to be appointed by President; subject to discipline of Judicial Review Commission.	Agreed that independent judiciary necessary; qualifications for service to be entrenched.

Public Service Commission

Appointed by President for fixed term, will have power to appoint persons to all civil service positions except for certain specified, politically sensitive posts to be filled by the President, or under purview of the courts or the Parliament (staff positions).	Independent, tenured Public Service Commission agreed. No details on membership.

Pensions

Pensions of officers compulsorily retired to facilitate reconstruction of civil service can be freely remitted abroad. Other pensions to be discussed. (Indirect facilitation of payment of pensions would be made through Zimbabwe Development Fund.)	Pensions guaranteed, and may be freely remitted abroad.

Dual Citizenship

Whether to allow dual citizenship subject for further discussion. If not allowed, five-year grace period for dual nationals to make decision of which to choose.	Dual citizenship guaranteed for those who presently have it.

THE RHODESIAN SETTLEMENT

INTRODUCTION

The Smith regime which seized power illegally in Rhodesia 13 years ago has apparently had a change of heart. On March 3rd the regime concluded an agreement with three African leaders which they claim paves the way for black majority rule. Hardly was the ink dry on the paper when the African signatories were off to Western capitals to try to win international recognition for the proposed constitutional settlement and to counter opposition from the Patriotic Front and the five frontline states which have denounced it as a sell-out.

Which claims are true? Does the agreement benefit the African majority or the white minority? Is it a formula for genuine majority rule and a transfer of power, or is it mere tokenism? Does it abolish the unjust colonial structures and institutions or preserve them? With these questions in mind, the following analysis examines the terms of the agreement to discover its merits and flaws and to understand why it is a subject of international debate.

ANALYSIS OF AGREEMENT

Conception of the Problem: The three introductory paragraphs of the Salisbury accord never refer to the root causes of the problems in Rhodesia nor to the aspirations of the African majority for self-determination. Instead the introduction talks vaguely of "the present constitutional situation" as if the central issue were a question of the constitutional legality rather than a need for genuine independence and vast structural changes. U.N. sanctions and the armed conflict are presented as the source of the problem and not a response to the injustices and inequality on which Rhodesian society is based. No mention is made of the rights of the African people nor of the changes needed to regain those rights. The agreement appears to assume that the introduction of a few constitutional reforms will satisfy everyone.

Political reform, though necessary, has never been the sole object of the liberation struggle. As the Patriotic Front pointed out in September, 1977 in response to the Anglo-American proposals: "The problem in Zimbabwe is not the election of a 'President' but: 1. The destruction of colonialism and its institutions; 2. The attainment of genuine independence; and 3. The democratisation not only of the vote but of all institutions and the way of life in Zimbabwe."

The churches too have continually pointed out that political rights must be accompanied by social and economic rights if justice is to prevail. Recently, for instance, Bishop Donal Lamont who was deported from Rhodesia last March stated, "The social and economic structures which the new government will inherit are founded on entrenched exploitation. Inequality permeates every aspect of Rhodesian society—inequality in land distribution, job differentials, housing policies, educational facilities, health and social services." The agreement fails to deal with these crucial issues and does not even acknowledge them as a problem.

Elections and a New Constitution: The granting of the vote to the African majority has been a major stumbling block in previous negotiations, and therefore the provision for elections based on universal adult suffrage has been hailed by some observers as a significant concession. However, though all adults of 18 years or older will be eligible to vote for 72 African seats in the new assembly, their candidates will be almost powerless to make any changes over areas protected by the entrenched provisions. Whites (including Asians and Coloureds) will control more than 25 percent of the seats though they are only 4 percent of the population. They will have a blocking vote over such critical areas as private property, defense forces, courts, prisons, public service, and police. Thus universal adult suffrage provides the appearance of majority rule but the power will be kept in the hands of the minority. In addition, the new constitution will not establish a non-racial society, but will enshrine race as the basis for the electoral process and for the guarantee of special privileges.

Specially Entrenched Provisions: The eight entrenched provisions, which can only be amended by 78 votes, guarantee that the present institutions of power remain intact—the military, legal and economic systems. They literally tie the hands of the new government in these matters, and ensure the continuation of key elements of the white minority structure. They also preserve those institutions that have performed the most objectionable roles in the regime's counter-insurgency operations against the liberation struggle.

Declaration of Rights: The declaration of rights amounts to a declaration of the preservation of white privilege. The document makes it appear that the whites are the victims requiring protection while the numerous rights denied the African people for decades are not even mentioned. The protection of white property rights in particular will make it extremely difficult for a new government to carry out a system of land reform, badly needed in a country where less than 4 percent of the people control 50 percent of the land.

Judiciary: According to the agreement, the entire judicial system will remain intact. The judges in Rhodesia, many of whom have been appointed since UDI was declared in 1965, have been complicit not only in sustaining the illegal regime but also in applying a legal system that is devoid of justice. They have sentenced numerous guerrillas to death by secret hanging and have carried out the repressive security legislation and emergency regulations including the Emergency Powers Act, the Law and Order (Maintenance) Act, and the Indemnity and Compensation Act.

Security system: Historically, the government of Rhodesia has relied on force and violence to maintain its oppressive rule, and the new government will have at its disposal this same machinery. The security apparatus which has played a dominant role in suppresing African opposition and resistance since UDI is not to be dismantled or reorganized but "maintained efficiently". It is well documented that units of the police and army committed atrocities against the civilian population and are regarded as the real terrorists. Yet these same tormentors and torturers are now to become the peoples' protectors.

Public service: The public service, which is predominantly white-run, has been responsible for implementing the country's discriminatory racist policies. It has also established and operated the government's unpopular program of protected villages. These same civil servants are practically guaranteed their jobs as well as their pensions. Payments are remittable abroad, which could create a significant strain on the balance of payments in a country with an annual pension bill of approximately $37 million. Dual citizenship could also affect the country's balance of payments if whites can transfer their money out of the country and leave Zimbabwe whenever they wish.

The Transition Period: The transitional arrangements will play a crucial role in determining the character of a future Zimbabwe. During the transition, elections are to take place, a new constitution drafted, and other crucial decisions taken such as the composition of the military forces. The Smith government will continue to play a dominant role at this time—a most striking departure from the Anglo-American proposals which called for the Smith regime to step down as a prerequisite to a return to legality and a transfer of power. Under the Salisbury accord, Smith himself will have a dual function as both Prime Minister under the existing constitution as well as member of the Executive Council in the transitional government. His Parliament will continue to function and will retain power to enact—or block—any new legislation and constitutional amendments required for the attainment of independence. Its continued role during the transition period legitimizes the white minority government and ironically makes its members the founding fathers of a new government whose formation they have previously opposed. It also means that the whites have a chance to express their views on the new arrangements through their Parliament, while the Africans are given no such forum to either accept or reject the settlement.

During this period as well, the free expression of opinion or political debate will be severely hampered by the fact that the existing police-state laws and State of Emergency will apparently remain in force. These laws will be interpreted and applied by the existing judges, and the existing police, armed forces and civil servants will be the effective power in the country.

The Smith regime will have a strong say in the interim Ministerial Council, half of whose members will be Smith appointees. The other half will be split three ways between the three African delegations, giving the Rhodesian Front a three-to-one advantages over any of the African parties. Since Council decisions will be made by majority vote, it also gives them the advantage of having to gain only one African vote to control any decision. The Ministerial Council will operate on the existing cabinet system which puts the African newcomers at a distinct disadvantage. African appointees will simply be added to the structure and will share portfolios with white politicians who will presumably have tenure and experience under the Front regime.

The document is very vague about "the rehabilitation of those affected by the war," particularly in contrast to the specific guarantees and entrenched clauses that it offers the white minority. It leaves unanswered whether thousands of people now living in the regime's protected villages will be resettled, whether any compensation will be paid those who have lost their homes, cattle and crops in the war; whether the regime's practice of torture, secret hangings and security legislation will be abolished. The fate of detainees and political prisoners is left to the discretion of the transitional government. Political prisoners are not to be pardoned but to have their sentences reviewed by the same courts and judges that originally imposed them.

There is a vague reference to "the further removal of discrimination" but nothing is spelled out to ascertain if the agreement refers merely to the practice of segregation or whether it intends to eradicate the economic discrimination on which white privilege has been built.

RHODESIA: BRITAIN'S BIGGEST DECISION SINCE THE WAR

There can be no possible grounds for rejecting an 'internal settlement' in Rhodesia simply because of objections to the Smith regime or to the African leaders involved in the negotiations.

What matters, after 12 years of worsening conflict, is that the fighting should end and that there should be a genuine basis for majority rule. The right way to approach the reported agreement reached in Salisbury is, therefore, to ask whether it can achieve these two objectives, or whether it might not, in fact, produce the exact opposite result—even worse fighting and greater foreign involvement.

The 'agreement' will not necessarily end the conflict. It could, indeed, mark the point from which, not just Rhodesia, but the whole of Southern Africa, is plunged into the kind of disaster that recently overtook Angola and is now occurring in the Horn of Africa.

The comparisons with Angola and the Horn are not fanciful, since all the elements that produced those disasters are also present in Rhodesia—an intra-black civil war with massive foreign intervention.

The Russians and Cubans show every sign of being poised to repeat the role in Rhodesia that they played in Angola and are currently playing in the Horn. If things go seriously wrong in Rhodesia, the South Africans, too, seem unlikely to remain south of their Limpopo border.

The risk of South African intervention, as in Angola, would increase if the talks on independence for Namibia (South West Africa), which ran into serious difficulties last week, were to fail—and if, as seems likely, the Vorster regime then emulated Smith by going for an 'internal settlement' in Namibia. This would almost certainly bring the Angolans, Russians and Cubans fully behind SWAPO's guerrillas.

Such a development would unleash two major conflicts simultaneously in Southern Africa—in Rhodesia and Namibia—with heavy Communist involvement in both, and with the Western nations largely paralysed because, as in the Horn, they would be reluctant to identify themselves fully with any particular side.

This is why any wrong step at this time—especially by Britain, which carriers international responsibility for Rhodesia—could push the whole of Southern Africa into violent chaos.

The pressures on Britain to support the tentative agreement reached in Salisbury are bound to increase in the coming weeks; they could even provide Mrs. Margaret Thatcher with a new election issue.

However, there is no doubt, as Dr. David Owen said last week, that the proposed settlement represents a significant move toward majority rule. This is one of the five principles established by Britain as a prerequisite for Rhodesia's independence.

But can the proposed settlement meet another crucial principle: that it should be acceptable to the majority of all Rhodesians? This can only be tested through a referendum or an election, either of which requires some degree of tranquility in the country. And that requires a cease-fire.

That is why the Anglo-American initiative has set such a high priority on achieving a cease-fire, which is what the negotiations with the Patriotic Front have been mainly about. Unless the guerrilla forces of Joshua Nkomo's ZAPU and Robert Mugabe's ZANU are willing to accept the terms for a cease-fire, the war will continue and no convincing test of Rhodesian opinion will be possible.

It has been clear all along that unless conditions could be created to involve the Patriotic Front in negotiations for a settlement, there could be no hope of getting a cease-fire. It is open to argument whether the Patriotic Front in fact enjoys majority black Rhodesian support, but it can hardly be argued that the joint electoral backing of Nkomo and Mugabe is so negligible that it can simply be ignored.

Besides, what matters most in the kind of violent situation now prevailing in Rhodesia is the number of guns held by the opposing forces. The Patriotic Front obviously commands more guns than the three black nationalist groups which have been negotiating with Mr. Smith and although their fighting capacity is not yet equal to that of the white Rhodesians, they have increasingly become a more serious challenge.

What will happen once an interim Rhodesian Government is established—one which, as is now proposed, will have three times more black than white Ministers?

The new regime would still be engaged in fighting the guerrillas, but with this important difference: it would no longer be fought between the Smith regime and black Rhodesians, but would rapidly assume the character of an open civil war among blacks—with one side backed by white Rhodesians.

Apart from its brutalities, such a civil war would inevitably introduce much greater international involvement. And this is the greatest immediate danger.

President Nyerere and the other Front Line African Presidents, who have given their full support to the Anglo-American initiative in Rhodesia, have lost no time in rejecting the internal settlement completely. They can therefore be counted upon to do everything they can to help the Patriotic Front defeat the new regime in Salisbury as rapidly as possible.

They are likely to encourage greater external military support for the Patriotic Front, both from African armies and through the Communist nations (China as well as the Russians and Cubans), who have already indicated their readiness to respond. This is what happened in Angola, and also in the Horn.

Consider, now, what would happen if Britain were to do what Mr. Reginald Maudling and other Conservative MPs urged the Government to do in Parliament last week—to accept the "internal settlement" and to legalise it through an Act of Parliament.

The Front-Line President, strongly backed by Nigeria as well as the other African States, would at once denounce Britain. This would open up a raw confrontation between this country and black Africa. Besides putting British national interests in jeopardy, it would create precisely the kind of opening in Southern Africa that the Russians are seeking. The whole political balance of power in Africa would be seriously, perhaps irretrievably, affected.

It is ironic that the Conservatives, who are rightly concerned about the spread of Soviet influence in Africa, should advocate a policy that would play straight into the Russians' hands.

There is yet another major problem: the American Administration is not about to recognise the agreement reached in Salisbury. If Britain were to think of doing so, it could start a serious quarrel over this vital issue with Washington and, probably, with other Western allies. The harm of such a quarrel would be incalculable; it would certainly please Moscow.

The real problem to which the British and the Americans should now be addressing themselves is how to build a bridge between the Salisbury negotiators and the Patriotic Front. This can only be done, if at all, by not making an irrevocable choice between the two sides; both must be kept in play. Skillful diplomacy will be required, but with all the skill in the world this exercise in bridgebuilding will also require the continued active co-operation of the Front-Line Presidents.

This is the clinching argument why Britain should do nothing to alienate the Patriotic Front and their African supporters. What is needed is precisely the opposite of the reckless course advocated by the Conservatives. If their advice were followed, it would bring Britain into open collision with black Africa and with Washington, and would produce almost certain disaster to Southern Africa.

That is why the policy decisions to be made in the next week or so will probably come to be counted among the most critical taken by Britain since World War Two.

THE RHODESIAN CONTRIVANCE

The American and British Governments have thus far refrained from endorsing the Rhodesian "internal settlement" between Prime Minister Ian Smith and three black leaders. They are right to withhold support, and they should not give way in this week's debate of the issue in the United Nations Security Council. The deal is little more than a device for keeping real power in the hands of Rhodesia's small white minority and is rightly suspect in black African eyes.

The agreement would let the white settler community block any measures that threaten its economic privileges for at least 10 years and probably longer. The 4 percent minority would retain effective control of the army and civil service. "Majority rule" so hobbled by minority rights means no real transfer of power, no matter how many blacks acquire ministerial trappings. That is why the settlement is anathema to Joshua Nkomo and Robert Mugable, the black nationalists who lead the guerrilla campaign which, along with sanctions, has forced Mr. Smith to go even so far.

Ian Smith has played his cards with consummate skill. By offering them a semblance of power, he has now made the three black leaders—bishop Muzorewa, Mr. Sithole and Senator Chirau—accomplices in a system to preserve his own control.

The agreement would not only fail to bring genuine majority rule to Zimbabwe (as Rhodesia is to be called next year), but also jeopardize the most important American interests in Africa. Those interests ride on a peaceful transition to black political power throughout southern Africa and the avoidance of conflicts that risk the involvement of outside powers.

The surest way to promote a peaceful transition in Rhodesia is to insist on arrangements that would bring the guerrilla forces and their Patriotic Front into the politics of the country. The way to frustrate a peaceful transition is to persist in a "settlement" that will cause the Patriotic Front to escalate the fighting, possibly with Cuban and Soviet help. That, in turn, could lead the Rhodesian Government to seek aid from South Africa, confronting the Western powers with an impossible choice of either letting Moscow and Pretoria fight it out or intervening directly. (And, if it were to be intervention, on which side?) It is better to maintain the United Nations sanctions against Rhodesia while bargaining for a better deal.

It is not enough, however, to say that no deal would be acceptable until the Patriotic Front's Mr. Nkomo and Mr. Mugabe are satisfied. Not even Mr. Nkomo, who enjoys a considerable political following among both blacks and whites, deserves such a veto. He has erred seriously in the past six months, letting distrust of Britain lead him to reject the Anglo-American plan for elections run by a caretaker government under British control.

The sanctions were imposed because Mr. Smith was blocking the way to majority rule. They should be lifted when a framework for its achievement is in sight. That may well mean bringing the guerrilla leaders into new negotiations. It certainly requires modifying the proposed settlement. Its elaborately contrived machinery for preserving white control ought to be dismantled. And the arrangements for elections ought to let all candidates take part without fear of harassment by the Rhodesian or guerrilla armies.

When the principles of the "internal settlement" were first announced last month, Andrew Young, the American representative at the United Nations, characterized them as a recipe for civil war. Now that the details are known, his fears appear justified. It would be no favor to Rhodesians, black or white, for Washington and London to embrace this deal.●

BYELORUSSIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

● Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I would like to congratulate all Americans of Byelorussian descent on the 60th anniversary of the Declaration of Independence of Byelorussia which took place in Minsk on March 25, 1918. Unfortunately, however, true independence was short-lived—Byelorussia was annexed by the new Soviet Socialist Republic on January 1, 1919—forming the so-called Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic.

Throughout its long history, Byelorussia has been subject to periods of domination by foreign states—since 1386 by Poland, and since the Treaty of Vilna in 1656, mostly by Russia and, later by the Soviet Union. In both world wars, Byelorussia suffered tragically heavy losses since it was one of the chief battlegrounds between the Russians and the Germans. Thus, Byelorussia has a strong interest in a lasting peace in Europe and is the only Soviet "republic" other than the Ukraine to have individual representation at the United Nations.

At the European Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, Byelorussia was not given individual representation. Nevertheless, the difficult history of Byelorussia gives it a particular interest in the humanitarian issues raised at the Belgrade Conference. As a member of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, I am especially concerned with Soviet obligations in areas such as family reunification, ethnic minority rights—such as the problem of Russification in the U.S.S.R.—and freedom on information and religion. The activities of the CSCE Commission—for which I was one of the legislative sponsors—are continuing to inform me of developments in the ongoing struggle for human rights in the U.S.S.R.—including, of course, Byelorussia.

I wish to extend my best wishes today to all Byelorussian-Americans—of whom there are some 1 million—many residing in New Jersey. Let us all work together so that Byelorussians wherever they are, will be free to practice their religious, political, and cultural rights as they wish.●

BANKRUPTCY AND THE CITY OF NEW YORK AND THE BANKING SYSTEM

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, last week I spoke against the administration's loan guarantee proposal for New York City in a speech entitled "100 Days of Urban Policy Debate: The New York Case." Some commentators have expressed the opinion that New York City will default on its obligations without the loan guarantees.

We do not know at this time whether New York City will default on its current debt obligations. But it is prudent to discuss the possible impacts of a default as we consider Federal loan guarantees to New York City.

Recently, the Comptroller of the Currency released statistics showing that the number of banks holding New York obligations totaling over 20 percent of their capital had dropped from 718 in 1975 to 306 in 1978. The New York obligations referred to in the Comptroller's statistics include those issued by the city of New York, the State of New York, New York State agencies, and Municipal Assistance Corporation obligations. He stated further:

> Only a handful of (relatively small) commercial banks might suffer potentially severe capital or liquidity failures.

This is a far cry from 1975 when the extent of bank holdings of New York obligations were much more substantial and spread throughout the United States. Moreover, the situation in 1975 was such that a New York City default might have started a series of State and municipal defaults around the country which in turn would have severely damaged the banking system.

But even in 1975, the testimony of the bank regulatory agencies did not predict a wave of bank failures across the country. We are even less likely to see significant problems in the banking system today.

I do not wish to belabor the differences between the situation in 1975 and the current situation, but I will list a few differences that I feel must be kept in mind as we discuss a potential New York default.

In 1975, New York State had a deficit of $600 million and faced probable default if New York City defaulted. This is no longer the case. New York State enjoys a substantial surplus and Governor Carey has recommended substantial tax cuts. New York State does not need to fear that its access to the credit market will be cut off if New York City defaults.

In 1975, the municipal bond market was in disarray as the fear of a New York City default grew. Interest rates were already at record highs, and the prospect of a New York City default was causing further increases and the possibility of a credit suspension for a number of cities.

Currently the municipal bond market is healthy. Interest rates have dropped substantially during these past few years. Record amounts of bonds have been issued and sold. Cities which were having difficulty financing bonds in 1975 are experiencing no difficulties in the current market. We see no indication that investors will withdraw from the market. We need not fear a countrywide municipal bond panic.

In 1975 there were grave concerns about the impact of a New York City default on the national economy. The country was in a deep recession and some, though not all, economists felt that a New York City default would have disastrous effects on the country's economy. The economy is now strong and showing signs of continued vigor. Unemployment is at the lowest rate in some time. I see no indication that a default by New York City would have an impact large enough to affect the health of the national economy.

The debate on the issue of continuing or expanding Federal assistance to New York City is important. Our decisions should be based on facts and sound analysis. To this end, I submit the two letters from the Comptroller of the Currency to Congressman MOORHEAD, chairman of the House Subcommittee on Economic Stability, to be printed in the RECORD following these remarks. These are important documents which contains information that can lead to different conclusions. I leave it to each Senator to analyze the data for his own decision.

The two letters and additional data follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C., March 2, 1978.

Re Bankruptcy of the city of New York and the banking system.

Hon. WILLIAM S. MOORHEAD,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Economic Stabilization, Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: You have asked me to provide an assessment of the consequences for the nation's banking system of a bankruptcy or default by New York City. Specifically, a geographic summary report was requested on the impact on bank holders of New York City securities.

The Comptroller of the Currency, in conjunction with the Federal Reserve System, recently completed a survey of commercial bank ownership of certain New York securities. The obligations covered were those issued by New York City, New York State, New York State agencies, and the Municipal Assistance Corporation (MAC). The institutions surveyed were 954 banks that had reported holdings of New York securities amounting to at least 20 percent of capital in our November, 1975 survey.

At that time, 718 banks held New York obligations totaling from 20 to 50 percent of their capital. Of those banks, 236 had holdings in excess of 50 percent of capital. The recently completed survey reflects that 236 banks now hold New York obligations amounting from 20 to 50 percent of capital and only 70 over 50 percent of capital.

Among the 306 banks which presently hold New York securities (state as well as city) amounting to more than 20 percent of capital, the holdings of New York City obligations total to only 3.6 percent of the total capital of those banks. We note that 80 percent of the outstanding city securities in the survey are held by institutions in New York State, with almost 60 percent held by the New York Clearing House Association (NYCHA) banks alone. However, this concentration of city paper held by the NYCHA banks totals only 2.5 percent of their capital. Based on this data, only a handful of (relatively small) commercial banks might suffer potentially severe capital or liquidity problems.[1]

Certainly a default by New York City would have some impact on the capital, liquidity and earnings on a larger number of banks. The extent of that impact would depend upon presently unknown circumstances including, for example, the city's financial position at that time; the degree of confidence in the city's future; the existence of any MAC exchange offer at that time; other conditions in the economy and the banking system; and the nature and extent of State and Federal actions taken to restore New York City's financial strength. In any event, from the perspectives of both the banking system and individual banks, the impact of a New York default would be manageable.

Before proceeding further, I should acknowledge a potential bias. I am a New Yorker, and proud to be one. It has been my home, where I have voted and paid taxes. Despite these ties, I have attempted to be objective and speak as a bank regulator who has spent virtually all his working life associated with financial markets.

From that vantage point, it seems that the most important question is a systemic one. In my judgment, we must address the impact of the city's failure on the capital markets of the nation and the world. Certainly, the securities of other municipalities and states would be questioned. And notwithstanding facts, confidence in some major financial institutions might also be questioned. This country is one of the centers of world capital markets, and New York City is its financial heart. As such, our handling of the city's financial problems will significantly influence all those who trade with or invest in our nation.

Certainly, a default by New York City would be poorly received in the international capital markets. This is not because they are awash with New York City paper. Rather, the impact would be attitudinal, engendering the belief that our strong and diversified nation is unable to come to grips with its own problems. Foreign capital would demand increasingly greater levels of protection as the price for entering segments of our economy. From the foreigner's point of view, that would be an apparently responsible course of action.

In short, it is my view that a New York City default or bankruptcy would result in an unfortunate loss of confidence in our system. Our economy and capital markets could ill afford that loss.

The problems of New York City are of concern to this Office and to me personally. Please be assured that we will continue to monitor closely the impacts of these problems, especially on our commercial banking system, and we stand ready to provide further analysis and assistance as necessary. I trust that this will prove useful to you and the Subcommittee, and remain

Very truly yours.

JOHN G. HEIMANN,
Comptroller of the Currency.

WASHINGTON, D.C., February 22, 1978.

Hon. JOHN G. HEIMANN,
Comptroller of the Currency,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. HEIMANN: As you know, the Subcommittee on Economic Stabilization is currently contemplating further Federal assistance to New York City upon termination of the Seasonal Loan Financing Act on June 30. As a prelude to our legislative work, we have been examining this week the possibility of a New York City default or bankruptcy in the absence of extended Federal assistance, and the consequences of such a bankruptcy or default.

It will be of great value in our work if we can obtain from you an assessment of the consequences for the nation's banking system of a bankruptcy or default by New York City. We are aware that, unlike 1975, there are no longer any short-term City obligations outstanding. However, according to our information, there are outstanding $7.3 billion of City bonds of varying maturities (not including issues of the Municipal Assistance Corporation), and that some $4.6 billion of these bonds are held outside the City's own pension and sinking funds.

Sizable amounts of these outstanding bonds are no doubt held by banks, probably listed on their books at par value rather than market value. We would greatly appreciate a prompt summary report from you on the impact of a default or bankruptcy on bank holders of these bonds. We do not, of course, ask that any individual bank be identified, but we would appreciate some measure of the number of banks that you regulate, hopefully by asset size, whose holdings of New York obligations are of sufficient magnitude to be a cause of concern. A geographical breakdown would also be useful.

Although a City default or bankruptcy would not directly place in jeopardy the bonds issued by the Municipal Assistance Corporation, their market value would very probably suffer and some cloud might be cast over them. Therefore, holdings of M.A.C. bonds should also be covered in your report, though under a separate classification.

Secretary Blumenthal will be testifying before the Subcommittee on March 2. If at all possible, we would like to receive at least a preliminary report from you before that date.

With best regards,

Sincerely,

WILLIAM S. MOORHEAD,
Chairman.●

FOREIGN AID REFORM

Mrs. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I want to bring to the attention of my colleagues an editorial and article from the Des Moines Register on the reform of foreign aid. One of Hubert's last major initiatives was a bill to rethink and reorganize U.S. foreign assistance efforts. He felt that social and economic injustice—poverty, ignorance, and disease—present a growing threat to our security in an interdependent world. He cared deeply about these issues and spent the last few weeks of his life working on this bill.

Senator CLARK has been a strong supporter of the legislation. As the article points out, Senator CLARK "has made a name for himself in both foreign affairs and agricultural policy." The increasing importance of U.S. agricultural exports and the growing gap in food production in the developing countries emphasize the close links between foreign policy and agriculture. Iowa is fortunate to have a Senator whose expertise bridges these crucially important areas.

Senator CLARK and Hubert shared a common concern and dedication to improving the U.S. capacity to respond to the needs of people in the developing countries. They discussed this legislation and collaborated on its drafting prior to Hubert's death. I am pleased that Senator CLARK is working to enact Hubert's last challenge.

Mr. President, I submit these articles be printed in the RECORD.

[From the Des Moines Register, Mar. 11, 1978]

HUMPHREY'S LEGACY ON AID

The United States was one of the first and for a time the most generous of nations in giving help to the underdeveloped world, but in recent years the U.S. has slipped to one of the least generous of advanced nations. Scandalous, and a clear future danger to the country.

President Carter wants a 7.5 percent boost in funds for foreign aid in fiscal 1979, and continued boosts for five years. He's right.

Frequent tinkering with foreign aid by each new president and each new Congress left its administration in a mess. President Carter's administrator, John Gilligan, has been trying to hammer into shape the major foreign aid outfit, the Agency for International Development for nearly a year.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee wants expansion of aid, but also a shakeup of the whole organization. A subcommittee long chaired by Senator Hubert Humphrey spent months working on the project, and a colleague from both houses and both parties introduced a bill embodying Humphrey's ideas on Jan. 25. An article elsewhere on this page describes the proposal. Senator Dick Clark (Dem., Ia.) is a supporter—and we hope he becomes a leader in the fight for the bill.

The administration should get behind the bill, and Congress should pass it—plus the increase in funds the president seeks.

REFORM OF FOREIGN AID: WILL WE RISE TO HHH'S LAST CHALLENGE?

(By Lauren Soth)

Every once in a while during his long career in the U.S. Senate, Hubert Humphrey forced his fellow Americans to sit back from the daily grind, look beyond their immediate problems and think. He was provocative that way. It's hard work to think, and Hubert is still making us do it.

In his last few months, he was deeply concerned with America's future in a world he thought was entering an era of upheaval. He felt that conditions of social and economic injustice in the world—poverty, illiteracy, disease—were a growing threat to our security.

Demand for change, he said, taking an expression from Churchill, is like a gathering storm. He was talking, of course, about the demands of the poor countries in the United Nations and in other international forums for a "new international economic order."

Humphrey was working on legislation to reorganize the foreign aid agencies of the U.S. government almost up to the day he died. His bill, the International Development Cooperation Act of 1978, was introduced by Senators John Sparkman (Dem., Ala.) and Clifford P. Case (Rep., N.J.) of the Foreign Relations Committee, but always will be known as the Humphrey bill.

Americans have been so worried about energy, pollution of the environment, water, inflation, high food prices and low farm prices (at the same time!), unemployment and other domestic matters that they have ignored foreign aid.

The sad military experience in Vietnam, plus evidence that economic aid (including Food for Peace) was handled corruptly, soured many Americans on the whole idea of foreign programs.

Leave it to the Happy Warrior, Hubert Humphrey, to bring us out of our dream world and remind us about the real one.

"World hunger," he said in a statement accompanying his bill, "cannot be solved merely by American charity. It requires the application of technology . . . disease can be conquered or at least its ravages minimized. The modern world knows how to do this if we have the will and provide the means."

The Humphrey bill proposes to combine all the many economic-development and fund-transfer agencies of the U.S. government into one International Development Cooperation Administration. The bill makes clear that the purpose is to assist the poorest countries, to overcome the worst aspects of poverty. It would remove the various limiting clauses and restrictions that now hamper a full-scale effort to help the poor.

Such a reshuffling would meet fierce resistance in the bureaucracy, of course. There have been many reorganizations and renamings of foreign aid agencies in the last quarter century—but always the fragmentation persisted. The Departments of State, Treasury, Agriculture, the Peace Corps, etc., retained their own domains.

Humprey's bill would create an independent agency, reporting directly to the president. The administrator would be the single spokesman on foreign aid, other than the president.

The proposed legislation does not call for new or added spending. Humphrey and other senators sponsoring the bill believed efficiency could be so increased as to get a lot more mileage out of present aid.

Two-thirds of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee are sponsors. The new head of the Agency for International Development, John Gilligan, and Sam Brown, head of Peace Corps, favor the reform. The White House and the chief Cabinet officers have not committed themselves.

The Humphrey bill would carry on and enhance the 1973 reform in foreign aid. This "new direction" reform was essentially a reaction to the blending of economic aid and military aid in Vietnam and elsewhere. It set a new standard for bilateral assistance—"people's" programs instead of big capital projects, agricultural development in place of fancy hotels and airports.

Humphrey wanted to make foreign aid genuine development aid, not a Cold War tool, not a supplement to military grants and not just softheaded humanitarianism—but an essential investment in world political stability.

Who will carry the ball now that Humphrey is gone? Some politician of vision, guts and ability could make a name for himself as a statesman by conducting this reform measure through to enactment. The times call for a new move in world economic affairs comparable to the Marshall Plan after World War II.

Someone needs to jar President Carter on this. It is directly in line with his promises of government reorganization and efficiency. It is a "natural" component of his human rights theme in international relations.

To drift along with the old setup—with AID under the State Department dishing out grants, USDA handling food aid, Treasury dealing with world financial institutions—is not enough.

It is true that the United States lags far behind other rich countries in the amount of aid given in relation to capacity—we are 12th in a list of 17 industrialized countries in aid, giving only a quarter of 1 per cent of our gross national product. But Humphrey was right, I believe, in calling for reorganization and more efficiency in aiding development before asking for more money.

Iowa Senator Dick Clark, a member of the Agriculture Committee as well as the Foreign Relations Committee, is a strong backer of the Humphrey bill. As a first-term senator, he already has made a name for himself in both foreign affairs and agricultural policy. He has shown impressive leadership on policies toward Africa. In his statement supporting the Humphrey bill, he said: "The Humphrey bill provides the administrative framework for a global attack on poverty. Senator Humphrey knew that this could only be undertaken in concert with other nations. . . . [This] is almost impossible . . . where policymaking on international development is fragmented among a number of competing agencies."

Foreign aid does not stir much popular enthusiasm right now. Let us hope that the senators sponsoring this last Humphrey initiative can rise above current political tendencies.

The best instincts of the American people and their wisdom in looking to the future can be challenged by courageous statesmanship. Sometimes the people recognize this sooner than the politicians expect.●

THE FARM ECONOMY

● Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, we are all aware that thousands of our Nation's farmers have been in Washington for several weeks to ask our help in solving the terrible burden they are shouldering. Our national farm economy is in a recession which could bring many farmers to actual financial ruin and others to years of extremely low productivity.

I have been privileged to be a member of an ad hoc Senate Republican Agriculture Policy Subcommittee, headed by my distinguished colleague, Senator ROBERT DOLE of Kansas, which has drafted specific recommendations to resolve this crisis. In addition to Senator DOLE, ranking Republican on the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry, other members of the Subcommittee are Senator CARL CURTIS of Nebraska, chairman of the Senate Republican conference; Senate Republican leader HOWARD BAKER of Tennessee, and Senator JOHN TOWER of Texas, chairman of the Senate Republican Policy Committee, besides myself.

We have offered specific recommendations regarding flexible parity, more aggressive export programs, farm credits, meat imports, land diversion, and incentives for farmers to participate in grain storage. We would like to share our thoughts with all our colleagues, and I ask that the report of this ad hoc committee be printed in the RECORD.

The report follows:

COMMITTEE REPORT

INTRODUCTION

When a farmer goes to market to sell his crops, he asks, "How much will you give me?" But when that same farmer buys supplies for his farm and family, he must ask, "How much will it cost me?"

Every American should understand why discontented farmers have been demonstrating throughout our country. To put the matter factually and bluntly, the farm economy is in a recession. Farmers are caught in a vicious cost-price squeeze that means financial ruin for many of them and lean years of low expectations for even more.

In 1974, a one-pound loaf of white bread cost 33 cents and the farm value of the wheat in that loaf was 6.4 cents. In August 1977, the same loaf cost 35.6 cents, and the farm value in it was 2.4 cents. In those 3 years, the cost to the consumer went up about 8 percent, but the return to the farmer—without whom there would be no bread—went down more than 60 percent!

Hard times have hit the American farmer. The indifference and unresponsiveness of the Carter-Mondale Administration to his plight is likely to make hard times even harder in the future.

Bumber crops world-wide, resulting from favorable weather conditions, combined with the present administration's lack of aggressive export policies, have created a situation in which U.S. surpluses of such major crops as corn, wheat, soybeans, and cotton remain unsold. As a consequence, prices have plummeted to levels well below the farmer's cost of production. Corn and wheat are selling for only about half the price these crops demanded in 1973 and 1974.

In terms of current dollars, farm income has declined from $33 billion in 1973 to only about $20 billion in 1977—down 40 percent. No wonder farmers are angry. Adjusted for inflation, net income for farmers today is equal to farm earnings in 1940. But since the 1940's—even though there are 50 percent fewer persons farming in the United States today—the farm economy has taken on critical importance in the overall national and international economy. Thus, whatever affects our farmers will eventually affect each and every one of us.

Low prices and lowering farm incomes impact on more than the Nation's farmers. A shockwave effect is beginning to be felt throughout the economy. Farm equipment makers, fertilizer companies, and other retailers and service industries which directly supply the farmer and his family are beginning to feel the cost-price squeeze, too. For example, direct farm use of steel accounts for 40,000 jobs in the steel industry. Thus, when hard times hit U.S. farmers, steel workers also suffer. And so do we all. Consider these facts:

Production, processing, and distribution of food account for 20 percent of our gross national product.

Our Nation's 2.8 million farms provide 4.2 million jobs—more jobs, in fact, than the steel (780,000), auto (774,000), and aircraft (518,000) industries combined.

About one out of four jobs in the United States is farm related. In addition to the 4 million Americans directly involved in farm production, another 14 million are employed in agricultural support services and related manufacturing.

Farmers purchased $85 billion in industrial items, and paid nearly $10 billion in Federal, State, and local taxes in 1976.

Agricultural exports are the one consistently positive factor in the U.S. balance of payments.

Every $1 increase in exports generates another 90 cents of income rippling through the rest of the economy.

The American farmer is the most productive person in the world. Forty years ago, one farm worker produced enough food for himself and nine other people. Today, one farm worker produces enough for himself and fifty others. On some of our most efficient farms, one worker produces enough to feed 100 persons.

Because of its miraculous productive capacity, the U.S. in 1976 fed its own population for less than 17 percent of their take-home pay. That is a remarkable tribute to the energy and ingenuity of our farmers. Even after meeting our domestic needs, we exported 55 percent of our wheat, 30 percent of our rice, 45 percent of our soybeans, 32 percent of our grain sorghum, and 26 percent of our corn. In time of scarcity, the bounty of our rich soil and the know-how and hard work of our farmers are the best hope of a hungry world.

Republican Administrations built the most prosperous agricultural economy in 40 years:

Production and utilization reached an all-time high.

Farm prices reached 85 percent of parity in 1973—the highest and closest to 100 percent parity since World War II.

Farm exports tripled between 1972 and 1976.

Net farm income rose to the highest levels in history.

Per capita income in rural areas approached the income level of city dwellers.

The average farmer was dependent on the Federal Government for only 2 percent of his income.

During the 1976 presidential campaign, candidate Carter criticized Republican Administration farm policies and told farmers:

"We need a guarantee of a decent price for the farmer and a reasonable price for the consumer . . . If I'm elected you'll have our support (for) prices at least to equal production costs and you can depend on that, too . . . (F)or a determined farm family that's willing to work, I'm going to give you a chance to stay in business. Our new . . . farm policy will also help us develop a stable and healthy export market."

It was an empty promise, a promise broken by policy blunders and a pervasive misunderstanding of the role American agriculture plays in our national and international economy. During the first year of the Carter Administration:

U.S. farm prices sank to new lows, compared with retail price increases of 6.5 percent.

For the first time in four years, exports of wheat and flour fell below one billion bushels.

The U.S. share of world exports, which had been averaging 18 percent or more during the previous Republican Administration, declined.

The U.S. absorbed 66⅔ of a general decline in world trade in wheat and flour, while Canada, Australia, and Argentina, actually increased their exports of wheat. While much American grain sits in silos, 9 million tons of Canadian wheat has just been shipped to the People's Republic of China.

The misunderstanding of the vital importance of farm exports to the U.S. economy has been carried over to domestic policy decisions summarized in the phrase "The War on the West." These misguided and ill-conceived policies have sent tremors of fear for the future among ranchers and farmers in the western United States.

One of President Carter's first decisions after taking office was to discontinue funding of 19 major water projects, with no concern over the effects that this decision would have on the most arid regions of our country.

The Carter-Mondale Administration proposed draconian regulations to enforce a long-ignored and obsolete 1902 law limiting to 160 acres the amount of federally irrigated land which a farmer may own. Rather than propose remedial amendments to the law, or some other solution, the administration is now waffling on this crucial issue.

The Carter-Mondale Administration is designing a comprehensive Federal water resources policy which threatens to usurp traditional State control over water rights.

The Carter-Mondale Administration decided to increase grazing fees on public lands, adding another blow to the livestock industry.

Despite the farm recession, the Carter-Mondale Administration has recommended a reduction of $3.7 billion in the farm support function of the USDA budget.

The damage these decisions have wrought upon agriculture and upon the total economy of our western States is impossible to compute. In light of farm conditions all over America, the Carter-Mondale agriculture policies spell economic disaster for all 50 States and ultimately for our foreign allies and trading partners.

It is sobering to recall that the Great Depression of the 1930's was preceded by a deep farm depression in the 1920's which eventually engulfed the world.

RECOMMENDATIONS

Senate Republicans believe much can be done to turn things around for the American farmer. We offer these recommendations as a basis for a coherent agriculture policy which, if adopted, would raise farm income, create jobs, strengthen the economy, and bolster that part of America which works to feed and clothe us.

Sell America abroad: The need for exports

U.S. agriculture exports have increased for seven successive years, reaching $24 billion last year. In 1978, exports are expected to decline to about $21 billion.

To revise the momentum of food and fiber exports, we recommended:

Capitalizing on our advantages as the world's foremost producer by emphasizing to importing countries that we can guarantee them a dependable supply of farm commodities.

Aggressively developing foreign markets for U.S. farm commodities.

Building a policy framework for the pursuit of export markets in the developing world.

Expanding the Food for Peace Program (P.L. 480), thereby stimulating U.S. exports while helping meet the food requirements of developing nations. Current levels of Public Law 480's Title I programming are too low in view of both the need to stimulate exports and to help meet the food requirements of developing nations. We believe that the Title I funding level of $800 million should be increased to at least $1 billion.

Restoring the Office of Food for Peace to its previous position of prominence. Only last year the Congress amended the law to place even greater emphasis on the use of food aid for promoting international development. The administration's recent reorganization of AID has undermined this congressional intent, buried the Food for Peace Program under bureaucratic layers and redtape, and delayed the shipment of vital exports to hungry countries overseas.

Providing short and intermediate term Government credit (through the Commodity Credit Corporation) to other countries for the purchase of U.S. farm products.

Directing the Secretary of Agriculture to establish an "intermediate CCC credit program" to take advantage of export market opportunities that demand credit for a term of five to ten years.

Directing the Secretary of Agriculture to establish a program for expanding exports of farm commodities by making available Commodity Credit Corporation financing to exporters who extend deferred payment terms to foreign buyers.

Expanding Export-Import Bank financing of loans for farm commodity exports commensurate with agricultures share of total U.S. exports.

Expressing the sense of the Congress that the Export-Import Bank not discriminate between the financing of agricultural and industrial exports. If this Sense of Congress Resolution does not produce this fair and equitable treatment for farmers by the administration, additional Republican legislation, which will mandate such treatment when the Export-Import Bank Act comes up for extension later in this session of Congress, will be introduced.

Taking advantage of the current multilateral trade negotiations in Geneva to gain concessions for U.S. farm exports and improved market access, especially to markets in Japan and Western Europe.

Adjusting our tariff policy to provide most-favored nation tariff status to certain countries in those instances in which it is necessary to protect the interests of American agriculture and to advance the commerce upon which our economy, especially our farm economy, depends.

Implementing existing legislation that permits foreign nations to purchase our grain and store it in the U.S. for subsequent export.

Recognizing that the most important human right is the right to food. The subordinations of foreign sales of grain to State Department notions of what constitutes benign social policies will destroy our humanitarian goal of eliminating hunger in the world. Farmers should not be made pawns of the Carter-Mondale Administration's inconsistent foreign policy.

Changing the Meat Import Act of 1964 to provide for "counter-cyclical" beef import quotas so that expanded imports will not occur when prices are low. Currently, imports increase as U.S. production increases, and imports reached record high levels last year. If this trend is not halted, many ranchers will have to cut back production or be driven out of business. The end result, therefore, would be higher meat prices for consumers. Imports of meat should be phased to U.S. production.

Requiring that all imported meat, poultry, and dairy products be subject to the same labeling and health and sanitation inspection standards as domestic farm products.

Pricing of farm products

The prices the farmer receives for what he sells have fallen more than seven percent below the levels of a year ago. Yet, the prices he pays for goods and services, wages, taxes, and interest all have risen four percent over those of a year ago. The latest parity ratio—the difference between the farmer's purchasing power today and what it was in 1910–1914—is about 65, the lowest point in 44 years. This means the American farmer is trapped in an economic crisis which has reduced his buying power to the rough equivalent of what it was for his parents during the Depression.

Not since World War II have parity levels been at 100 percent. The best that the farmers have been able to do since then was in 1973, when Republican agricultural policies brought prosperity to rural areas and parity peaked at around 85 percent. Increasing costs of production and market conditions have caused a steadily declining trend in parity levels. Year-end 1976 prices received as a percentage of parity were 68 percent for corn, 79 percent for cotton, and 90 percent for soybeans. After the Carter-Mondale Administration's first year in office, corn fell to 57 percent, cotton 58 percent, and soybeans 74 percent.

Further declines or even a continuation of these low parity levels will mean serious problems for the American farmer. Recent low commodity prices, such as wheat at 49 percent of parity, are not acceptable to the farmer caught in the cost-price squeeze. They should not be acceptable to the rest of us, either, if we are to maintain a viable farm industry in this country.

To halt the downward trend in farm income and to ease the financial burden of high costs and low return on invested dollars, we recommend that the Congress consider two legislative solutions:

Both of these legislative initiatives are basically an effort to bring farm production more in line with demand.

Land Diversion: Under the paid additional set-aside proposal, farmers who set-aside cropland in addition to that required under mandatory program would be paid for such adjustments. This bill provides for set-asides of 15 million acres of wheat, 10 million acres of feed grains, 3 million acres of soybeans and 3 million acres of cotton.

Flexibility Parity: New legislation resetting target prices to a more acceptable level through the flexible parity concept. This concept would permit farmers to achieve up to full parity target prices. S. 2481, a Republican initiative, allows wheat, feed grains and cotton farmers to set aside up to 50 percent of their planted acreage to these crops in return for a guarantee of parity prices through a combination of the market and deficiency payments. This bill provides for graduated choices for each step of set-aside or deficiency payment eligibility level. Such new legislation would not interfere with market forces, would not damage exports and would improve farm income without increasing costs to consumers as would be the case if crop loan rates were raised.

Aggressively pursuing exports of food and fiber products.

Increasing price supports for this year's crops where such action will not jeopardize exports.

Increasing payment to farmers for grain storage to incentive levels but not less than 25 cents per bushel per year; and lowering interest charges to farmers on commodity loans to not more than the cost of money to the Commodity Credit Corporation from the U.S. Treasury.

Expediting passage of an agricultural refinancing bill which would permit farmers and ranchers, who cannot obtain credit elsewhere, to consolidate their indebtedness under Farmers Home Administration financing. First payment of interest and principal under the program would be deferred according to the type of original indebtedness refinanced. For example, real estate loans would be deferred for five years, equipment loans for three years, and operating loans for two years.

We believe that farmers deserve a fair rate of return on their investment in the marketplace.

The farmer's soaring costs: The middleman's take

It now costs more to process, transport, and distribute food each year ($58 billion) than to produce food ($56 billion). Food processors, marketing firms, and distributors—the middlemen in the agribusiness world—receive a bigger share of the food dollar than the farmer. While the farmer loses money each year on his crops, profits earned by middlemen continue their upward trend.

It could be argued that the middleman takes too much of the consumer's food dollar. It is true that packagers, wholesalers, and retailers have pushed their prices steadily higher. Like the farmer, the middleman faces higher costs for labor, energy, materials, construction, and Government regulation. But unlike the farmer, the middleman is able to pass along his higher costs to the consumer.

The latest USDA statistics concerning food prices dramatically demonstrate that point. In 1977, the average family paid $41 more for its domestically produced food than it did in 1976. But $39 of that increase—almost all of it!—went to processors and other middlemen, not to the farmers.

The reasons for that disproportionate distribution of food costs can be found in our intricate and necessarily complicated system of getting food from the fields of America to millions of American homes. The more a commodity is changed, and the more it changes hands, from the time it leaves the farm until it reaches the consumer, the higher the costs of processing and the smaller the farmer's share of the take. For example, processing costs make up about one half of the retail price of catsup and canned tomatoes, but while food processors receive half of the proceeds, the farmer gets less than 14 percent. The price of cornflakes was 11.8 percent higher in October than a year earlier, although the price of corn had declined 10 percent over that period.

The real villain in the farm economy is inflation, aggravated by the excessive spending policies and programs of the Carter-Mondale Administration. Increases in the minimum wage, skyrocketing social security taxes, and proposed huge energy taxes will create even larger costs for farmers and middlemen alike. These, in turn, are reflected in the higher food prices that consumers must pay at the supermarket.

Soaring costs: The consumer's woe

And what of the consumer? Do our own expectations in the way of quality, packaging, and easy preparation of food add to the costs of those products served at the dinner table? Of course. The reason a penny's worth of beans from the farm costs fifty cents when they reach our table is that we like them cleaned, sorted, frozen, wrapped, encased in a plastic cooking pouch, sauced in butter and spices, perhaps graced with mushrooms or onions. All that takes a tremendous amount of labor, costly machinery, and time. But it appears to be what the public wants in terms of variety, convenience, and effort saved.

Soaring costs: Labor's contribution

Last year, for the first time ever, labor's take of the food dollar exceeded the farmer's portion. Out of every dollar spent by the American consumer on groceries in 1977, those who actually produce our food received only 33 cents, while the wages of those who handle food in the marketplace consumed 34 cents—and even more than that, if the labor component of transportation is counted.

In terms of the food marketing dollar—what the consumer pays for food exclusive of the farmer's income—labor's share is substantially greater: a full 51 percent of all food costs.

In the supermarket, on the farm, and at every point in between, labor costs have pushed food prices upward, without any greater return to the farmer. Between 1965 and 1977, the number of workers employed on our farms declined from 5.8 million to 4.2 million, but labor costs in farming during that period rose more than 150 percent. This year, the wages of employees in processing, marketing, and distribution sectors of the farm industry are expected to rise by 7 to 8 percent. Higher minimum wages have made it costlier to produce crops, and the recently enacted increases in both the minimum wage and Social Security taxes will increase costs still further. When the consumers are hit with the resulting higher prices at the check-out counter, the farmer will surely be blamed.

But the farmer is the least to blame. Both he and the consumer are being victimized by the disproportionate power wielded by relatively small numbers of organized employees, who extract the largest (and growing) share of our food dollar. The starting hourly wage for a grocery clerk in Washington, D.C. is $5.62, with $8.43 for overtime. But when a farm family works from sunup to sundown, no one pays them overtime.

At numerous points in the food chain, self-serving labor rules and regulations jack up prices without returning an extra penny to the farmer or an extra benefit to the consumer. In many localities, union work rules prevent supermarkets from using meat cut up and boxed at its point of origin, even though that would result in a savings to the buyer. Instead, "swinging" meat—whole carcasses or sides—must be shipped long distances to be cut up at the point of supermarket sale, with consequent higher prices for the public.

Farm workers have to be ready to switch from one task to another, depending upon what needs to be done. But farther along the food chain, work rules frequently require an expensive specialization of labor, so that the person who drives a truck may not be permitted to unload it, while the person who cleans fish cannot clean up the produce section. On the farm, surplus labor and idle hands are an intolerable luxury. But when food is transported to market, work rules and Federal regulations sometimes impose idleness on men and machines. For instance, because of the Interstate Commerce Commission, huge trucks hauling food shipments must often make return trips empty, rather than taking on another load and thereby holding down expenses. Railroads too must charge higher rates for shipping food because of the persistent featherbedding that plagues the rail industry. Meanwhile, rain or shine, well organized truckers and railroad workers can count on the wages written into their union contracts. Not so for the farmer, whose products fill the trucks and box cars.

When teamsters strike, or stevedores, grocery clerks or butchers, food costs rise, but not farm profits. When a shipping strike ties up international commerce and American grain cannot reach foreign markets, the farmers pay the price for somebody else's labor dispute. It is no wonder some farmers have been threatening to shut down their operations. They are tired of being the fall-guys for other people's higher wages.

To help the farmer get his fair share of the food dollar, and to alleviate escalating labor costs in the agriculture industry, we urge:

Consumer militancy against the labor abuses which impose higher prices upon the public without improvement of goods or services.

The replacement of Federal officials who are cavalier about adding still more costs to the food budget of the American family, whether through additional regulation or through favoritism toward special interests.

Prompt implementation of the Taft-Hartley Act to prevent deliberate disruptions of food exports.

A program of public information by the Department of Labor to let consumers know how labor costs impact upon their grocery bills and how future labor contracts within the food industry will affect food prices.

And to relieve the farmer's economic plight arising from the shortage of agricultural labor, we recommend:

Reinstatement of a Government-supervised program of imported foreign labor, which will strengthen Federal efforts to control the influx of illegal aliens.

Revision of Federal labor laws which contribute substantially to the farmer's costs and impeded farm production.

Soaring costs: Overregulation

No one denies that there is a need in rural America, as in our towns and cities, for a cleaner, safer, and healthier environment. In fact, farmers and agriculturalists were the original conservationists, for they knew that if you take care of the land, it will take care of you. The problem today is that well-intentioned regulation has grown into a huge, tangled web of complicated, unnecessary, and costly rules and laws that strangle farmers in redtape and paperwork and threaten their basic rights as productive landowners.

GAO has estimated that the cost in tax money of Government regulation of the food industry is fast approaching $1 billion. No fewer than 75 Federal agencies have the power to control the lives of rural Americans. To take just one agency, if the Occupational Safety and Health Administration's rules and regulations were piled up in a single heap, they would reach 17 feet high!

We call for a comprehensive and thorough review and reform of such agencies as OSHA, the Environmental Protection Agency, and the Interstate Commerce Commission, with a view to rewriting or eliminating those Federal laws and regulations which hamper food production and create excessive farming costs.

Under the Carter-Mondale Administration, the Department of Interior is proposing to raise by 25 percent the grazing fees for livestock on public lands. There are currently 11 million head of cattle and sheep being grazed on 283 million acres in the public domain. Cattle prices are only now beginning to recover from devastating market conditions and the escalating costs of production. Higher fees for ranchers fail to take into account their inability to pay and would only hinder livestock prices and further fuel the fires of inflation in agriculture.

We oppose any increases in grazing fees on public lands at this time.

The Department of Interior, also by regulation, is withdrawing from multiple-use land management millions of acres of Federal lands. Given the fact that there are 760 million acres of federally owned lands in the West—about 45 percent of the land in California, 86 percent of Nevada, 66 percent of Utah, 65 percent of Idaho, 44 percent of Arizona, 34 percent of New Mexico, 48 percent of Wyoming, and 96 percent of Alaska—such action will have significant impact on operations and livestock production of western farmers and ranchers.

We urge a halt to excessive withdrawals of public lands from multiple-use land management. We must ensure that public lands are being managed properly for their forest and mineral wealth as well as for their recreational opportunities and scenic beauty.

Soaring costs: Unfair competition

Although the free market system in U.S. agriculture has worked well, it has become clearer in recent years, from a close examination of the market system, that the farmer's plight is also the consumer's plight—both can be victimized by the anti-competitive practices of others.

In order to strengthen competition in the market place and hold down costs to farmers of essential supplies, we urge the Carter-Mondale Administration to continue the policies of the previous Republican Administrations and vigorously enforce laws against unfair trade practices.

Energy and the farmer

Approximately half of the energy consumed in the food, fiber, and forestry system is petroleum based—primarily diesel and gasoline—and another 30 percent is natural gas. Because agriculture accounts for 22 percent of the Nation's energy use, that industry is highly dependent upon prompt and uninterrupted supplies of hydrocarbon energy resources.

In order to establish sound agricultural energy policies, we recommend:

Retaining high priority for agriculture's use of energy, and ensuring that the farm industry has adequate supplies of basic production needs.

Encouraging the domestic production of oil, gas, coal, and uranium through incentives and more favorable pricing and regulatory policies.

Relying to a greater extent upon coal and nuclear power and promoting coal gasification technologies.

Fostering alternative energy sources like solar, wind, and biomass.

Promoting gasohol. Determining the feasibility of using alcohol derived from agricultural products as a motor fuel extender and substitute by stepping up research and pilot plant operations.

Increasing research and extension services in energy conservation.

In addition, we oppose policies that would:

Lessen the efficiency of energy producers or endanger the supply of vitally needed energy sources to the agriculture industry by forcing divestiture of energy companies.

Discourage exploration for new natural gas supplies by regulating the price of intrastate gas.

Water: A weapon in the war against the West

In October of last year in Colorado, President Carter stated:

"But one thing that happens—and I have already noticed in the brief time I have been in the White House—is that when people see the threat of a future shortage, they tend to increase their wastefulness to be sure they get their share of water that might be even scarcer in the future that's not scarce today. And I know that this is the case not only in water but in many other areas."

We do not agree with the President. Farmers do not waste water.

The Administration's water policies are clearly out of touch with the needs of our western states. We do not believe the Administration is proceeding properly in its proposals for establishing a national water policy or in its policies regarding Federal reclamation projects and lands. After direct human consumption, the priority for water use should go to agricultural production for food.

In order to restore common sense and credibility to western water policies, we support:

Senate Resolution 284 adopted unanimously on October 5, 1977. That resolution states that there will be a moratorium of six months during which Congress is in session on implementation of any new national water resources policy by the Administration. This time period will allow more adequate review by the States and Congress.

A careful, systematic approach to reorganizing the natural resources and environmental functions of the executive branch. Additional time should be given Members of Congress and affected State bodies for critical review of the reorganization propoals of the Administration.

Amending the 1902 Federal Reclamation Act to meet today's needs. This law currently restricts ownership of federally irrigated lands to 160 acres. That limit is unrealistic because of technological advances and economies of scale in farming and the larger acreages required to support full agricultural production.

A close look at all water projects cancelled or proposed for cancellation. Such projects must be viewed from more than the narrow budgetary viewpoint which the Administration has taken. The President's cranky negativism toward the Army Corps of Engineers is deplorable. In evaluating proposed water projects, consideration must be given to: the availability of water for domestic and industrial purposes, the cleanliness of hydroelectric power, the advantages of flood control, and the bonus of recreational opportunities. The value of water supplies for all of these purposes in the future should not be subject to arbitrary cost-benefit analyses. Human needs for survival should be paramount—without regard to economic justifications arrived at today which have little or no relationship to future requirements.

The administration's anti-agribusiness bias

During the Republican Administrations, the Department of Agriculture was indeed the department of farming. Under the Carter-Mondale Administration, it has become an insensitive bureaucracy isolated from, and often opposed to, the concerns and the needs of the farmer. Staffed with militant consumerists and eco-centric lobbyists, the department is now concerned more with controlling farm production than with marketing farm products; more with the divestiture of large, efficient companies than with their valuable contributions to agriculture; and more with the heartthrob of environmental preservation than with sound land management policies.

In order to restore credibility to the USDA and the farmer's faith in Federal farm programs, we recommend:

Restoring the Department of Agriculture to its traditional and vital role as the advocate of farmers. Any reorganization of the Department must have as its primary goals enhancing the farm economy and protecting the interests of American agriculture.

Avoiding the current Administration's obsession with the philosophy of "big is bad" in the agricultural industry. Firms of all sizes are required in the farm economy.

Implementation of the farm bill—Let's move it!

Although the Agriculture Act of 1977 was passed in July of last year, the Carter-Mondale Administration has been dragging its feet in implementing some provisions of the new law, which was designed to help farmers during their current crisis.

Specifically, the Administration has yet to issue regulations pursuant to the act which would enable foreign nations to purchase U.S. grain and to store it in this country for subsequent export. In addition, although the Administration has undertaken the set-aside program mandated by Congress, no payments have been made to farmers who participate in the program. Payments could be made for acreage diversion under existing authority. The Emergency Agricultural Act of 1978, or paid additional set-aside bill, which was reported out of the Senate Agriculture Committee on March 13, mandates payments for acreage set-asides.

The Flexible Parity Act of 1978, which was reported out of the Senate Agriculture Committee March 15, mandates higher target prices as the individual farmer participant elects to set-aside additional acres. This bill approaches the set-aside or acreage diversion matter with higher target prices as the incentive while the other acreage diversion measure would accomplish its objective through direct payments to participating farmers.

The Administration was extremely slow in implementing the de la Garza provision for sugar. It was only after considerable Congressional pressure that a tariff and duty adjustment was proclaimed by the Carter Administration. During this period of "foot dragging" foreign sugar was dumped into our markets at the detriment of U.S. producers. The Administration still does not have a national sweetener policy. We recommend an extension of the de la Garza provision with appropriate adjustment in the support levels.

The Administration is not aggressively seeking outlets for the ever-increasing stocks of milk (650 million pounds) that the Commodity Credit Corporation is acquiring. These nonfat dry milk stocks could be used as a part of a national policy to feed the hungry and malnourished people in developed countries as was done during the previous Administration through the World Food Program, P.L. 480 and sales programs to foreign governments.

We recommend that the Administration use existing authorities in these important areas.

CONCLUSION

These recommendations, supported by the Senate Republican Policy Committee, are designed to assist the Nation's farmers and, thus, the entire American economy.

If our farm economy continues to decline, it could lead to another depression worldwide.

Senate Republicans believe that our farmers can no longer be treated as economic second-class citizens.

We urgently call upon the Administration and the Democratic-controlled Congress to join our efforts to revive the farm economy by taking the actions we have recommended regarding:

(1) Flexible Parity.
(2) More aggressive export programs, including increased use of export credits and P.L. 480.
(3) Farm Credits.
(4) Meat Imports.
(5) Land Diversion.
(6) Incentives for farmers to participate in grain storage.●

WATERWAY USER CHARGES: THE VIEW OF THE ARIZONA REPUBLIC

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, many leading newspapers across the Nation have recently published editorials favoring my proposal to phase in a reasonable system of waterway user charges, linked to waterway costs.

The Arizona Republic has now added its voice to that growing list of papers which recognize the need for transportation equity and waterway user charges.

Mr. President, I ask that this editorial be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

TO END A SUBSIDY

If there is any reason why the federal government should spend about $400 million a year to give the barge companies a free ride on the nation's 15,000 miles of inland waterways, we have yet to hear it.

The $400 million is what it costs the government merely to maintain the waterways. Over the years, the government also has spent billions to make them navigable, and the companies haven't been made to put up a penny of that, either.

The whole thing has made no sense to every president since Franklin D. Roosevelt, but every time someone introduces a bill to end the free ride, congressmen, whose constituents profit from the low barge rates the subsidies make possible, manage to kill it.

President Carter may now have figured out a way to force Congress to act. The President is backing a bill, introduced by Sen. Pete Domenici, D-N.M., that would require the barge companies to pay 100 percent of the operating costs and 50 percent of the cost of construction of the segments of the inland waterway system they use.

He says that, if Congress fails to pass the bill, he will veto any new waterway construction.

There are two construction projects the barge companies have been pressing for. One is the $1.6-billion Tenn-Tom waterway linking the Tennessee River and Mobile, Ala. The other is a $432 million reconstruction of the locks and dams on the Mississippi near Alton, Ill.

The first the barge companies can do without. The second, they desperately need. Barges loaded with grain sometimes have to wait three or four days to use the Alton locks because they are so inadequate.

Faced with Carter's threat of a veto of the Alton project, it's possible that Congress will approve the Domenici bill.

Not only would the Treasury profit from this, so would the railroads, which cannot now match the subsidized barge rates.

And, faced with the necessity of paying for them, the barge companies might stop pressing for such uneconomic projects as Tenn-Tom.●

TUITION TAX CREDITS VERSUS GRANTS AND LOANS: AN UNNECESSARY CHOICE

● Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, earlier I spoke on the Senate floor to commend our colleagues on the Finance Committee for their approval of a tuition tax credit bill (S. 3946)—despite the rigid, formidable opposition of the Carter administration.

As a longstanding supporter of tuition tax credits—and as a cosponsor of the two major tuition tax credit bills introduced this session—I know that the Finance Committee's favorable report is good news for many Americans who are struggling desperately to find a way to meet the increasingly heavy burden of financing educational expenses.

For example, the Finance Committee's bill, in the first year of its enactment, would allow a tax credit of 50 percent of tuition costs up to $250—per student—for full-time vocational and college undergraduate tuition payments.

Unfortunately, the Carter administration—following closely on the heels of the Finance Committee's action—is now redoubling its efforts to scuttle this sorely needed measure of tax relief from the skyrocketing costs of education.

As an alternative to the tuition tax credit bill, the administration is now pressing for its own legislation which would expand existing college grant and loan programs. Indeed, such an administration bill has been hurriedly reported out of the Committee on Human Resources after only 2 weeks of consideration.

As one of the original architects of a major college student program—the national defense student loan program (NDSL)—I would be the last person to quarrel with the need to make student loans available to more people. But I find it rather curious that President Carter is now—suddenly—pushing grants and loans, to the exclusion of tuition tax credits, as the one and only panacea to alleviate the college financing burden.

President Carter's new-found enthusiasm for student grants and loans is particularly puzzling when we recall that, only a year ago, the administration proposed to eliminate the direct student loan program altogether. Some of us, in fact, had to fight very hard to have funds for direct student loans reinstated in the budget. Now, the administration seeks to have us believe that student grants and loans are the only way to go. The strong impression is left that President Carter would veto the tuition tax credit bill.

It is interesting to note that, in a private memorandum dated February 8, HEW Secretary Joseph Califano advised the President that in order to "counter congressional proposals for tuition tax credits," the administration "must move quickly * * * to seize the initiative on this very hot issue."

In my judgment, however, the issue in this debate is not whether either grants and loans or tuition tax credits are the one-and-only best solution for helping families provide quality education for their children.

The issue in this debate is simply this: Under existing programs, if you are poor, you can qualify for grants and loans and get help with education costs; and, if you are rich, your kids can have a quality education if they want it, because you can afford it. But, if you are part of the vast middle class—particularly if you have several children—you are stuck between a rock and a hard place. You are left entirely to your own resources—and your own resources in all likelihood will not be enough.

It may well be that Congress should consider expanding current grant and loan programs. But this should not preclude Congress from also moving now to provide relief for middle income Americans through tuition tax credits. Both approaches have their place, and both are needed.

The tuition tax credit legislation now pending before the Senate has much to commend it:

The bill is designed to provide tuition tax credit relief from education costs at all levels. If we are going to ease the financial crunch for the middle class, the education options ought not be limited to undergraduate college studies.

Tuition tax credits are the most simple, efficient and direct means of providing prompt relief. Eligibility can be declared on one or two lines of the income tax form. Students and parents would not have to fill out reams of HEW applications.

Tuition tax credits would not create collection and default problems. As recent reports indicate, default rates under the student loan programs have risen alarmingly in the past decade, and Government collection procedures to date have proven to be both ineffective and expensive.

Finally—and perhaps most praiseworthy of all—tuition tax credits offer ease of administration without expanding an already swollen and intrusive bureaucracy.

Tuition tax credits is an idea that has a tremendous amount of popular support. People representing groups from all parts of the country came to Washington to testify in support of tuition tax credits when the Finance Committee held hearings in January. But, perhaps the one group to whom this legislation is most vital is the students themselves. Enactment of this legislation would open the door of opportunity for many who otherwise find it closed.

To illustrate student support for the tuition tax credit concept, I ask that testimony before the Finance Committee by Kent L. Barry, president of the Associated Students of Michigan State University—one of the largest student government organizations in the country—be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

I strongly support—and will vote for—the tuition tax credit bill. I believe the President's loan and grant program should be examined independently and on its own merits. But it should not stand in the way of the tuition tax credit bill.

The testimony follows:

STATEMENT OF MR. KENT L. BARRY

Mr. Chairman, honorable committee members, I am pleased to appear before you this morning in support of the Tuition Tax Credit Bill. Accompanying me today are Mr. Corey Binger and Mr. Michael McCandless; both members of my staff. Our testimony is representative of the major universities and colleges (public and private) in the state of Michigan, comprising a student population of over 350,000.

As President of the student body, at Michigan State University, I am well aware of the problems in attaining a place in the world of higher education. This awareness has been manifest throughout our student community and, as a result, has prompted the formation of a fact-finding task force whose job it has been to prepare a detailed analysis of the problems as we see them.

The value of our testimony, however, does not lie in the statistical and graphic analyses that our research has led us through; but rather, in the expression of the effects felt by the "average" Michigan college student in his or her attempts to deal with rising tuition costs.

The cost of tuition at Michigan State University, recently cited as one of the ten most expensive public institutions of higher learning, has risen by some 28 percent in the last two years.

Even with our own limited knowledge of the variegated factors which make up the entire economic picture, it is readily apparent that the increases are not in line with the growth of the economy as a whole; and this trend is certainly not unique to Michigan State University. We believe a tuition tax credit would provide a reasonable financial assistance to those families and/or individuals who would not otherwise be eligible for grants or scholarships. We have determined, through our research, that institutions throughout the country are suffering from a characteristically similar fate; to wit, they have seen a reduction in the numbers of students enrolled from economic backgrounds traditionally regarded as the middle class.

We strongly support financial assistance programs for lower income families, and we do not regard the support of Congress for a tuition tax credit as being in any way indicative of a diminution of support for the needy. Rather, we feel that such legislation will serve to guarantee that no person be denied a college education on economic grounds alone. This is a crucial point, and one which we cannot stress too strongly. There have been some who would urge that we turn our efforts in the direction of direct aid from the federal government for students in financial need. We believe that the tax credit for tuition would more properly address the problem by allowing taxpayers to keep more of their earnings, instead of waiting in line for federal "aid".

Enrollments are down at most of the colleges and universities in the state of Michigan and this is indicative of a national phenomenon. Part of this problem can be attributed directly to the fact that the "baby boom" years have reached their zenith. Another part of the problem can be traced directly to the rising costs of obtaining a college education. We believe that this second factor is one which should concern all Americans.

A tax credit for tuition would certainly go a long way toward giving further incentives for individuals to pursue their educational aspirations, without undue regard for the limitations imposed by economic barriers. Such incentives are especially significant in instances where an individual would be unable to attend college without the credit. Typically, these persons are to be found in the middle class, where they are regarded as too affluent for federal or state scholarship aid.

One of the most far-reaching and significant aspects of the proposed legislation is that this policy would encourage a freedom of choice. Senator Moynihan has correctly reminded us that "as the 'tuition gap' between public and private colleges has widened, the proportion of college students choosing private compuses has shrunk: from 50 percent in the 1950's to less than 25 percent today." The ever-expanding space between the cost of a private college and a school subsidized by the government, has meant that the freedom of choice and opportunity has been denied to many persons as to where they will pursue their educational ambitions.

As rising costs and decreasing enrollments force more and more private institutions to close their doors, the diversity of choice, and indeed freedom of choice is similarly reduced. Again, I would agree with Senator Moynihan's assessment that "diversity and pluralism are values too, and perhaps nowhere more valuable than in the experiences that our children have in their early years, when their beliefs and attitudes are formed, their minds awakened and their friendships formed . . . I do not believe it excessive to ask that they be embodied in our national policies for the betterment of American education." A society that wishes to remain forever free must concern itself with the proper development of its succeeding generation and allow them their own freedom of choice and will for the determination of their own future.

We believe that the tuition tax credit will help promote the kind of diversity and pluralism which have marked the United States for greatness. We sincerely think that it is essential for the individual to have such choices available in decisions of educational pursuits so that he is not relegated, by economic necessity to one alternative.

Mr. Chairman and honorable members of this committee we are convinced that a situation approaches rapidly where only the very affluent and the very poor will be able to attend college, and we are convinced that action must be taken to ease the financial plight of the middle-income families.

In the words of the late distinguished Senator Humphrey, "a college education has become almost a necessity for children to have opportunities." As a representative of the student community in the state of Michigan, I see the tuition tax credit as an outstanding example of progressive legislation aimed at attaining a high level of excellence in education for many who would not otherwise be participants. The opportunities spoken of by Senator Humphrey can, in fact be realized; but not without your help. I respectfully urge your support for the Tuition Tax Credit Act.

Thank you for your time and patience.●

COMMEMORATING THE 60TH ANNIVERSARY OF BYELORUSSIAN INDEPENDENCE

● Mr. STONE. Mr. President, on March 25, 1918, the people of Byelorussia proclaimed the founding of the Byelorussian Democratic Republic. Today, 60 years later, despite the short lifespan of the republic, this day is celebrated as Independence Day by the Byelorussian-Americans. They are to be congratulated for their continuing belief in that democratic ideal and supported in their struggle to regain the loss of human rights suffered by the Byelorussian people. As a member of the CSCE, I commend them for their efforts and associate myself with their goals.●

COMMUNITY SCHOOLS AND COMPREHENSIVE COMMUNITY EDUCATION ACT OF 1978

● Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I have requested that my distinguished colleague, Senator FRANK CHURCH, be added as a cosponsor to S. 2711, the Community Schools and Comprehensive Community Education Act of 1978.

Senator CHURCH was the first cosponsor of the Community Schools Act of 1974. He has been a devoted supporter of the use of schools for multiple community purposes. His own home State, the great State of Idaho, has been a leader in making its schools accepted leaders in the delivery of community services.

Senator CHURCH's support of this bill is testimony as well to the strong bridge capable of being built between schools and services to our older Americans. As the dedicated chairman of the Senate's Select Committee on Aging, Senator CHURCH has improved the quality of life for all our older citizens. In linking programs for older Americans through the schools, we can look forward to even greater satisfactions for the elderly as well as productivity spanning the generations for our educational agencies.●

F. NORDY HOFFMANN INDUCTED INTO COLLEGE FOOTBALL HALL OF FAME

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I should call to the attention of the Senate today the fact that one of its most important employees has recently been notified of a most distinguished honor.

I speak, of course, of Mr. Nordy Hoffmann, our Sergeant at Arms, and the fact that he was informed earlier this month of his impending induction into the National Football Foundation's College Football Hall of Fame. Every Member of the Senate takes great personal pride in Nordy's recognition, I am sure, because every Member of this body wrote letters in Nordy's behalf several weeks ago when the selection committee was considering its nominations. We were joned by President Carter, Vice President MONDALE and former President Gerald Ford.

On December 5, 1978, at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York, Nordy will join Bobby Davis of Georgia Tech, Dr. Daniel Fortmann of Colgate, Gen. Jabo Jablonski of West Point, Ron Kramer of Michigan, Buster Ramsey of William and Mary, Frank Sundstrom of Cornell, and Bill Wallace of Rice as the newest inductees into the hall of fame.

That is certainly the cream of the college football crop, and each of the inductees represents a remarkable story, but in many ways Nordy represents the most remarkable story of all.

The story is told that shortly after entering the University of Notre Dame in 1927, Nordy was walking across the campus one day with his roommate, Tom Yarr, who was a football player. They encountered the legendary Knute Rockne, the Notre Dame football coach, who took one look at the 6-foot-2, 230-pound Hoffmann and inquired why he was not out for freshman football.

Nordy had gone to prep school in Seattle, a school which did not have a football team. He had never played organized football, and so he told Rockne this. Rockne told Nordy to report to the practice field at 2 o'clock that day and they would teach him the game. Nordy, probably not unmindful of who he was dealing with, reported as ordered.

It is remarkable in itself that Nordy learned football well enough to play guard on Rockne's great championship teams of 1930 and 1931. But it is astonishing that he learned the game well enough to be an All-American in the process.

This is akin, for the tennis players in our midst, to Jimmy Conners picking up a tennis racket at the age of 18 and winning Wimbledon at the age of 20. And for the golfers, if you will, it is like Jack Nicklaus getting his first set of clubs one year and winning the Masters the next.

Nordy went on to a distinguished academic record as well, finishing Notre Dame Law School in 1933, and went on to coach at his alma mater after graduation.

I do not know to what extent Nordy's coaching or his example as a player has influenced the "Fighting Irish" on the football player in more recent years, but I can attest to the fact that Notre Dame has come to my home State on two occasions to play football—once against the University of South Carolina, once against Clemson. Both times, my teams were on the verge of winning when an Irish player pulled off a spectacular play to snatch victory from defeat. I am sure several of my colleagues can commiserate.

In any event, I am extremely happy for Nordy Hoffmann today. He has been a good friend, a valuable ally, an outstanding and tireless worker for the U.S. Senate. He is deserving of this high honor, and I know the Members of this body join with me in congratulating him for his spendid accomplishments both on the football field and in a very noteworthy career in the service of his country.

Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that the letter confirming Nordy's induction into the Hall of Fame, which he received only today, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NATIONAL FOOTBALL FOUNDATION AND HALL OF FAME, INC.,
New York, N.Y., March 13, 1978.

Mr. FRANK HOFFMANN,
Sergeant-at-Arms,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR NORDY: As Chairman of the Honors Court of the National Football Foundation, I have the honor of notifying you that you have been elected to the National Football Foundation's Hall of Fame.

This is the greatest honor that can come to a former player or cocah. The story will be released to the newspapers in a short time, and I ask that you withhold the information until it is released later this month.

The 21st annual dinner will be held on December 5, 1978 in New York at the Waldorf-Astoria. The Foundation's Executive Director, Jimmie McDowell, will contact you soon regarding the program.

Traditionally, the Hall of Fame electees arrive in New York on Sunday afternoon and depart on Wednesday morning.

Sincerely,

FRED RUSSELL,
Chairman, Honors Court.

BAYH SALUTES NORDY HOFFMAN UPON HIS SELECTION TO COLLEGE FOOTBALL HALL OF FAME

Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, I was pleased to note that Mr. Francis Nordhoff Hoffman, the Senate's respected and efficient Sergeant at Arms, was elected to the National Football Foundation's College Football Hall of Fame. Those of us who serve in the Senate and work with Nordy have long recognized his capabilities in fulfilling his duties here and are heartened that the Football Foundation has seen fit to bestow on him this honor which recognizes his distinguished football career.

Nordy's membership in the Hall of Fame is particularly pleasing to me because he played his college football at Notre Dame, one of my State's great institutions of higher learning. Not only did he play football at Notre Dame, but he also has the distinction of having been an All American guard on Knute Rockne's 1930–31 championship team. As anyone who has spent some time at Notre Dame would know, such credentials cannot be improved upon.

Mr. President, Nordy's illustrious college football career marked the beginning of an active and successful life. He was a leader in the United Steelworkers Union, a Navy lieutenant in World War II and a Sergeant at Arms at both the 1960 and 1964 Democratic National Conventions. He also served as director of the Senate Democratic Campaign Committee, and today of course he fulfills the demanding duties of the Senate Sergeant at Arms with a staff of well over a thousand people. As we all know one of Nordy's duties is to arrest absentee Senators if we find it necessary to raise a quorum. At 6 feet 2 inches and 280 pounds it is not surprising that our ex Notre Dame guard has not had to resort to such extremes during his term of office.

Mr. President, I ask that the Senate join in congratulating Nordy Hoffmann on his most recent honor. It is fitting indeed that it comes at a time when Notre Dame has again captured the national football championship. I am sure that his old coach would be proud of Nordy and of this year's team, as we all are.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I wish to join in the words of the distinguished Senator from Indiana. I want to say that the fame of Nordy Hoffmann is bipartisan. He was not only an outstanding football player but he has demonstrated to the Senate, as one of its principal officers, that he is able and fair, that he is a very competent Sergeant at Arms. I think this is a fine tribute that he is being recognized. It brings honor and glory not only to the University of Notre Dame and the State of Indiana but to the U.S. Senate.

INFLATION AND G. WILLIAM MILLER

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I rise to commend the new Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board.

In an interview with a small group of reporters, the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, G. William Miller, has issued a timely warning about the dangers of inflation.

The interview was reported in a story by Richard J. Levine published in today's edition of the Wall Street Journal.

Mr. Miller warned that a continuation of high inflation would be most dangerous for the economy and stated that "tighter monetary restraints" will be needed if the inflation rate does not moderate.

The Fed Chairman also said that "Inflation in my view does result in higher interest rates."

He added that the President has under consideration a series of anti-inflation steps.

Among possible remedies, Mr. Miller specifically ruled out wage and price controls but specifically included cutting Federal spending.

All of this is most welcome.

Chairman Miller's perception of the need to combat inflation, as I see it, is right on target.

I especially commend Mr. Miller for the incusion of a reduction of Federal spending as a step against inflation. In my opinion, there will be no progress against inflation unless and until the Federal Government reduces its spending.

It is useless for the Government to expect discipline in pricing and restraint in wage demands in the private sector so long as the Government itself is spending as though there were no tomorrow.

And that is what the Government is doing.

According to the administration's latest figures, the Government will spend $454 billion this fiscal year and $500 billion in fiscal 1979. Thus Federal spending will go up by 10 percent from this year to next.

The deficit for the current year is estimated at $53 billion, and this figure will go up to $60 billion next year.

Unless this kind of deficit spending is brought under control, there will be no real progress in the fight against inflation.

I commend Chairman Miller for his forthright statement, and I urge that the President and the Congress start now to curb spending and thereby combat inflation.

The fact is that we will not get the cost of living under control until we get the cost of Government under control.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of Mr. Levine's article in the Wall Street Journal, together with a table I have prepared showing unified budget receipts, outlays and deficits from 1958 through 1959, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article and table were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MILLER WARNS CONTINUING HIGH INFLATION WILL MAKE FED TIGHTEN MONETARY POLICY

(By Richard J. Levine)

WASHINGTON.—Chairman William Miller of the Federal Reserve Board warned that a continuation of high inflation will force the central bank to tighten monetary policy.

In an interview with a small group of reporters, the new Fed boss said that "if inflation moves ahead," there will be pressures on the Fed "that will result in tighter monetary restraints."

He added that "failing to take restraint will make the problem worse" and the nation would then be headed "for a serious recession."

"Inflation in my view does result in higher interest rates," Mr. Miller said, adding that long-term interest rates "are likely to drift upward" this year.

Although he stressed once again his deep concern about the recent acceleration in inflation, Mr. Miller said he has been relieved to find within the top reaches of the Carter administration "rather uniform awareness of this danger of inflation and a willingness to give it a higher priority."

CARTER CONSIDERS POSSIBILITIES

President Carter, the Fed chairman said, "is considering a whole series of possibilities" to bolster his anti-inflation program, announced in January.

In the absence of widespread cooperation from the private sector to curb inflation, Mr. Miller said, "some harsher things" might be required. But the chairman said, "I think the private sector will cooperate" with the President's program.

Under questioning, Mr. Miller nevertheless listed some possible "harsher" measures. After ruling out wage-price controls, which both he and President Carter repeatedly have said they oppose, the Fed chairman noted that the government could move to cut federal spending sharply in areas that might prove unpopular and that it could lift or ease import restrictions that currently protect U.S. industry. "If industries won't cooperate, maybe we have to give them some competition," he said without elaboration.

In discussing monetary policy, Mr. Miller noted that the Fed has slowed the money-supply growth in recent months. "I hope it won't be necessary to go much further," he said, because additional tightening could limit the availability of money for home mortgages and for business capital investment. His "preference," he stressed, is to fight inflation with tools other than monetary policy.

Mr. Miller, who replaced Arthur Burns as Federal Reserve Board chairman on March 8, said that his "communication links so far" with the Carter administration "have been very good ones." Administration officials say that he and Treasury Secretary Michael Blumenthal have developed a close relationship and see each other frequently.

PROGRESS ON EMPLOYMENT SEEN

Asked whether he has changed his focus from fighting unemployment to fighting inflation since being selected last December, Mr. Miller responded by saying: "We're making excellent progress on the employment front. . . . Inflation, however, is off-plan. So I've been saying let's give priority to the one off-plan." That, he said, was simply good management.

During the hour-long interview yesterday afternoon, Mr. Miller placed heavy emphasis on the need to establish an energy policy—by legislation, presidential action or a combination of both. As he did last week in testimony before the Senate Budget Committee, Mr. Miller said an energy program was required to halt the decline in the value of the dollar, which is itself adding to domestic inflation.

Whatever energy measures emerge, Mr. Miller said, they should be viewed as "a step on a long journey to a whole new energy system in the U.S., which will take a decade" to put in place.

EMERGENCY AGRICULTURAL ACT OF 1978

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, on Tuesday of this week the Senate passed the Emergency Agricultural Act of 1978 to help farmers through the financial squeeze they are presently facing. The day after the Senate passed this farm bill, I met with leading members of the Land of Lincoln Soybean Growers Association of which I, too, am a member. They simply cannot understand the rationale for including a set-aside program for soybeans in the bill when neither they nor the American Soybean Association want such a program.

As a U.S. Senator from Illinois, the Nation's leading soybean producing State, and owning with Ms. Percy several bean and corn farms in Illinois and Iowa, I also must question the rationale for including a soybean set-aside program in the bill.

Soybean producers are concerned that if we set aside soybean acreage next year we might not produce enough soybeans to meet the increasing world demand. Furthermore, in the last few weeks soybeans have jumped from $5.50 per bushel to almost $7 per bushel. I think the Secretary of Agriculture will agree that with a $7 market price for soybeans, coupled with the prospect of increased exports due to the poor soybean crop in Brazil, we do not need a soybean acreage set-aside program this year.

The American soybean farmer is a competitive, efficient producer. He has achieved this enviable position through competing fairly in the free market system and with a minimal amount of Government assistance. Why should we interfere with the success of the soybean producer by forcing him to set aside soybean acreage? We would only be punishing the producer who has demonstrated to us that he can survive under the worst possible conditions.

Mr. President, I strongly urge the Senate and House conferees to strike the soybean set-aside provisions from the emergency farm bill when it comes before the conference committee.

I would like to express to my colleagues in the Senate another issue that has deeply concerned me recently—increased Government intervention in farm programs.

Farm legislation in the 1960's was designed to inhibit surplus production and provide price support for specific commodities through Government regulation. Fortunately, in the 1970's, agricultural policy turned to expansion of both domestic and foreign markets, and to decreasing Government intervention while protecting farm income. As a result of the farm program in the 1970's, U.S. food exports quickly surged from $7.7 billion in 1971 to $18 billion in 1974, to $22 billion in 1975, and finally to $24 billion in 1977. That is over a 300-percent increase in 6 years.

The United States now accounts for nearly 50 percent of all food in international trade and out of 150 U.N. member nations is one of only 6 countries having a net export food balance. Clearly, the United States is the dominant power in the world food market and is now highly dependent upon a continued level of high export activity to support domestic prosperity in both farm and nonfarm sectors.

Our increased agricultural exports have helped offset the rapidly rising costs of our oil imports. If we are to continue importing oil to run our cars, heat our homes, and operate our factories, we must continue to increase our agricultural exports.

Mr. President, it is my philosophy that the best way to improve producer income is by creating and expanding foreign demand. We have the ability to do just that. If we can increase our farm exports 300 percent in 6 short years, I do not see why we cannot double our farm exports—from $24 billion to $50 billion—in the next 5 years. In fact, I urge the U.S. Department of Agriculture and others to set as their farm export goal $50 billion in the next 5 years.

If we actively begin working toward that goal right now, the Government would not need to set aside any crop acreage in the future. Farmers can make decisions on the farm and not have them made for them in Washington. We could decrease Government intervention in farm programs, and once again let the American producer be a competitive, efficient farmer in a free market system.

SENATOR MAGNUSON

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, as a student of the "Warren G. Magnuson Academy of Public Administration," I was interested to hear the remarks of a graduate, Michael Pertschuk, the Chairman of the FTC. These remarks are most appropriate, well deserved, and I commend them to the attention of my colleagues. Needless to say, this is one academy from which I hope I never graduate. I continue to learn each day some worthy lesson from the senior Senator of Washington.

I ask unanimous consent that these remarks be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WARREN G. MAGNUSON ACADEMY OF PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

(Remarks of Michael Pertschuk, Chairman, Federal Trade Commission before National Association of Retail Druggists, March 22, 1978)

You have done me a triple honor.

First to invite me as your luncheon guest. Second, to let me follow in the deep footsteps of Hubert Humphrey, who told us that "small is beautiful" long before the rediscovery of our roots brought that realization into our popular culture.

And finally, you've allowed me to fill in for Warren Magnuson, whose characteristic modesty made him insist that I had more to tell you than he does.

Well today I do, because today I'm going to talk to you about the Warren G. Magnuson Academy of Public Administration.

This is the first time in 15 years I've had a chance to talk back to the Chairman in public without interruption and I don't intend to miss this opportunity.

It was just about a year ago that Senator Magnuson kicked me out of the nest, and if the FTC hasn't yet sunk beneath the waves, it's in large part because some of the lessons learned in 13 years of apprenticeship in the Magnuson school have finally begun to sink in.

There's no curriculum and there's no text. It isn't political science, although the political scientists can learn a lot from it, and it isn't law although it embodies a profound respect for the law and the constitution.

It isn't psychology or sociology or anthropology, although the behavioral scientists could learn a lot about the well springs of human behavior by watching Senator Magnuson gently pick the pockets of a whole room full of case-hardened Congressmen in a conference in pursuit of a project dear to the hearts of the State of Washington.

It's not a course in English literature; sometimes the language is rough and ready (although the Magnuson consumer book, Dark Side of the Marketplace, is the only book I know of written by a serving Senator which has become a standard text in college courses).

No, its lessons are about intangibles: wisdom and fairness, openness and patience; the acceptance of change; calm in the midst of frenzy; human warmth and humor.

The first principles are fairness and openness. There never has been a Magnuson enemies' list, and the Magnuson "friends' list" if it were ever reduced to print would dwarf the New York telephone book. But Democrat or Republican, liberal or conservative, each gets a fair hearing.

"All anybody ever wants is a fair advantage". What each one gets is a fair hearing—and no more.

Staff will tell him; "don't see those guys, they'll just take advantage of you. They'll ask for a hearing, then they'll come up with the same story line they've been peddling for years. They just want to delay."

"Never mind", says Magnuson. "Give them a hearing. First, they have a right to be heard. Second, if you don't give them a hearing you've given them another issue. Third, you don't know everything, you just might learn something."

Listening, incidentally, does not mean suffering ignorance and prejudice in silence. The Chairman is not above calling nonsense nonsense even to a constituent puffed up with his own self-importance.

The FTC is a collegial body, like the Commerce Committee. All basic policy directives flow from collective determinations. And we've all seen Chairman trip over an inhospitable committee or commission majority on their way to glory—but not Magnuson. For all the time he served as Chairman of the Commerce Committee—26 years—he held the respect and affection of his members, including the most junior. With their support, he got the job done.

Again he followed the basics: "don't push your weight around; treat your colleagues with respect and patience; recognize that they are not impediments to what you want to do but they are there to be heard and to participate, and when you're right, they'll be with you."

Then, of course, there's staff; the bureaucracy: both the blessing and the curse of government. I think I disclose no secrets when I tell you that there was one product of the Nixon White House that Warren Magnuson appropriated shamelessly for himself. A fellow named Haldeman, who worked there once upon a time, gave a speech at the height of his powers denouncing congressional staff as "bumblebees" who hovered around the honey of power, unelected, unaccountable; flitting from wilting flower to wilting flower, as the mantle of elective office passed from hand to hand.

The Chairman (who once looked me in the eye and said with a smile: "you've got more games going than a three-armed slot machine player in Las Vegas") established the "Bumblebee of the Week" award to be given to that staff member who went off on a frolic and detour of his own, announcing policy or otherwise assuming authority for making decisions which were not his to make. In fact, Mrs. Magnuson even embroidered a pillow with a bumblebee on it.

Perhaps this tells you something about the good humored but sure hand with which the Chairman reined in his troops.

He understands that a policy-maker in today's complex and difficult world cannot settle for second best in his own staff. So he reaches out for qualified professionals—people with spirit. He encourages them to take the initiative and to develop innovative solutions. But every bright idea is subjected to the same testing as high-tempered steel (the same test I've tried to apply to every new proposal that the Commission staff brings before us).

First, Magnuson knows that the temptation of a legislator or legislative aide is to pass new laws (just as the temptation of a regulator is to regulate). So he asks some hard questions. First, what's the problem? If there's no problem, we don't need a law to solve it.

He also told us that when it comes to regulation, there's no such thing as a free lunch. Somebody pays. So if you're trying to cure a monopolistic practice or a consumer fraud, make sure that your solution is paid for out of monopoly profits or fraudulent gains, not indirectly out of the consumer's pocket.

Before he would put his name to a bill, we had to convince him that the world would be better off when all the effects were totalled than it would have been if we did nothing.

Next he'd say, "if there's a less burdensome way to get the job done, let's find it. But if you have to regulate, make it simple and clear.

For example, the original version of a proposed FTC rule on Hearings Aids contained the following definition:

"Hearing Aid: Any wearable instrument or device designed for, offered for the purpose of, or represented as aiding persons with or compensating for impaired hearing."

With the help of our readability consultants, we came up with a definition of Magnusonian directness:

"Hearing Aids are instruments worn to improve one's hearing".

"Zero in on the problem," he'd say. "Do what has to be done to cure that problem and no more. Don't overkill".

We're trying to apply that learning at the FTC. The Commission is just putting the finishing touches on a rule designed to curb abuses by vocational schools. The problem is a familiar and serious one—poorly educated and job hungry students are pressured into signing long term contracts obligating them to pay as much as $1,000 to $1,500. A few days later they discover either that the courses are not what they have been led to expect, or that they lack the qualifications to handle the courses or that there are no jobs, no real jobs waiting at the end of the line. So they quit. For many of the schools that's just fine because they can continue to collect on the contract.

The Commission staff proposed an intricate set of rules to govern the signing up of vocational school students, including a series of prescribed disclosures and restrictions on discussions between the school and the student. This would have placed substantial burdens on all of the schools—including those who have been careful and conscientious in their sales methods. It would also have been difficult for the Commission to enforce.

Instead the Commission zeroed in on a single self-enforcing remedy which would cure 90% of the problem: to require schools to give a pro-rata refund to any student who quits for whatever reason. Not only will this prevent unwary consumers frrom losing substantial amounts of money which they can ill-afford but it provides an incentive to the schools to make the courses worthwhile and to keep the students coming.

Magnuson always felt the best solution to a consumer problem was one in which the industry cleaned up it's own act. He recognizes, of course, that "voluntary" self-regulation is most often hard headed reaction to the threat of government intervention. If voluntary efforts fail to do the job, then the regulatory agencies such as the FTC should be "'a pike in a carp pond"; aggressive enough to keep those sluggish fish moving—but not to devour them." That's competition.

Finally, Senator Magnuson taught us to distrust excessive bigness, excessive concentrations of economic or political power, whether in business or in government. Like Hubert Humphrey, he understands in his bones the virtues of human scale and independent enterprise, the community values of local ownership. That's why the voter's of Washington know him as the man who "keeps the big boys honest."

Magnuson is not particularly fond of big shots, corporate executives or cabinet secretaries who travel magisterially in a swarm of staff. In fact, the big shot paying a visit is likely to cool his heels for awhile, though he'll get his hearing eventually, while the Chairman hears out a George Benson from Seattle, and maybe a few minutes more to catch up on the salmon runs in Puget Sound. After all, the company President and his lobbyists can afford to come to Washington when they need to. But for the small businessmen or the citizen with a problem, it's now or never.

The hardest questions he would ask us are: "What are the burdens going to be on small business? I don't care about General Motors or Exxon, how much is this going to cost George Becker, John Early or any small businessmen struggling to earn a decent living for himself or his family?"

The Chairman has got a couple of favorite stories and one of them is my favorite. It's about the coach of a bush league baseball team, whose right fielder—with two left feet and astigmatism—missed three easy fly balls in a row. In disgust the manager yanks the player and without a substitute on the bench decides in desperation to play right field himself.

He takes the field the next inning. Lo and behold, the first ball hit is a soft fly ball right to where he's standing. He looks up, is blinded by the sun, and drops the ball. The other players are chuckling to themselves on the bench, when the manager stomps in off the field at the end of the inning. He flings his glove in the dugout, turns to the ousted player and growls: "You've got right field so fouled up, nobody can play it."

Warren Magnuson understands that the role of government in the marketplace is to see that business serves the consumer. This means strong enforcement of the antitrust laws and appropriate action to ferret out fraud and deception and overreaching.

Linda Blumkin talked to you yesterday about some of the programs we have that affect your own operations. I need not repeat them here. A number of the programs and projects at the Commission will impact directly or indirectly on your work, but I want you to know that we are following the wisdom of Senator Magnuson.

We intend to approach each and every issue effecting your business as well as any other from the same perspective. That means we are going to be absolutely certain we don't get right field so fouled up that nobody can play it.

INDIAN PROGRAM EVALUATION AND NEEDS ASSESSMENT ACT

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, on behalf of Mr. ABOUREZK, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill, S. 2712, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

S. 2712

A bill relating to the evaluation and assessment of Indian programs and needs, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Indian Program Evaluation and Needs Assessment Act".

FINDINGS

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress, after careful review of the data and information available to the Congress and the Federal agencies, finds that—

(1) there is inadequate information available to the Congress to enable appropriate committees to conduct effective oversight of the programs and Federal agencies dealing with Indian affairs;

(2) The Federal agencies have not developed the reporting mechanisms and data necessary to determine the needs of Indians and Alaska Natives; and

(3) The lack of information relative to the programs and the Federal agencies dealing with Indian affairs has severely hampered the Congress in its evaluation of the effectiveness of the programs, the effectiveness and efficiency of the Federal agencies administering the programs, the adequacy of interagency coordination of programs, and the determination of whether the actual needs of Indians are being met and whether the Federal Government is meeting its trust responsibility to Indians.

(b) The Congress further finds that—

(1) Indian people, on the average have ranked and continue to rank among the highest in infant mortality rate, the lowest in longevity rate, the lowest in level of educational attaintment, the lowest in per capita income, and the poorest in housing and transportation in the United States.

(2) The continuance of these conditions is due in part to the Federal Government's inability to identify and evaluate the needs of Indian people and to coordinate and effectively administer programs for the benefit of Indians.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. For purposes of this Act, the term—

(a) "Indian" shall be defined pursuant to the Act or Acts, and/or regulations or practices by which the respective Federal agencies determine service eligibility of Indians for the programs and services which they administer.

(b) "Indian tribe" means—

(1) Any Indian tribe, band, nation, pueblo or other organized group or community, including Alaska Native villages as defined in the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act, which is recognized as being eligible for the special programs and services provided by the Bureau of Indian Affairs to Indians because of their status as Indians; and

(2) Any Indian tribe, band, nation or pueblo which does not qualify as an Indian tribe under subsection (b)(1) above, but which is defined as an Indian tribe pursuant to the Act or Acts, and/or regulations or practices by which Federal agencies, other than the Bureau of Indian Affairs, determine eligibility of Indian tribes for the programs and services which they administer.

(c) "Tribal organization" means the recognized governing body of any Indian tribe and any legally established organization of Indians performing governmental functions which is controlled, sanctioned, or chartered by such tribal governing body, or which is democratically elected by the adult members of the tribal community to be served by such organization and which includes participation of Indians in all phases of its activities.

(d) "Non-tribal Indian organization" means any group, association, partnership, corporation, or other legal entity owned or controlled by Indians or a majority of those members are Indian, whose function is other than economic enterprise for profit and which does not constitute a tribe or tribal organization.

(e) "Indian economic enterprise" means any Indian owned commercial, industrial, or business activity established or organized for the purpose of profit as defined as section 3(e) of the Act of April 12, 1974 (88 Stat. 77, 25 U.S.C. § 1452(e)).

(f) "Non-Indian organization" means any public or private group, association, partnership, corporation, or other legal entity which is not owned or controlled by Indians or a majority of whose members are not Indian, which has received a Federal grant or contract to perform services or engage in other activity specifically to or for the benefit of Indians.

(g) "Federal agency" means any agency as defined by section 551(1) of title 5, United States Code;

(h) "Direct services" means any program or service provided to Indians other than contracts, grants, loans or other transfer of money or property which is directly administered by or performed by the personnel of a Federal agency, without involvement of any State government, political subdivision thereof or any non-Indian organization.

(i) "Indirect services" means any program or service provided to Indians other than contracts, grants, loans, or other transfer of money or property which is directly administered by or performed by the personnel of a Federal agency, which does involve utilization of personnel or administrative structures of State governments, political subdivisions or agencies thereof, or non-Indian organizations.

(j) "Direct funding" means any contract, grant, revenue sharing, loan or other transfer of money or property from the administering Federal agency to the tribe, tribal organization, non-tribal Indian organization or Indian economic enterprise without involvement of a State government, political subdivision thereof, or non-Indian organization.

(k) "Indirect funding" means any contract, grant, revenue sharing, loan, or other transfer of money or property from the administering Federal agency which does involve State governments, political subdivisions or agencies thereof, or non-Indian organizations in the transfer or in the approval of the transfer of such funds to a tribe, tribal organization, non-tribal Indian organization or Indian economic enterprise.

(l) "Federal domestic assistance program" means any Federal program listed in the Catalog of Federal Domestic Assistance compiled by the Executive Office of the President, Office of Management and Budget, or any other function of a Federal agency which is determined to be such a program by the Federal Interagency Council on Indian Affairs established in Title II of this Act.

TITLE I—PROGRAM EXPENDITURE DATA

SEC. 101. (a) The head of each Federal agency shall develop procedures for compiling, maintaining, keeping current, and reporting to the Congress data and information concerning:

(1) The agency's annual expenditures for programs and services for which Indian tribes, tribal organizations, Indian economic enterprises, or non-tribal Indian organizations are eligible;

(2) Any service or program provided specifically to or for the benefit of Indians whether provided to Indian tribes, tribal organizations, Indian economic enterprises, non-tribal Indian organizations, or individual Indians or funded through non-Indian organizations; and

(3) The agency's method of delivery of services and funding.

(b) The data and information shall identify and include the total annual expenditure of the Federal agency by program provided through:

(1) Direct services;
(2) Indirect services;
(3) Direct funding; and
(4) Indirect funding.

(c) The report of expenditures required in subsection (b) above shall further categorize and separate totals reported for direct and indirect services and for direct and indirect funding respectively provided to—

(1) Each individual tribe and tribal organization and the aggregate amount by State;

(2) Each individual Indian economic enterprise and the aggregate amount by State;

(3) Each individual non-tribal Indian organization and the aggregate amount by State; and

(4) Each individual non-Indian organization and the aggregate amount by State.

AGENCY FISCAL ACCOUNTABILITY

SEC. 102. (a) Each Federal agency or division or program office thereof which administers any program specifically to or for the benefit of Indians or which administers any program for which there is a specific amount allocated or set aside at the beginning of the fiscal year specifically for Indians shall compile and maintain and report to the Congress detailed information on:

(1) The aggregate total dollar amount and percentage of the agency's total appropriations charged to Indian affairs or Indian services which comprise administrative and overhead costs.

(2) For each program appropriation, allocation, or set aside specifically to or for the benefit of Indians, the percentage and dollar amount of each program appropriation allocation or set aside charged to administrative and overhead costs and the percentage and dollar amounts expended for actual services and funding to Indians.

(b) The above data and information shall be stated separately for the agency's central office and each area or regional office, and each local or agency office.

(c) The General Accounting Office shall be responsible for defining, for purposes of this Act, what are administrative and overhead costs and each agency shall be required to apply such definitions in maintaining the above data.

PROGRAM ALLOCATIONS

SEC. 103. (a) With regard to appropriations for programs and services which are not specifically directed to or for the benefit of Indians but for which Indians are eligible for benefits as members of the general populace, the head of each Federal agency shall compile, maintain, and report to the Congress data and information concerning:

(1) the percentage and dollar amount of any program appropriation for which said Federal agency has had a specific percentage or dollar amount designated or set aside specifically for Indians at the beginning of the fiscal year; and

(2) the aggregate amounts and percentage of such set aside(s) specifically allocated at the beginning of the fiscal year to specific Indian tribes, tribal organizations, non-tribal Indian organizations, and Indian reservations and the percentage and dollar amount reserved by the agency for administrative costs and/or discretionary use at a later time; and

(3) the separate dollar amounts so allocated for each individual tribe, tribal organization, non-tribal Indian organization and Indian reservation.

(b) With regard to appropriations for programs and services specifically directed to or for the benefit of Indians, the head of each Federal agency shall provide:

(1) the total dollar amount appropriated for each program;

(2) the percentage and aggregate dollar amount of each program appropriation which was allocated at the beginning of the fiscal year to specific Indian tribes, tribal organizations, non-tribal Indian organizations, and Indian reservations;

(3) the separate dollar amounts of each such program so allocated for each individual Indian tribe, tribal organization, non-tribal Indian organiaztion, and Indian reservation; and

(4) the percentage and dollar amount of any program appropriation based on formulas governing the distribution of funds to Indians.

PROGRAM ELIGIBILITY

SEC. 104. (a) The head of each Federal agency shall, on a five (5) year basis, provide a list of all Federal domestic assistance programs administered by the agency for which any State or any political subdivision thereof is eligible for direct funding or direct services, but for which Indian tribal governments are not eligible for direct funding or direct services. For each program so identified, the agency shall provide citations to the specific statutory or regulatory provisions which prohibit tribal governments' eligibility for direct funding or direct services, or attach copies of those administrative opinions which determined the non-eligibility of Indian tribes.

INDIAN LAND STATUS

SEC. 105. (a) With respect to each Indian reservation, former reservation, dependent Indian community, or other geographic area identified with a particular tribe or tribes being served by the Bureau of Indian Affairs in which Indian trust or restricted land or other trust property is located, the Bureau of Indian Affairs shall provide to the Congress a comprehensive record of the land holdings and use patterns of such trust lands or other trust resources. The record of land holdings and use patterns shall include:

(1) the total acreage within the boundaries of the reservation;

(2) the total acreage of land in trust status, with a breakdown of acreage that is tribally owned, the acreage in trust allotted or restricted fee status, the acreage held by the Federal Government, the acreage held in fee status by Indians who are members of the tribe, the acreage held by non-member Indians or non-Indian individuals and organizations and the acreage held by the State or a subdivision thereof;

(3) the number and total acreage of trust allotments on each reservation which are held in multiple ownership of ten (10) people or more.

(4) the number and total acreage of trust allotments on each reservation which are under lease to other than the tribe or members of the tribe;

(5) the total acreage of tribal trust land and the total acreage of tribal fee land on each reservation which is under lease;

(6) an assessment as to whether the tribal and allotted lands are held in economically viable units taking into consideration both the actual or potential economic utilization by the tribe and the economic and efficient administration by the Government as trustee;

(7) the total acreage of tribal, allotted trust, and restricted fee land which passed out of tribal or Indian ownership during the past fiscal year, and the manner and reason for the conveyances; and

(8) the total acreage of land purchased, being purchased, or otherwise conveyed to members of the Indian tribe or the tribe during the past fiscal year with monetary assistance from the Federal Government, including—

(A) the acreage of such land placed in trust or restricted fee status; and

(B) the Federal program which provided such assistance and the nature of the assistance;

(9) a listing of each Federal program, whether or not it is currently funded, and each authorizing statute which permits the various Federal agencies to assist tribes or tribal members in acquiring land or in purchasing land, and state the dollar amounts which were requested by the respective agencies to be appropriated for each of the programs, if any, and the appropriation actually received.

NEEDS ASSESSMENT

SEC. 106. (a) The head of each Federal agency shall, in coordination with the Interagency Board established in Title II of this Act, develop a needs assessment which will be conducted every five (5) years to determine the actual needs and problems of the respective Indian tribes, tribal organizations, non-tribal organizations, and individual Indian constituency eligible for the programs and services administered or authorized by law to be administered by the agency.

(b) The needs assessment for services and programs which are provided to or for the benefit of Indian tribes and their members, or Indian reservations or Indian organizations as an entity shall be stated for each Indian tribe or each reservation. The needs assessment for services and programs which are provided to non-tribal Indian organizations or for the benefit of individual Indians shall be stated for each State to the extent practical and feasible with identification of the needs of the respective non-tribal Indian organizations. Needs assessments which are not feasible to be stated on a tribal, reservation, or State basis shall be stated for the total service population on a nationwide basis. The needs assessment shall further identify which needs are recurring needs each year and which needs, if met, would not be recurring needs on an annual basis.

(c) A preliminary needs assessment shall be completed by July 30 of each year required and each agency shall immediately advise the respective tribes or other Indian service constituency of the agency's preliminary needs estimates so that they have an adequate opportunity for review and comment. Each Indian tribe or other Indian service constituency may draw up its own needs assessment on all or any of the subject areas encompassed in the agency needs assessment as it relates to its reservation or service population and such needs assessment shall be attached to the agency needs assessment at the request of the Indian tribe or other Indian service constituency and shall be made a part of the report required by this Act.

(d) Each agency head shall submit with the needs assessment the agency's projected funding levels for the coming fiscal years for each tribe or Indian reservation and each State for funding or services provided to non-tribal Indian organizations or individual Indian constituencies for each program administered by the department which could be utilized by the eligible Indian constituency to meet the needs identified. This information shall also state what percentage of the unmet need such projected funding would meet during the coming fiscal year.

TITLE II—FEDERAL INTER-AGENCY COUNCIL ON INDIAN AFFAIRS

SEC. 201. (a) A Federal Inter-Agency Council on Indian Affairs (hereinafter referred to as the "Council") comprised of the head of each agency or his designee is hereby established. The Secretary of the Interior shall serve as Chairman of the Council. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of the Interior may not delegate this authority to other than an Under Secretary or an Assistant Secretary.

(b) The Council shall exercise the following responsibilities:

(1) Coordination in development and conduct of the needs assessment provided for in section 106 of title I, including:

(A) Development of a uniform needs assessment format, including standards to be used in conducting such assessments.

(B) A brief profile of each tribe or other Indian service constituency unit, including but not limited to—

(i) tribal enrollment and service population within each reservation, and outside of each reservation;

(ii) median income;

(iii) percentage of unemployment per year;

(iv) principal occupations;

(v) average life expectancy;

(vi) infant mortality rate;

(vii) leading causes of death;

(viii) educational attainment;

(ix) adequacy of housing; and

(x) adequacy of transportation.

(2) Development of a uniform format for submission of the data and information required from each Federal agency by this Act.

(3) Coordination of Federal policies between agencies concerning the eligibility of Indian tribes for Federal domestic assistance programs, development of adequate and current information dissemination procedures to tribes relative to such programs, recommendations to Congress concerning the need for remedial legislation to facilitate tribal participation in programs which could be of benefit to Indians.

(c) The Council shall assist in the development of interagency agreements, where appropriate, and facilitate funding of Indian projects pursuant to the Joint Funding Simplification Act of 1974 to the greatest extent feasible. The Council shall include in its annual report an identification of all such inter-agency agreements and all joint funding projects which were submitted and those consummated within the past fiscal year.

(d) The data and information to be compiled pursuant to this Act shall be submitted by the head of each Federal agency to the Chairman of the Council on or before October 31 of each year.

(e) The standards to be used in conducting the needs assessment, the needs assessment format, the tribal profile format, and the uniform format for submission of the other data and information required by this Act shall be developed in consultation with, and subject to the approval of, the committees and subcommittees of the Congress which have jurisdiction over Indian affairs.

SEC. 202. This title shall take effect upon the expiration of the sixty-day period following the date of the enactment of this Act.

APPOINTMENT BY THE VICE PRESIDENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, on behalf of the Vice President, appoints the following Senators to attend the Seventh Session of the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea, to be held in Geneva, Switzerland, March 28 to May 12, 1978: The Senator from Washington (Mr. MAGNUSON), the Senator from Maine (Mr. MUSKIE), the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL), the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. MCINTYRE), the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS), the Senator from Alaska (Mr. GRAVEL), the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. CASE), the Senator from New York (Mr. JAVITS), the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER), the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. BROOKE), the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD), and the Senator from Alaska (Mr. STEVENS).

OUTSTANDING EXECUTIVES OF 1978

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, we are all familiar with the fact that Members of Congress and prominent people in the business community are often criticized nowadays, and we do not hear enough about the favorable aspects of what people accomplish and what they have achieved for the country and for their community.

For that reason, I would like to call to the attention of the Senate what I think is a very fine determination by Financial World, a publication that deals with business. Financial World has selected a list of outstanding executives of 1978, and indicated the reason why they think that these people are highly qualified.

These executives were chosen by Financial World's distinguished panel of judges, and I am proud and happy to say that Milwaukee almost made a clean sweep in the machinery area. Of the three people cited, two of them are from Milwaukee. One is Mr. David Scott, who is chairman of Allis-Chalmers, an outstanding company in Milwaukee, and indeed in the country, a company that has had great difficulties in recent years but has now been doing far better under the management of David C. Scott, their chairman. Mr. Scott has not been in Milwaukee for very long, only for a couple of years, but he has won the respect and admiration of the community as well as the business community throughout the country for the marvelous job he has done at Allis-Chalmers.

The second person they cite is William Messinger. He happens to be not only the chairman of Rexnord, Inc., but also my roommate, both at prep school and in college, and except for that unfortunate event in Mr. Messinger's life he has had a great career.

Mr. Messinger has been a Milwaukee native all of his life. He is head of one of the largest corporations in the city and one of the great corporations in the country. Rexnord has been expanding very rapidly. It is an international corporation now. It is growing every year profitably as well as in sales, and Mr. Messinger has given it remarkably fine leadership.

I say this with kind of a heavy heart because Mr. Messinger, among other things, has been the finance chairman of the Republican Party of Wisconsin and did his best to defeat me in the last election. I am glad that in that endeavor he was not successful. He has had an outstanding career.

S. 2810—BANKING AFFILIATES ACT

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I am today introducing legislation at the request of the Federal Reserve Board which is designed to bring the law governing intracorporate dealings between banks and their affiliates up to date.

The legislation, titled the Bank Affiliates Act, tightens current law in some respects, principally by restricting transactions between banks and affiliated REIT's, and lessens restrictions in some other respects, principally transactions between banks affiliated by 80 percent common ownership.

Mr. President, this legislation addresses an area of banking that needs careful analysis. The Fed's proposal will provide the Senate Banking Committee with a good vehicle upon which to hold hearings and take a close look at financial dealings between banks and their affiliates, an area in which there have been some serious abuses in the recent past—particularly concerning REIT's.

I ask unanimous consent that Chairman Burns' letter dated March 7, 1978, recommending the legislation, together with the Federal Reserve's explanation of the proposed legislation be printed in the RECORD, with the text of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill and material were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2810

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SEC. 1. This Act may be cited as the "Banking Affiliates Act."

SEC. 2. Section 23A of the Federal Reserve Act (12 U.S.C. § 371c) is amended to read as follows:

(1) Restrictions on transactions with affiliates.

A member bank and its subsidiaries may engage in any covered transaction (other than the purchase of a low quality asset which is hereby prohibited) with, or for the benefit of, any affiliate only if the transaction is made at fair market value and only if, in the case of any such affiliate, the aggregate amount of covered transactions of the member bank and its subsidiaries will not exceed 10 percent of the capital stock and surplus of the member bank, and only if, in the case of all affiliates, the aggregate amount of covered transactions of the member bank and its subsidiaries will not exceed 20 percent of the capital stock and surplus of the member bank. For the purposes of this section, except in the case of a company that controls the member bank, any transaction with a subsidiary of an affiliate or with a subsidiary of that subsidiary shall be deemed to be a transaction with such affiliate.

(2) Definitions.

The following definitions apply for the purposes of this section:

(a) The term "affiliate" with respect to a member bank means:

(i) any company that controls the member bank and any other company that is controlled by the company that controls the member bank;

(ii) a bank subsidiary of the member bank;

(iii) any company (A) that is controlled directly or indirectly, by trust or otherwise, by or for the benefit of shareholders who beneficially or otherwise control, directly or indirectly, by trust or otherwise, the member bank or any company that controls the member bank; or (B) in which a majority of its directors or trustees constitute a majority of the persons holding any such office with the member bank or any company that controls the member bank;

(iv) any company, including a real estate investment trust, that is sponsored and advised on a contractual basis by the member bank or any subsidiary or affiliate of the member bank; and

(v) any company that the Board determines by regulation or order to have a relationship with the member bank or any subsidiary or affiliate of the member bank, such that judgments by the member bank or its subsidiary, with respect to transactions with such company, may be affected by the relationship to the detriment of the member bank or its subsidiary.

(b) (i) A company or shareholder(s) shall be deemed to have control over another company if:

(A) such company or shareholder(s), directly or indirectly, or acting through one or more other persons owns, controls, or has power to vote 25 percent or more of any class of voting securities of the other company;

(B) such company or shareholder(s) controls in any manner the election of a majority of the directors or trustees of the other company; or

(C) the Board determines, after notice and opportunity for hearing, that such company or shareholder(s), directly or indirectly, exercises a controlling influence over the management or policies of the other company;

(ii) notwithstanding any other provision of this subsection, no company shall be deemed to own or control another company by virtue of its ownership or control of shares in a fiduciary capacity, except as provided in subparagraph (2)(a)(iii) above, but shares shall not be deemed to have been acquired in a fiduciary capacity if the acquiring company has sole discretionary authority to exercise voting rights with respect thereto, or if the acquiring company is a business trust;

(c) the term "subsidiary" with respect to a specified company means a company that is controlled by such specified company;

(d) the term "bank" means any institution organized under the laws of the United States, any State of the United States, the District of Columbia, any territory of the United States, Puerto Rico, Guam, American Samoa, or the Virgin Islands which (1) accepts deposits that the depositor has a legal right to withdraw on demand, and (2) engages in the business of making commercial loans. Such term does not include any company operating under section 25 or section 25(a) of the Federal Reserve Act, or any company which does not do business within the United States except as an incident to its activities outside the United States;

(e) the term "company" means a corporation, partnership, business trust, association or similar organization. Unless specifically excluded, the term "company" includes a "member bank" and a "bank";

(f) the term "covered transaction" means with respect to an affiliate of a member bank:

(i) a loan or extension of credit to the affiliate;

(ii) a purchase of or investment in securities of the affiliate;

(iii) a purchase of assets, including assets subject to an agreement to repurchase, from the affiliate;

(iv) the acceptance of securities of the affiliate as collateral security for a loan or extension of credit to any person or company; or

(v) the issuance of an acceptance, guarantee, or letter of credit, including an endorsement or standby letter of credit, to, on behalf of, or for the benefit of an affiliate;

(g) the term "aggregate amount of covered transactions" means the amount of the covered transactions about to be engaged in added to the current amount of all outstanding covered transactions;

(h) the term "securities" means stocks, bonds, debentures, notes, or other similar obligations;

(i) the term "low quality asset" means an asset that falls in any one or more of the following categories:

(i) an asset classified as "substandard", "doubtful", or "loss" or treated as "other loans especially mentioned" in the most recent report of examination prepared by either a Federal or State supervisory agency, or

(ii) an asset carried by the bank in a non-accrual status, or

(iii) an asset on which principal or interest payments are more than 30 days past due, or

(iv) an asset whose terms have been renegotiated or compromised due to the financial condition of the obligor.

(3) Exemptions.

The provisions of this section shall not be applicable to:

(a) any company, other than a bank, that is a subsidiary of the member bank;

(b) any company engaged solely in holding the premises of the member bank with which it is affiliated;

(c) any company engaged solely in conducting a safe deposit business;

(d) any company engaged solely in holding obligations of the United States or its agencies or obligations fully guaranteed by the United States or its agencies as to principal and interest;

(e) any affiliate relationship that has arisen out of a bona fide debt contracted prior to the creation of such relationship, but only for the period of time specifically authorized under applicable State or Federal law or regulation or in the absence of such law or regulation for a period of two years from the date of the creation of the affiliate relationship or the effective date of this Act, whichever date is later, subject, upon application for good cause shown, to authorization by the Board for extensions of time for not more than one year at a time, but such extensions in the aggregate shall not exceed three years;

(f) except for the purchase of a low quality asset, any transaction with a bank

(i) that controls 80 percent or more of the voting shares of the member bank;

(ii) in which the member bank controls 80 percent or more of the voting shares; or

(iii) in which 80 percent or more of the voting shares are controlled by the company that controls 80 percent or more of the voting shares of the member bank;

(g) making non-interest bearing deposits in an affiliated bank;

(h) giving immediate credit to an affiliated bank for uncollected items received in the ordinary course of business;

(i) making any loan or extension of credit to any affiliate that is fully secured by obligations of the United States or its agencies or obligations fully guaranteed by the United States or its agencies as to principal and interest;

(j) purchasing securities of any company of the kinds described in section 4(c)(1) of the Bank Holding Company Act of 1956, as amended; and

(k) purchasing assets having a readily identifiable and publicly available market quotation and purchased at that market quotation.

(4) Security for certain transactions with affiliates.

(a) Each loan or extension of credit to, or guarantee, acceptance, or letter of credit issued to, on behalf of, or for the benefit of, an affiliate shall be secured at the time of the transaction by collateral having a market value equal to (i) 100 percent of the amount of such loan or extension of credit, guarantee, acceptance, or letter of credit if the collateral is composed of obligations of the United States or its agencies or obligations fully guaranteed by the United States or its agencies as to principal and interest, or notes, drafts, bills of exchange or bankers' acceptances that are eligible for rediscount or purchase by the Federal Reserve banks; (ii) 110 percent of the amount of such loan or extension of credit, guarantee, acceptance, or letter of credit if the collateral is composed of obligations of any State or political subdivision of any State, (iii) 120 percent of the amount of such loan or extension of credit, guarantee, acceptance, or letter of credit if the collateral is composed of other debt instruments, including receivables, or (iv) 130 percent of the amount of such loan or extension of credit, guarantee, acceptance, or letter of credit if the collateral is composed of stock, leases or other real or personal property.

(b) Any such collateral that is subsequently retired or amortized shall be replaced by additional eligible collateral where needed to keep the percentage of the collateral value relative to the amount of the outstanding loan or extension of credit, guaranteed, acceptance, or letter of credit equal to the minimum percentage required at the inception of the transaction;

(c) A low quality asset shall not be acceptable as collateral.

(d) The securities of an affiliate of the member bank shall not be acceptable as collateral for a loan or extension of credit to, or guarantee, acceptance, or letter of credit issued to, on behalf of, or for the benefit of, that affiliate or any other affiliate of the member bank.

(e) The collateral requirements of this paragraph shall not be applicable to an acceptance that is already fully secured either by attached documents or by other property having an ascertainable market value that is involved in the transaction.

(5) Rulemaking and additional exemptions.

(a) The Board may prescribe by regulation or order, limitations or other requirements as to any transactions with any company in which the member bank or a bank affiliate of the member bank owns, directly or indirectly, a minority equity interest other than in a fiduciary capacity, and may issue such further regulations and orders, including definitions consistent with this section, as may be necessary to administer and carry out the purposes of this section and to prevent evasions thereof.

(b) The board may, in its discretion, by regulation or order exempt transaction or relationships from the requirements of this section if it finds such exemptions to be in the public interest and consistent with the purposes of this section.

SEC. 3. The provisions of this Act are applicable to transactions entered into after its effective date, except for transactions that are the subject of a binding written contract or commitment entered into on or before (date of introduction of the bill).

SEC. 4. Section 18(j) of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act (12 U.S.C. § 1828(j)) is amended by striking out the words ", within the meaning of section 2 of the Banking Act of 1933, as amended, and".

SEC. 5. The effective date of this Act shall be the date of enactment.

WASHINGTON, D.C.
March 7, 1978.

Hon. WILLIAM PROXMIRE,
Chairman, Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In your letter of June 2, 1976, you asked the Board to study the need for legislative changes to Section 23A of the Federal Reserve Act. This statute places quantitative limitations on bank transactions with affiliates and requires that bank loans and extensions of credit to affiliates be fully secured. Subsequent to the receipt of your letter, the Board undertook an in-depth study of this complex statute. We are now forwarding a draft bill incorporating the Board's proposed amendments to this statute, as well as a discussion paper explaining the rationale for the amendments.

Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR F. BURNS.

A DISCUSSION OF AMENDMENTS TO SECTION 23A OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE ACT PROPOSED BY THE BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM

INTRODUCTION

Section 23A of the Federal Reserve Act was enacted as part of the Banking Act of 1933 (the Glass Steagall Act).[1] The objective of the statute is to prevent misuse of a bank's resources stemming from large-scale "non-arm's-length" transactions with its affiliates. The statute limits a bank's transactions with a single affiliate to no more than 10 per cent of the bank's capital and surplus and limits transactions with all affiliates combined to no more than 20 per cent of the bank's capital and surplus.

In the last several years Section 23A has come under close review, particularly by the banking committees of the Congress and the Federal bank supervisory authorities. This scrutiny was prompted by the discovery that several relatively large banks were adversely affected by transactions with their affiliates. The best known case involved the sale of a large amount of low quality mortgages by the mortgage banking subsidiary of Hamilton Bancshares, Inc. to Hamilton National Bank of Chattanooga, which subsequently failed. To some observers, these adverse developments indicated that Section 23A was deficient in protecting banks and needed to be tightened. In this connection, the House Committee on Banking, Currency and Housing incorporated provisions pertaining to Section 23A into its Discussion Principles for Financial Institutions and the Nation's Economy in 1975, and in 1976 Congressman St Germain introduced amendments to Section 23A as part of the Financial Reform Act of 1976. Finally, in mid 1976 Senator Proxmire asked the Board to provide the Senate Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs with draft legislation to amend Section 23A.

During the past year and a half, the Board has devoted substantial time and resources to analyzing and assessing the effectiveness of Section 23A. One of the Board's major conclusions is that bank transactions with affiliates within the legal limits set by the statute have not produced substantial instability in the banking system. Nevertheless, in the last several years transactions in excess of these legal limits have contributed to several sizable bank failures. These results indicate that there have been difficulties with gaining compliance with the statute. In recent years, the Board has proposed legislation that would impose civil penalties for violation of Section 23A as well as other banking statutes. If enacted, this legislation should certainly improve compliance with Section 23A in the future.

However, the Board believes that problems with Section 23A go considerably beyond compliance. First, Section 23A is a very difficult statute to interpret. In part, this is due to the inherent complexity of the statute. But in addition, the statute is poorly drafted. Problems in interpreting Section 23A have made compliance with, and enforcement of, the statute more difficult. Second, Section 23A is clearly in need of being tightened, as the present statute contains numerous potentially dangerous "loopholes." Third, there are several areas in which the present statute appears to be unduly restrictive and could be liberalized in a manner consistent with maintaining a sound banking system. Thus, the Board believes that Section 23A is definitely in need of amendment.

Footnotes at end of article.

As previously noted, Section 23A is a poorly drafted statute. The statute cannot be analyzed effectively without first substantially reorganizing it into a more logical structure. Ideally, Section 23A should be organized in four parts. The first part should specify the types of companies defined as affiliates for purposes of the statute. The second part should designate those types of transactions between a bank and its affiliates that are covered by the statute. The third part should contain the quantitative limitations on a bank's covered transactions with any single affiliate, and with all affiliates combined. The fourth part should set forth collateral requirements for bank loans or extensions of credit to affiliates.

This discussion of the Board's proposed amendments to Section 23A adheres to the four-part organizational structure. Within each part, the following appear: (A) a summary of the relevant section of the present statute; (B) the principle(s) by which the Board was guided; (C) the Board's proposed amendments to Section 23A; and (D) a discussion of these proposed amendments.

I. DEFINITION OF THE TERM "AFFILIATE" FOR PURPOSES OF SECTION 23A

A. Present law

The term "affiliate" is defined in Section 2(b) of the Banking Act of 1933 and Section 23A, paragraph 5, of the Federal Reserve Act to include:

(1) Any parent holding company of a bank and any subsidiary of that parent company;

(2) Any company[2] of which a bank owns or controls a majority of the voting shares, or controls in any manner the election of a majority of its directors, trustees, or other persons exercising similar functions;

(3) Any company (a) that is controlled by the majority shareholders of a bank or by trustees for the benefit of the shareholders of any such bank, or (b) for the benefit of whose shareholders all or substantially all of the capital stock of a bank is held by trustees;

(4) Any company of which a majority of its directors are also directors of any one bank.

However, certain specific types of companies, while technically defined as affiliates, are exempt from the restrictions of Section 23A. These exemptions are enumerated in Section 23A, paragraph 3, and include any company:

(1) Engaged solely in holding the premises of the bank with which it is affiliated;

(2) Engaged solely in conducting a safe-deposit business or the business of an agricultural credit corporation or livestock loan company;

(3) In the capital stock of which a national banking association is authorized to invest pursuant to Section 25 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, or a wholly-owned subsidiary of such affiliate (Section 25 pertains to Agreement Corporations);[3,4]

(4) Organized under Section 25(a) of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, or a wholly-owned subsidiary of such affiliate (Section 25(a) pertains to Edge Act Corporations);

(5) Engaged solely in holding U.S. Government securities or securities fully guaranteed by the United States as to principal and interest, the Federal intermediate credit banks, the Federal land banks, and the Federal Home Loan Banks;

(6) Where the affiliate relationship has arisen out of a bona fide debt contracted prior to the date of the creation of such relationship;

(7) Where the affiliate relationship exists through bank ownership or control of any voting shares in a fiduciary capacity, except where such shares are held for the benefit of all or a majority of the stockholders of such bank.

B. Principles underlying proposed changes in the definition of affiliate

For purposes of Section 23A, the Board believes that the term "affiliate" should apply to organizational [5] relationships involving a bank (1) where the relationship is not one of "arm's-length" and (2) where, because of this relationship, the bank may engage in transactions that may adversely affect its condition. Such transactions may be designed either to rescue a financially troubled affiliate or to "drain" a bank for the benefit of an affiliate. It should be noted that the emphasis of Section 23A is on organizational relationships and the transactions arising out of such relationships, in contrast to strictly "insider" dealings involving bank officers, directors, or shareholders.[6] In addition, it is recognized that not all "non-arm's-length" organizational relationships involve risks to the bank; consequently, some may be appropriately exempted from the restrictions of the statute.

C. Proposed amendments to section 23A: Definition of affiliate

For purposes of Section 23A, the Board believes that the definition of the term "affiliate" needs to be broadened in several respects and narrowed in others. Specifically, the Board recommends the following statutory changes:

(1) Alter the treatment of sister bank subsidiaries in a holding company system by exempting from the restrictions of Section 23A all transactions (other than the purchase of low quality assets) [7 8] between 80 per cent or more owned sister banks;

(2) Exclude majority-owned subsidiaries For purposes of Section 23A, the Board of a bank as affiliates. In addition, continue to exclude minority-owned subsidiaries of a bank as affiliates, but authorize the Board to restrict bank transactions with such minority-owned subsidiaries where it deems necessary;

(3) With respect to interlock relationships through which a company may be defined as an affiliate, broaden the definiiton to include companies interlocked not only with a bank but also with the bank's parent holding company through controlling shareholders or directors. Define "control" consistently as the power to vote 25 per cent or more of the voting shares of a company; or, in the case of a director-interlock relationship, any director group comprising a majority of the directors of a company;

(4) Add to the list of affiliates (a) any Real Estate Investment Trust or other organization that is sponsored and advised on a contractual basis by a bank or any subsidiary or affiliate of the bank, and (b) any other organization that is determined by the Board to have a "non-arm's-length" relationship with a bank or any subsidiary or affiliate of the bank.

In addition to the several changes proposed above, the Board recommends that one exemption in the present statute be amended, one be eliminated as inappropriate, and several be eliminated as redundant in light of other proposed recommendations:

(5) Limit to two years the exemption for those companies where the affiliate relationship arose out of a bona fide debt contracted prior to the date of the establishment of the relationship;

(6) Eliminate the inappropriate exemptions for companies engaged in the business of an agricultural credit corporation or livestock loan company;

(7) Eliminate the redundant exemptions for companies organized under Sections 25 and 25(a) of the Federal Reserve Act;

(8) Eliminate the redundant exemption for companies where the affiliate relationship exists through bank ownership or control of any voting shares in a fiduciary capacity.

D. Discussion of proposed amendments: Definition of affiliate

Each of the Boards recommended changes in the definition of affiliate for purposes of Section 23A is more fully discussed below, with the rationale given for each recommendation. The numbered sections in the discussion correspond to the brief list of proposed amendments given in Part I.C. (pages 7–9).

1. Sister Bank Subsidies in a Holding Company

Section 23A currently defines the parent holding company and all bank and nonbank subsidiaries of the parent as affiliates of a bank. The rationale underlying this rather broad definition is that since the parent company controls the subsidiary bank, the parent could require the bank to engage in a variety of transactions with the parent or subsidiaries of the parent that could adversely affect the bank.

The Board believes that transactions between a bank and its parent holding company or nonbank subsidiaries of the parent should continue to be limited by Section 23A in order to protect the bank from potential abuse.[9] It is much less clear, however, how Section 23A should be applied to transactions between sister bank subsidiaries of the same holding company parent. At present, Section 23A defines all sister bank subsidiaries within a holding company as affiliates of one another. Consequently, all transactions between these banks that are covered by Section 23A are subject to the quantitative limitations imposed by the statute.[10] At the same time, Section 23A, paragraph 4, expressly exempts from coverage two general types of transactions between affiliated banks: (1) certain non-interest-bearing deposit transactions,[11] and (2) the purchase of loans on a non-recourse basis.[12]

At the policy level, there are two basic ways to treat the banks in a holding company system. One considers the group of sister banks the equivalent of a branching system and, therefore, a single banking entity. Those holding this view are likely to be sympathetic to allowing unlimited transactions between sister bank subsidiaries, since there are no restrictions placed on transactions between branches of a bank. The second approach, which is more legalistic in nature, views sister bank subsidiaries as separate corporate entities. Those favoring this approach are more inclined to place limits on transactions between such banks. In recent statements to Congress, the Board has indicated considerable support for the "single entity" approach, but it has not endorsed the complete removal of all restrictions on transactions between sister bank subsidiaries.

There are two major advantages which stem from allowing unlimited transactions between sister banks. First, and most important, such a regulatory posture would tend to improve allocative efficiency by giving these banks maximum freedom to transfer funds to take advantage of intermarket yield differentials. Second, by allowing unlimited transactions, one or more banks in a holding company system could go to the rescue of a financially troubled sister bank. Such aid (through loans, asset purchases, etc.) might save the troubled bank from failure without seriously damaging the other bank(s).

The advantages associated with allowing unlimited transactions between sister banks, however, are countered by several disadvantages. First, a large scale rescue operation, as described above, might backfire and spread one bank's financial troubles throughout the holding company system and eventually result in multiple bank failures. Second, allowing unlimited transactions would open the door to a large scale transfer of low quality assets from one bank to another in an effort to avoid criticism during a bank examination. The potential for such transfers could impair the effectiveness of the bank examination process in uncovering problem bank situations. Finally, a problem could arise in those situations where a holding company does not own all of the shares of one of the banks that it controls. In such cases, a holding company could benefit from encouraging transactions between a wholly-owned bank subsidiary and a less-than-wholly-owned bank subsidiary on terms that are adverse to the latter.

The Board believes that the best regulatory approach to transactions between a bank and its sister banks under Section 23A is (1) to define each sister bank as an affiliate, and (2) to exempt all transactions with a sister bank (other than the purchase of low quality assets,[13] a transaction which the Board believes should be prohibited),[14] if the same holding company owns or controls, directly or indirectly, 80 per cent or more of the voting shares of both banks.[15 16] This proposed treatment offers the principal advantages associated with unlimited transactions among sister bank subsidiaries and, at the same time, minimizes any associated disadvantages. Allocative efficiency would be promoted by this approach as a holding company would be allowed significant freedom to transfer funds among its subsidiary banks. At the same time, a holding company would be prevented from forcing one of its banks to buy low quality assets from another bank subsidiary, thereby possibly causing the failure of a previously sound bank. In addition, the passing of low quality assets between sister banks in an attempt to stay one step ahead of the bank examiners would not be permitted. Finally, this proposal would offer minority shareholders protection from abuse in those cases where the holding company owns or controls less than 80 per cent of the shares of either bank in the transaction.[17]

2. Subsidiaries of a Bank

Present law defines as an affiliate of a bank any company of which a bank owns or controls more than 50 per cent of the voting shares [18] or controls in any manner the election of a majority of its directors, trustees, or other persons exercising similar functions. However, Edge Act Corporations and Agreement Corporations, and their wholly-owned subsidiaries, are specifically exempt from the limitations of Section 23A. In addition, foreign bank subsidiaries are exempt from any limitations with respect to "loans and extensions of credit" from the parent bank, pursuant to statute and Board Regulation.[19] Finally, the Board has exempted from Section 23A's restrictions transactions between a State member bank and its operations subsidiary.[20]

In the Board's judgment, those companies of which a bank exercises control through majority ownership should be considered part of the bank, much like departments within the bank. It follows that transactions between a bank and its majority-owned subsidiaries should be viewed as essentially internal bank operations and, therefore, need not be restricted in the same manner as "non-arm's-length" transactions between a bank and an outside company. In fact, the restrictions imposed on transactions between a bank and a majority-owned subsidiary may force a bank to conduct certain operations through departments when they could be conducted more efficiently through corporate subsidiaries. Consequently, the Board recommends that majority-owned subsidiaries of a bank no longer be defined as affiliates for purposes of Section 23A.[21]

It should be noted that this liberalization is much more limited than it might at first appear. As noted earlier, member banks are generally prohibited from purchasing stock, and of the few types of companies whose stock is exempt from this prohibition, several are already exempt from the restrictions of Section 23A.

In the case of minority-owned subsidiaries of banks, nearly all of which represent foreign joint ventures and foreign investments,[22] present law excludes them as affiliates and, therefore, from the transactions restrictions of Section 23A. Yet the nature of these (foreign) minority-owned companies is such that there is often a "non-arm's-length" relationship with the U.S. parent bank, particularly in the case of foreign joint ventures. Therefore, the possibility exists that the U.S. parent bank will extend credit to the foreign joint venture company without an "arm's-length" assessment of the credit risk involved and without control of the disbursement of funds.[23] Thus, it could be argued that such companies should be defined as affiliates and made subject to Section 23A's transactions restrictions.

On the other hand, imposition of such restrictions would involve several practical difficulties. First, and perhaps most important, such restrictions could serve to nullify present informal commitments by U.S. banks to their foreign joint ventures. Of course, "grandfather" provisions could be drafted to handle present contractual commitments between banks and their foreign joint ventures. However, the Board questions whether such provisions could be suitably written to deal with all other types of informal bank commitments to existing joint ventures. The concern is that such provisions would not take into consideration cases in which no formal agreement exists but in which foreign government authorities and foreign suppliers of funds have relied on the informal implicit guarantee of the joint venture partners. It appears that foreign government authorities have often relied heavily on such implicit support in approving the formation of these ventures. If Section 23A's restrictions were now applied to these ventures, this support would be significantly limited, thus effecting a major change in the "rules of the game" under which these ventures were originally authorized.

Second, the application of Section 23A's restrictions to transactions between a U.S. bank and its foreign joint venture would likely make it more difficult for U.S. banks to find joint venture partners abroad, since U.S. banks would no longer be able to make the informal (or formal) commitments referred to above.[24] Of course, the restrictions of Section 23A could be avoided if a U.S. bank acquired a majority interest in the foreign venture; however, at the present time several countries prohibit foreign (U.S.) banks from engaging in a joint venture activity in a majority role.

Third, to define all minority-owned companies as affiliates would violate the principle of restricting only transactions between banks and companies with which the bank has a "non-arm's-length" relationship. Since there is some small critical ownership percentage below which the relationship may be deemed to be at "arm's-length," transactions with companies of which the bank owns less than the critical percentage of shares need not be restricted. However, if companies of which a bank owns less than the critical share were to be excluded from the definition of affiliate, the result would be a confusing three-tier structure of regulation where majority-owned companies and those companies of which the bank owned less than the critical ownership share would be excluded from the definition of affiliate, and those companies of which the bank owned from 50 per cent down to the critical ownership share would be included as affiliates.

Finally, if some or all minority-owned companies were included as affiliates, it might be advisable to permit the transactions limitations to be relaxed with regulatory approval in certain distress situations. In recent years, some banks have felt compelled for business reasons to lend support to foreign joint venture companies in order to deal with liquidity crises or temporary asset problems.[25] This argues in favor of a rescue provision. However, any such provision incorporated into the statute would require bank regulators to make a number of extremely difficult, highly judgmental, ad hoc decisions. It would also add an additional uncertainty into a bank's decision-making process involving joint venture operations since the bank would have to estimate the probability that the regulators would permit it to go to the aid of the joint venture in a distress situation.

In sum, while there may be a logical basis for imposing some type of restriction on transaction between a bank and certain of its minority-owned subsidiaries, particularly its foreign joint ventures, present institutional arrangements associated with on-going joint ventures, coupled with the necessity for maintaining flexibility for banks in matters pertaining to foreign markets, argue strongly against any rigid statutory restrictions such as those embodied in Section 23A. Accordingly, the Board believes that minority-owned subsidiaries should continue not to be defined as affiliates for purposes of Section 23A. At the same time, the Board recommended that Section 23A be amended to authorize the Board to restrict where it deems necessary bank transactions with minority-owned subsidiaries (whether owned directly or indirectly).[26] [27] This recognizes that some type of restriction of a bank's transactions with certain of its (foreign) minority-owned subsidiaries may be desirable from time to time, yet acknowledges the flexibility needed by a bank in its (foreign) minority-owned activities.

3. Companies interlocked with a bank

Present law covers certain types of interlock and trust relationships between a company and a bank, presumably to minimize abuses to the bank stemming from "non-arms'-length" transactions arising out of such relationships. The Board believes that the extent of the coverage is incomplete and recommends broadening the definition of Affiliate in several ways to remedy this situation.

At present, the law omits any reference to an interlock between a bank holding company and another company and refers only to an interlock between a bank and another company. However, an interlock involving a bank holding company would seem to offer the potential for abuse of the subsidiary bank(s) similar to that associated with an interlock directly involving a bank. Consequently, the Board recommends that the statute be amended to define as an affiliate for purposes of Section 23A any company that is interlocked either with a bank or with its parent holding company.[28]

The Board believes the coverage of types of interlock relationships under the current statute is adequate. Present law speaks only of shareholder and director interlocks. While there are perhaps other types of interlock relationships (e.g., interlocks among senior officers of a bank and a nonbank company) through which a bank might be induced to engage in adverse transactions, it seems unlikely that there would exist many such interlocks without a concomitant shareholder or director interlock. Consequently, the Board believes that companies that are interlocked with a bank, or its parent holding company, through either common shareholder control or common directors should continue to be defined as affiliates.

The Board has also considered whether an interlocking group of shareholders or directors must have control of both the bank and the company, or control of the bank only, or control of just the company? Present law requires control of both the bank and the company in the case of shareholder interlocks, but only of the company in the case of director interlocks. Control of the bank seems most important in view of the objective of the statute—to prevent abuses of a bank's resources. However, the possibility of such abuses may, in fact, be likely only in situations where the interlocking relationship results in one group of persons having control of both the bank and the company. Moreover, unless control is required of both the bank and the company, the definition of affiliate for purposes of Section 23A might be so broad as to be overly restrictive. The Board therefore, would require the interlocking group to control both the bank and the company.

To remedy a shortcoming of existing law, the Board further recommends amending the statute to include a definition of the term "control." Majority control seems generally to be intended as it is used at several places in the law; [29] however, in one instance total or near-total control is suggested.[30] The Board believes that, for purposes of Section 23A, "control" should be defined as the power to vote 25 per cent or more of the voting shares of a company, excluding situations where the stock is controlled in a fiduciary capacity (except as noted in the next paragraph below); or, in the case of a director-interlock relationship, any director group comprising a majority of the total number of directors of a company. This definition recognizes that effective control can be exercised only by a majority of the directors but can often be exercised by shareholders holding less than a majority of the voting shares. Moreover, it is generally consistent with the definition of "control" contained both in the Bank Holding Company Act,[31] and in the Board's proposed amendments to Section 22 of the Federal Reserve Act, as recommended to Congress in early 1977.

In the particular situation of a company controlled by trustees for the benefit of a bank's shareholders or, alternatively, a bank controlled by trustees for the benefit of a company's shareholders, both types of trust relationships are covered in the definition of affiliate under existing law; however, in neither case is the beneficiary shareholder group defined in terms of its shareholder interest. Presumably, the statute refers to situations where all shareholders have a pro rata beneficial interest in the stock of the trustee-controlled organization. However, the wording of the statute is not clear on this point, and the wording of one of the affiliate exemptions [Section 23A, paragraph 3(7)] suggests that trustee-controlled companies are defined as affiliates when shares are held for the benefit of at least a majority of the bank's stockholders. The Board recommends that this ambiguity be eliminated by defining an affiliate relationship in cases where trustees control 25 per cent or more of the voting shares of a bank (company) for the benefit of shareholders who control 25 per cent or more of the voting share of the company (bank).[32]

4. Bank-Advised REITs and Similar Organizations

At present, Real Estate Investment Trusts (REITs) and other organizations that are sponsored and advised by a bank or its affiliate are not considered affiliates for purposes of Section 23A. However, in view of the difficulties which many bank- and bank holding company-advised REITs have encountered in recent years, the Board believes that REITs and other organizations that are sponsored and advised on a contractual basis by a bank, a 25 per cent or more owned subsidiary of the bank, or an affiliate of the bank, should be included as affiliates for purposes of Section 23A.

Footnotes at end of article.

Such an extension of the statute recognizes that a bank may try to rescue a financially troubled organization that is sponsored and advised by the bank or its subsidiary or its affiliate in order to (1) prevent any damage to the reputation of the bank or its affiliate, or (2) forestall any lawsuits alleging that the sponsored organization received "bad advice" from the bank or its affiliate. To the extent that advisory service revenues are related to the size of the organization that is sponsored and advised, a bank may also lend to the organization at preferential terms in order to increase the size of the organization, thus boosting the advisory service revenues received by the bank or its affiliate. In such situations, the Board believes the transactions would not be at "arm's-length"[33] and, therefore, should be subject to the limitations of Section 23A.

It is recognized that a distinction can be made between organizations that are sponsored and advised by a bank or its subsidiary and those that are sponsored and advised by a bank's affiliate (e.g., its parent holding company or a sister nonbank subsidiary). In the former case, the bank would engage in only those transactions with the organization that are presumably in the bank's own interest. In the latter case, however, the bank might be directed to engage in such transactions by a controlling party having interests other than those of the bank alone. In view of this distinction, it could be argued that those companies that are sponsored and advised by a bank should not be included as affiliates of the bank for purposes of Section 23A. Such an exclusion, however, might encourage banking organizations to place their advisory activities directly in their banks instead of with nonbank affiliates in order to avoid the limitations of Section 23A. This, in turn, might ensure greater bank control over such activities, but the bank would become directly liable for the activity and could be more exposed to lawsuits and damage to its reputation in the event a sponsored and advised company suffers financial difficulty. Accordingly, the Board would make no such distinction for purposes of Section 23A, and recommends that organizations that are sponsored and advised by either a bank or an affiliate of a bank should be designated affiliates of the bank.

The Board has considered the extent to which the statute should be further generalized to capture other organizations that may have a "non-arm's-length" relationship with a banking organization. Again, in view of the problems associated with bank-advised REITs, it would seem prudent to define as affiliates other organizations that may later come to be regarded as having a "non-arm's-length" relationship with a banking organization. However, it is difficult, if not impossible, at this juncture to amend the statute to include all the possible organizations that might fall into this category. Accordingly, the Board recommends that no such listing be attempted, but that the Board be authorized to add to the definition of affiliate from time to time such organizations that it determines to have a "non-arm's-length" relationship with a bank or a subsidiary or affiliate of the bank.

5. Affiliate Relationship Resulting from Foreclosed Loan

Present law exempts from the limitations of Section 23A transactions between a bank and its affiliate when the affiliate relationship has arisen out of a bona fide debt contracted prior to the date of the creation of such relationship. Such a relationship can arise, for example, in the case where a parent holding company acquires controlling shares of another company as a result of a defaulted loan.[34] While the Board believes that an exemption is appropriate for a short time period sufficient to sever such an affiliate relationship, it does not feel that the exemption should continue indefinitely. Accordingly, the Board recommends that the present statute be amended to permit this exemption only for a period of two years, commencing with the date of the creation of the affiliate relationship,[35] [36] with a possible extension of up to three additional years with the approval of the Board.

6. Agricultural Credit Corporation and Livestock Loan Company

Currently, the provisions of Section 23A do not apply to affiliates engaged in the business of an agricultural credit corporation or livestock loan company. The Board sees no reason for continuation of this exemption and recommends that it be eliminated.

7. Companies Organized Under Sections 25 and 25(a)

Under existing law, the provisions of Section 23A do not apply to affiliates organized under Sections 25 and 25(a) of the Federal Reserve Act. (These include Agreement Corporations and Edge Act Corporations.) If the Board's recommendation not to define subsidiaries of banks as affiliates for purposes of Section 23A is adopted, these exemptions would be redundant for those Sections 25 or 25(a) corporations that are subsidiaries of banks. In the case of Section 25 or 25(a) corporations that are subsidiaries of a bank holding company, the exemptions represent a "loophole" in present law that could be used to "cross-stream" funds to a sister nonbank subsidiary. For these reasons the Board recommends that the exemptions for Edge and Agreement Corporations be eliminated.

8. Companies Controlled in a Fiduciary Capacity

Under present law, the limitations of Section 23A do not apply to any affiliate where the affiliate relationship exists through bank ownership or control of any voting shares in a fiduciary capacity. In view of the Board's recommendation not to define subsidiaries of banks as affiliates, this exemption would no longer appear to be necessary. Accordingly, the Board recommends that this exemption be eliminated.

II. TRANSACTIONS COVERED BY SECTION 23A

Before analyzing the types of transactions with an affiliate that are covered by Section 23A, it is useful to remember that banking law places restrictions on certain types of bank transactions with any party, whether affiliated or not.[37] As a general rule, however, Section 23A places greater restrictions on bank transactions with affiliates because such transactions are not made at "arm's-length" and, therefore, represent a higher degree of risk to the bank.

A. Present law

Transactions with affiliates that are now covered by Section 23A are spread rather haphazardly over several paragraphs of the statute. For purposes of analysis, all redundancies have been eliminated and covered transactions have been rearranged and listed below in a more orderly manner:

(1) Loans or extensions of credit to an affiliate [Paragraph 1(1)], which include:

(a) Any purchase of securities, other assets or obligations under repurchase agreement [Paragraph 4(1)(A)];

(b) The discount of promissory notes, bills of exchange, conditional sales contracts, or similar paper, whether with or without recourse [Paragraph 4(1)(B)];

(c) A loan or extension of credit to a director, officer, clerk, or other employee or any representative of any such affiliate to the extent that the proceeds of such loan are used for the benefit of, or transferred to, the affiliate [Paragraph 2];

(2) Investing in the capital stock, bonds, debentures, or other such obligations of any affiliate [Paragraph 1(2)];

(3) Accepting the capital stock, bonds, debentures, or other such obligations of any affiliate as collateral security for advances made to any person, partnership, association, or corporation [Paragraph 1(3)].

Transactions Exempt from Coverage

Section 23A now contains nine exemptions to the above three broad types of transactions covered by the statute. These exemptions are scattered over various parts of the statute, but are collected and presented here as the list of transactions to which the restrictions of Section 23A do not apply:

(1) Indebtedness of any affiliate for unpaid balances due a bank on assets purchased from such bank, or loans by a bank to any affiliate secured by, or extensions of credit against, obligations of the United States or obligations fully guaranteed by the United States as to principal and interest [Paragraph 3];

(2) The purchase, without recourse, of promissory notes, bills of exchange, conditional sales contracts or similar paper from an affiliated bank [Paragraph 4(1)];

(3) Making non-interest-bearing deposits in an affiliated bank [Paragraph 4(2)];

(4) The giving of immediate credit to an affiliated bank for uncollected items received in the ordinary course of business [Paragraph 4(2)];

(5) Acquiring stock, bonds, debentures, or other obligations of any company of the kinds described in Section 4(c)(1) of the Bank Holding Company Act of 1956, as amended[38] [Paragraph 6(1)];

(6) Acquiring stock, bonds, debentures, or other obligations of an affiliate accepted as security for debts previously contracted provided that such collateral shall not be held for a period of over two years [Paragraph 6(2)];

(7) Acquiring shares which are of the kinds and amounts eligible for investment by national banks under the provisions of Section 5136 of the Revised Statutes [Paragraph 6(3)];

(8) Extensions of credit by a bank to a bank holding company of which such bank is a subsidiary or to another subsidiary of such bank holding company, if made within one year after the effective date of the amendment to Section 23A (the date was July 1, 1966) and pursuant to a contract lawfully entered into prior to January 1, 1966 [Paragraph 6(4)];

(9) Transactions by a bank with another bank the deposits of which are insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation if more than 50 percent of the voting stock of such other bank is owned by the first bank, or held by trustees for the benefit of the stockholders of the first bank [Paragraph 6(5)].

B. Principal underlying proposed changes in the types of transactions covered Transactions between a bank and an affiliate are "non-arm's-length" transactions and have potential for abuse of the bank. Consequently, the Board believes that all financial transactions between a bank and an affiliate (as defined in Part I of this discussion memorandum) should be covered by Section 23A, unless the transaction has unique characteristics that qualify it for exemption.

C. Proposed amendments to types of transactions covered

The Board believes that the coverage of the types of transactions to which the restrictions of Section 23A now apply should be extended in order to provide banks greater protection against potential abuses. Specifically, the Board recommends expanding the coverage of transactions in two areas, and further recommends the elimination of the current exemption from coverage for five types of transactions:

(1) Extend the restrictions of Section 23A to all asset purchases and prohibit the purchase of low quality assets,[39] but exempt the purchase of any non-low quality asset as long as that asset has a readily identifiable and publicly available market value or quotation and is purchased by the bank at that market value;

(2) Expand the coverage of Section 23A to include all types of guarantees (including standby letters of credit) and all acceptances;

(3) Eliminate the exemption now granted for the indebtedness of any affiliate for unpaid balances due a bank on assets purchased from that bank;

(4) Eliminate the exemption now granted for stock, bonds, debentures or other obligations of an affiliate acquired by a bank in foreclosure;

(5) Eliminate the exemption now granted for purchases, without recourse, of promissory notes, bills of exchange, conditional sales contracts or similar paper from an affiliated bank;

(6) Eliminate the exemption now granted for purchases of shares which are of the kinds and amounts eligible for investment by national banks under the provisions of Section 5136 of the Revised Statutes;

(7) Eliminate the exemption now granted for transactions by a bank with a second bank that is insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, if more than 50 percent of the voting stock of the second bank is owned by the first bank or held by trustees for the benefit of the stockholders of the first bank.

D. Discussion of proposed amendments to types of transactions covered

1. Asset Purchases

The Board recommends expanding the types of asset purchases now covered by Section 23A. At present, the coverage is limited to: (1) the purchase of securities, other assets or obligations under a repurchase agreement; and (2) the discount of promissory notes, bills of exchange, conditional sales contracts or similar paper.[40] It is by no means clear why the statute covers only these specific asset purchases.[41] Indeed, as long as the statute leaves some asset purchases uncovered (such as the purchase of securities not under a repurchase agreement), a bank might be forced to buy a large amount of uncovered assets that are of dubious quality. Such purchases, in sufficient volume, could result in the failure of the bank.

In the Board's judgment, the best way to handle this potential problem is to amend the statute to cover the purchase of all types of assets. In addition, the Board recommends that a bank be prohibited from purchasing low quality assets from an affiliate, thereby providing further protection for the bank. At the same time, the Board believes that the statute should allow a bank to purchase, without limitation, any non-low quality asset from an affiliate as long as that asset has a readily identifiable and publicly available market value or quotation and is purchased by the bank at that market value. While this latter provision would not exempt the purchase of many types of assets, it would "free up" some asset purchases. Moreover, as long as these assets are purchased at market value (which can be readily verified by examiners), the provision should not expose banks to undue risk.

2. Guarantees and Acceptances

While Section 23A now covers bank loans to affiliates, it does not cover bank guarantees and acceptances issued for these affiliates. However, in 1974, the Board adopted an amendment to Regulation H (which pertains to State bank membership in the Federal Reserve System) that had the effect of bringing standby letters of credit (and similar instruments) and ineligible acceptances[42] within the scope of Section 23A for State member banks. Similar regulations were adopted by the Comptroller of the Currency and the FDIC for banks under their jurisdiction.

Bringing standby letters of credit and ineligible acceptances indirectly under the scope of Section 23A in 1974 was a desirable action, because the issuance of these instruments for affiliates involves some risk for banks. However, in the process of overhauling Section 23A, the Board believes that it would be desirable to include coverage of these instruments directly in the statute rather than indirectly through supervisory regulations. Moreover, it would seem advisable to broaden the coverage to include (1) all types of guarantees issued for affiliates, rather than just standby letters of credit (the major form at present); and (2) all acceptances issued for affiliates, rather than just ineligible acceptances.[43]

3. Unpaid Balances Due a Bank

Section 23A now exempts from coverage the indebtedness of any affiliate for unpaid balances due a bank on assets purchased from that bank. In the Board's judgment, this exemption is potentially dangerous and should be eliminated from the statute. As a result of this exemption, a financially troubled affiliate that was experiencing a liquidity crisis could buy an unlimited amount of assets from the bank without making payment, sell the assets, and use the proceeds to meet its debt service requirements. Meanwhile, the bank would be left with a doubtful receivable that could be large relative to the bank's capital. It should be noted that this receivable would not have to be secured, as would a bank loan to the same affiliate.

4. Securities on Affiliate Acquired in Foreclosure

The statute now includes as a covered transaction a bank's acceptance of an affiliate's securities as collateral on a loan to an unaffiliated party.[44] However, the statute then curiously exempts as a covered transaction a bank's taking possession of these securities in foreclosing on the loan, provided that such collateral shall not be held for a period of more than two years. The Board sees no rationale for this exemption and would eliminate it.

5. Acquisition of Certain Areas From an Affiliated Bank

At present, Section 23A exempts from coverage the acquisition, without recourse, of promissory notes, bills of exchange, conditional sales contracts or similar paper from an affiliated bank. The Board recommends that this exemption, which now applies irrespective of the percentage ownership of the banks involved, be deleted and replaced by a narrower exemption applicable only to the purchase of non-low quality assets from a sister bank subsidiary in a holding company system. Moreover, as discussed earlier, in order to protect minority shareholders from potential abuse where the holding company does not own or control 80 per cent or more of the voting shares of both banks, the Board would not exempt asset purchases from the quantitative limitations of the statute if at least one sister bank in any such transaction is less than 80 per cent owned by the parent holding company. Finally, for reasons enumerated earlier (page 13, note 1), the Board also would not exempt asset purchases involving banks affiliated through a chain organization.

6. Purchases of Shares Eligible for Investment by National Banks

At present, Section 23A defines majority-owned subsidiaries of a bank as affiliates of actions with these majority-owned subsidiaries are subject to the quantitative limitations specified in the statute. However, the statute then exempts from coverage the purchase of shares (of majority-owned companies) that are of the kinds and amounts eligible for investment by national banks under the provisions of Section 5136 of the Revised Statutes.

As discussed earlier, the Board recommends that majority-owned (as well as minority-owned) subsidiaries of a bank not be defined as affiliates for purposes of Section 23A.[45] Consequently, bank transactions with subsidiaries (including the purchase of shares) would not be limited. If this recommendation is adopted, therefore, the present exemption for the purchase of shares eligible for investment by national banks would be unnecessary and should be eliminated from the statute.

7. Transactions With a Subsidiary That Is a Bank

Section 23A now exempts any transactions by a bank with a second bank that is insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, if more than 50 per cent of the voting stock of the second bank is either owned by the first bank or held by trustees for the benefit of the shareholders of the first bank. The Board recommends that this exemption be deleted from the statute. With regard to a bank subsidiary of another bank, the Board recommends that the bank subsidiary be defined as an affiliate, but that in the case of an 80 per cent or more owned bank subsidiary all transactions between the parent bank and the subsidiary bank (other than the purchase of low quality assets, which would be prohibited) be exempt from the restrictions of Section 23A. In those cases where the stock ownership of the subsidiary bank is less than 80 per cent, the restrictions of Section 23A would apply, thereby protecting minority shareholders of the subsidiary bank from potential abuse.

As for a bank whose stock is held by trustees for the benefit of shareholders of another bank, the Board sees no rationale for exempting transactions between such banks and so recommends that this exemption be eliminated.

III. QUANTITATIVE LIMITATIONS ON COVERED TRANSACTIONS

A. Present law

Section 23A, paragraph 1, places two quantitative limitations on covered transactions between a bank and its affiliates. The first limits the aggregate amount of a bank's covered transactions with a single affiliate to no more than 10 per cent of the bank's capital stock and surplus.[47] The second limits the aggregate amount of a bank's covered transactions with all affiliates combined to no more than 20 per cent of the bank's capital stock and surplus.

B. Principles underlying proposed changes in quantitative limitations

The Board believes that there are three principles that should be followed in the determination of quantitative limitations on bank transactions with affiliates. First, limits on a bank's "non-arm's-length" transactions with a single affiliate should be more stringent than the limits that general banking law places on "arm's-length" transactions with a non-affiliate. Second, the limits should be liberal enough to allow a bank to have a meaningful amount of transactions with affiliates. Otherwise, it would probably be more practical simply to prohibit all such transactions. Third, the limits should be strict enough to protect a bank from being crippled by a large volume of adverse transactions. One way to achieve this latter objective is to set a limit on transactions with all affiliates combined that is lower than the sum of the maximum amount of transactions that a bank could have with each of its affiliates.

C. Proposed amendment to quantitative limitations

The Board recommends that, where there are subsidiaries of a bank, the quantitative limitations apply not just to the bank's covered transactions with affiliates, but rather to transactions of the bank plus transactions of subsidiaries of the bank with affiliates of the bank.

D. Discussion of proposed amendment to quantitative limitations

The Board believes that the present quantitative limitations on bank transactions with a single affiliate (10 per cent of the bank's capital and surplus) and on transactions with all affiliates combined (20 per cent of the bank's capital and surplus) are reasonable and should be maintained. The present limits do not appear to be too liberal because bank transactions with affiliates within the legal limits have not been a major source of banking instability. On the other hand, the present limits allow banks of significant size to have a meaningful volume of transactions with affiliates. For example, a typical bank with total assets of $1 billion can have transactions with a single affiliate of about $7 million and transactions with all affiliates combined of about $14 million.

However, the Board believes that one modification should be made in the quantitative limitations on transactions that are subject to the statute. At present, the statute places no limitations on transactions with affiliates of the bank by subsidiaries of the bank. Moreover, Section 23A exempts from coverage bank transactions with certain subsidiaries, including minority-owned subsidiaries, Edge Act Corporations and Agreement Corporations. As a result, a bank might use these subsidiaries as a conduit for transferring unlimited funds to its other affiliates, in circumvention of the basic purpose of Section 23A. Consequently, the Board recommends that the statute be amended so that the quantitative limitations apply not just to the covered transactions of the bank, but encompass as well the covered transactions of any company in which the bank owns or controls, directly or indirectly, 25 per cent or more of the voting shares (except in a fiduciary capacity), or controls in any manner the election of a majority of its directors, trustees, or other persons exercising similar functions. Thus, the amended statute would provide that the covered transactions of a bank and its 25 per cent or more owned subsidiaries with a single affiliate of the bank could not exceed 10 per cent of the bank's capital and surplus, and that covered transactions by a bank and these subsidiaries with all affiliates combined could not exceed 20 per cent of the bank's capital and surplus.

IV. COLLATERAL REQUIREMENTS

A. Present law

Section 23A now requires that bank loans or extensions of credit to an affiliate be secured by collateral in the form of stocks, bonds, debentures or other such obligations, or by paper that is eligible for rediscount or purchase by the Federal Reserve Banks.[48] Moreover, at the time the loan or extension of credit is made, the market value of the eligible collateral must be at least 100 per cent of the amount of the loan if the collateral is composed of obligations of the U.S. Government and certain agencies or by eligible paper; at least 110 per cent of the loan amount if composed of obligations of any State or political subdivision; or at least 120 per cent of the loan amount if composed of any other type of eligible collateral.

Footnotes at end of article.

B. Principles underlying proposed changes in collateral requirements

The Board believes that two principles should guide the formulation of collateral requirements on bank loans to affiliates. First, since banks often require collateral on "arm's-length" loans to non-affiliated borrowers in order to reduce risk, it seems reasonable to require that "non-arm's-length" loans to affiliates be secured. Second, there should be a direct relationship between the amount of collateral required on loans to affiliates and the probability of a future decline in the value of that collateral.

C. Proposed amendments to collateral requirements

The Board recommends the following four amendments involving the collateral requirements of Section 23A:

(1) Revise the types of transactions requiring collateral to include: (a) all loans and extensions of credit to affiliates; (b) all types of guarantees issued for affiliates; and (c) all types of acceptances issued for affiliates, except for those already fully secured either by attached documents or by other collateral connected with the same transaction as the acceptance;

(2) Expand the list of assets that can serve as collateral, but prohibit the use of any low quality assets.[49] Also, expand and revise the collateral value to loan amount percentage for various types of eligible collateral;

(3) Prohibit a bank from accepting the stock or debt obligations of an affiliate as collateral on a loan to that affiliate or any other affiliate;

(4) Amend the statute to require that any collateral that is retired or amortized must be replaced by additional eligible collateral where needed to keep the collateral value to outstanding loan amount percentage equal to the minimum percentage required at the inception of the loan.

D. Discussion of proposed amendments to collateral requirements

1. Transactions Requiring Collateral

Section 23A now requires that all bank loans or extensions of credit to affiliates must be secured. This requirement is deficient in two respects. First, because the term "extension of credit" (as defined in the existing statute)[50] includes the purchase of certain assets, Section 23A now appears to require that such asset purchases from an affiliate be secured. Such coverage is probably inadvertently broader than necessary. Second, it is not clear whether standby letters of credit and ineligible acceptance, which by regulation have been added to those transactions covered by the statute, need to be secured.

In amending the collateral provisions of Section 23A, the Board believes that the following three types of transactions should be secured: (1) all loans and extension of credit to affiliates; (2) all types of guarantees (including, but not limited to, standby letters of credit) issued for affiliates; and (3) all types of acceptance (not just ineligible acceptances) issued for affiliates, except for those already fully secured either by attached documents or by other collateral connected with the same transaction as the acceptance. (Where the term "loan" is used throughout the remainder of Part IV, it is meant to include all three types of transactions.)

2. Types of Collateral Permitted and Amount Required

Section 23A now limits eligible collateral to stocks, bonds, debentures and other such obligations, as well as paper that is eligible for rediscount or purchase by the Federal Reserve Banks. The Board believes that this list of assets is unduly restrictive. Indeed, it is so restrictive that it often effectively prohibits bank lending to affiliates simply because these affiliates do not posses the required collateral.

The Board recommends that the present list of eligible collateral be significantly expanded, but would also require that loans secured by these other assets have a relatively high collateral value to loan amount percentage. Accordingly, the Board proposes the following four-tier collateral requirement, which basically adheres to the principle that there should be a direct relationship between the amount of the collateral required and the probability of a future decline in its value:

Type of collateral:	*Percent
Obligations of the U.S. Government and agencies, and eligible paper	100
Obligations of any State or political subdivision	110
All other debt instruments, including receivables	120
Stock[51] or other personal property, real property, and leases	130

*Minimum collateral value to loan amount.

This liberalization of the eligibility list, with concomitant changes in collateral value to loan amount percentages, would normally allow a bank to lend to all of the major nonbank affiliates of a holding company that require funding (mortgage companies, finance companies, leasing and factoring companies) since these companies typically hold assets included on the above list.

The Board also recommends that the proposed eligible collateral list should be tightened by specifying that no low quality assets be allowed to serve as collateral. The definition of "low quality asset" in this context is the same as that used earlier in connection with the discussion of the purchase of assets by a bank from a sister bank subsidiary.[52]

3. Accepting the Securities of an Affiliate as Collateral

At present, Section 23A does not prohibit a bank from accepting the securities of an affiliate as collateral on a loan to that affiliate or to another affiliate. The Board believes that this omission is potentially dangerous. If the borrowing affiliate should default on the loan, it is likely that the collateral securing the loan will have little value. Consequently, the Board recommends that a bank be prohibited from accepting the securities of an affiliate as collateral on a loan to that affiliate or another affiliate.

4. Replacement of Collateral Retired or Amortized

There is one additional amendment to the collateral requirement of the statute that the Board believes would be beneficial. At present, the statute specifies that the market value of the collateral at the time that the loan is made must be a certain per cent of the amount of the loan. This wording leaves open the possibility that if some of the collateral were retired or amortized after the loan was made, that collateral would not have to be replaced. To avoid this situation, the Board recommends amending the statute to require that any collateral that is retired or amortized must be replaced by additional eligible collateral where needed to keep the percentage of the collateral value relative to the outstanding amount of the loan equal to the minimum percentage required at the inception of the loan.

V. OTHER PROVISIONS

There are two other provisions that the Board believes should be added to Section 23A. One provision would prohibit bank transactions with affiliates on non-market terms that are disadvantageous to the bank. The second would incorporate grandfather provisions into the amended statute.

Prohibition on nonmarket transactions

At present, Section 23A does not prohibit a bank from entering into transactions on non-market terms that are disadvantageous to the bank. Such transactions obviously would have an adverse effect on a bank's earnings and capital. In many cases, these adverse transactions would subsequently be discovered and criticized by bank examiners. Even so, the Board believes that it would be prudent to amend Section 23A to expressly prohibit such transactions.

Grandfather provisions

As previously noted, Section 23A now limits a bank's covered transactions with a single affiliate, and with all affiliates combined, to no more than 10 per cent and 20 per cent, respectively, of the bank's capital and surplus. The numerous changes in the statute that the Board has recommended may result in some banks' outstanding transactions exceeding these statutory limits. In these cases, the Board does not believe that a bank should be forced to reduce its transactions to the legal limit simply because the "rules of the game" have been changed. Instead, the Board recommends that the bank (with one exception) be prohibited from engaging in additional covered transactions until such additional transactions can be carried out within the statutory ceiling of 10 per cent or 20 per cent of the bank's capital. The one exception recommended would allow the bank to engage in additional transactions in order to honor any written commitments made prior to the date that the Section 23A amendments are introduced in the Congress.

It is also possible that proposed changes in the collateral requirements could result in some technical violations of the statute for transactions (such as loans) already on the bank's books at the time of the passage of the amendments. To handle this problem, the Board recommends that all transactions entered into prior to enactment of the amendments continue to be subject to the pre-amendment collateral requirements. Of course, all transactions entered into after the passage of the amendments would be subject to the new collateral requirements.

FOOTNOTES

[1] As originally enacted, the Banking Act of 1933 covered only member banks. However, in 1966 Congress extended the coverage of Section 23A (via Section 18(j) of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act) to include insured nonmember banks. As a result, Section 23A now applies to all Federally insured banks.

[2] The term "company" includes any corporation, business trust, association, or similar organization.

[3] Agreement Corporations are state-chartered corporations that are principally engaged in foreign banking.

[4] Section 25 also pertains to foreign bank subsidiaries of U.S. banks. However, since the provisions of Section 25 which relate to foreign bank subsidiaries were added subsequent to the exemption in Section 23A for Agreement Corporations, and since Section 25, paragraph 4, specifically authorizes the Board to prescribe limits for "loans and extensions of credit" made by a U.S. bank to its foreign bank subsidiaries, the Agreement Corporation exemption in Section 23A, paragraph 3(3), does not appear to be applicable to foreign bank subsidiaries, except in the case of a wholly-owned foreign bank subsidiary of an Agreement Corporation.

[5] The terms "organization" and "company" are used here interchangeably and include any corporation, business trust, association, partnership, or similar organization.

[6] In early 1977 the Board sent to Congress proposed amendments to Section 22 of the Federal Reserve Act pertaining to bank loans and extensions of credit to "insiders."

[7] The Board recommends that the purchase of low quality assets by a bank from any affiliate be prohibited (see p. 32). Under present law (Section 23A, paragraph 4) a bank can purchase an unlimited amount of loans on a non-recourse basis from an affiliated bank.

[8] For purposes of this statute, a "low quality asset" is defined as any asset: (1) classified as "substandard," "doubtful," or "loss" or treated as "other loans especially mentioned" in the most recent report of examination prepared by either a Federal or State regulatory agency; (2) carried by the bank in a non-accrual status; (3) on which principal or interest payments are more than 30 days past due; or (4) whose terms have been renegotiated and/or compromised due to the financial condition of the obligor.

[9] It should be noted that the parent holding company and any nonbank subsidiaries of the parent are treated as separate affiliates. However, in order to preclude an affiliate other than the parent holding company from organizing its own subsidiaries to take advantage of the more liberal quantitative limitations applicable to multiple affiliates, the term "affiliate" is defined, except in the case of a parent holding company, to include any 25 per cent or more owned subsidiaries of that affiliate.

[10] Present quantitative limitations restrict a bank's transactions with a single affiliate to no more than 10 per cent of the bank's capital and surplus and transactions with all affiliates combined to no more than 20 per cent of the bank's capital and surplus.

[11] For example, present law (Section 23A, paragraph 4) exempts non-interest-bearing correspondent balances from the limitations of Section 23A. This exemption is not limited to sister banks within a holding company but applies to banks within a chain banking organization as well. However, interest-bearing balances enjoy no such exemption, even among sister banks within a holding company organization. Nor do sister subsidiary banks presently enjoy any exemption under Section 23A with regard to other interbank transactions, including transactions in Federal funds. (1963 Board Interpretation No. 4016.)

[12] Some historical background may be useful at this point. When the Bank Holding Company Act of 1956 was originally enacted, it prohibited a bank from extending credit to, or buying the stock or obligations of, its parent holding company and any other subsidiary of the parent. The only exemption to this prohibition pertained to certain non-interest-bearing deposit transactions between sister banks.

The 1966 Amendments to the Bank Holding Company Act repealed this prohibition and substituted for it a provision whereby a bank became subject to Section 23A's limitations on transactions with its parent holding company and other (bank and nonbank) subsidiaries of the parent. In addition, the purchase of loans on a non-recourse basis from an affiliated bank (along with certain non-interest-bearing deposit transactions) was exempted from the restrictions of Section 23A. This exemption was recommended by the Board on the grounds that both banks in any transaction would be under the supervision and examination of the bank supervisory authorities and that such transactions would allow bank portfolio adjustments in response to changes in deposits and loan demand.

[14] Refer to p. 32.

[15] It should be noted that this privilege would not be extended to chain banking organizations. In fact, this proposal would no longer allow the exemption for the purchase of loans on a non-recourse basis between banks in a chain system. It is recognized that chain banking systems may be operationally similar to bank holding companies and branching systems. However, unlike banks in a chain organization, banks within a bank holding company are subject to a layer of Federal regulation above the individual bank level. Accordingly, the Board believes that the potential for bank abuse as a result of this liberalization of Section 23A is less if the bank is a member of a holding company group than if it is a member of a chain group.

[16] The choice of 80 per cent as the dividing line was necessarily arbitrary. However, it should be noted that holding companies have a tax incentive to own 80 per cent or more of a bank and in most cases do own more than an 80 per cent interest.

[17] In those cases where the holding company owns or controls 80 per cent or more of the shares of both banks, minority shareholders would not receive any special protection from Section 23A, but would still have access to the courts in cases of actual abuse.

[18] Member banks are generally prohibited from purchasing stocks for their own account. However, there are certain exceptions to this prohibition, and it is these (majority-owned) exceptions, along with any permitted subsidiaries of insured nonmember banks, that are generally included as affiliates under this provision of present law.

[19] Section 25, paragraph 4, of the Federal Reserve Act and Regulation M, Section 213.5.

[20] In 1968, the Board recognized a State member bank to have wholly-owned operations subsidiaries, i.e., "organizations designed to serve, in effect, as separately incorporated departments of the bank, performing at locations at which the bank is authorized to engage in business, functions that the bank is empowered to perform directly." (Board Interpretation No. 4215.) Then in 1970, the Board exempted from Section 23A's restrictions transactions between a State member bank and its operations subsidiary. (Board Interpretation No. 4105).

[21] One exception to this recommendation pertains to the case of a (domestic) bank subsidiary of another (domestic) bank. In this rare situation the Board would view the subsidiary bank and its parent bank as equivalent to sister bank subsidiaries within a holding company system. On that basis, the parent bank and its subsidiary bank should be defined as affiliates of one another, but that in the case of an 80 per cent or more owned subsidiary bank all transactions between the parent and its subsidiary bank (other than the purchase of low quality assets, which would be prohibited) would be exempt from the restrictions of Section 23A. The reason for prescribing this treatment for situations in which both the parent and its subsidiary banks are domestic banks is to ensure equal treatment among multibank holding company systems regardless of their organizational structure.

[22] As a policy matter, the Board generally distinguishes between a foreign joint venture and a foreign investment on the basis of a bank's ownership interest. Where a U.S. bank owns less than 25 per cent of a foreign company, the interest is deemed to be an "investment"; where a bank owns 25–50 per cent, the interest is defined as a "joint venture." (1976 Board Interpretation #5650, note 1; and Federal Reserve Bulletin, July, 1974, p. 518, note 2.)

[23] By interpretive ruling #5650 in 1976, the Board expressed its recognition of the possibility that a U.S. banking organization may at times feel compelled for business reasons to provide financial support to a foreign joint venture substantially in excess of the U.S. banking organization's original equity investment and, in some situations, well in excess of its pro rata share. As a consequence, the Board indicated that in considering applications by U.S. banking organizations to invest in foreign joint ventures, it would henceforth give consideration to the potential risks associated with such support, primarily in the case of proposed new joint venture investments.

[24] This problem is mitigated, however, by the fact that joint ventures are generally small relative to the size of their U.S. parent bank. Consequently, the quantitative limitations of Section 23A would not necessarily be a significant restriction.

[25] With the possible exception of one instance, these rescue operations were well within the means of the U.S. parent bank's financial resources and posed no danger to the banks. The ability to rescue their foreign joint ventures enabled the banks involved to protect their existing investments, reputations, and long-term access to a country.

[26] As a precedent for this proposal, Section 25, paragraph 4, of the Federal Reserve Act gives the Board authority to restrict bank "loans and extensions of credit" to foreign bank subsidiaries where it deems necessary. In fact, in the case of minority-owned foreign bank subsidiaries, this proposal would represent only an extension of this present authority.

[27] In addition, the Board recommends that it be given authority to restrict bank transactions with minority-owned subsidiaries (whether owned directly or indirectly) of a sister bank within a holding company system. Since a non-parent holding company "affiliate" was earlier defined to include its 25 per cent or more owned subsidiaries, this proposal would ensure that the liberal treatment proposed for 80 per cent or more owned sister banks within a holding company system would not also be guaranteed to a minority-owned subsidiary of a sister bank, in contravention of any restrictions that the Board might impose on transactions between that minority-owned subsidiary and its own parent bank.

[28] An important effect of this change would be to define a chain of one-bank holding companies as affiliates of one another's subsidiary banks.

[29] Section 2(b)(2, 3) of the Banking Act of 1933.

[30] Section 2(b)(4) of the Banking Act of 1933.

[31] The Bank Holding Company Act of 1956, as amended, defines "control" as the power (a) to vote 25 per cent or more of any class of voting securities or (b) to control in any manner the election of a majority of the directors or trustees of a bank or nonbank company.

[32] Where trustees control 25 per cent or more of the shares of a bank for the benefit of shareholders who control 25 per cent or more of the shares of another bank, each bank would be defined as an affiliate of the other.

[33] Generally, REITs that are sponsored and advised by a banking organization are tied to the sponsoring organization in three ways. First, there is usually a contract between some entity in the banking organization and the REIT whereby the entity advises the REIT with respect to investments and investment policy and administers the day-to-day operations of the REIT, subject to the supervision of the trustees. Second, the banking organization generally selects the trustees, of which one or several, but less than a majority, are usually associated with the banking organization. Third, the REIT generally has a name similar to that of its sponsoring banking organization. The result of these ties is generally a "non-arm's-length" relationship between the bank and the advised REIT. In fact, banking organizations generally concede this "non-arm's-length" relationship, as evidenced by statements in the prospectuses for bank-sponsored REITs. To quote from one such prospectus, "The transactions [of the REIT] with the Adviser or its affiliates may be considered not to be at arm's-length, although the Declaration of Trust requires that transactions must be approved or ratified by a majority of the Trustees or of the Investment Committee who are not affiliated with the Adviser. Because of the relationship of the Adviser to the Trust the Adviser will be in a position to exercise considerable influence in the affairs of the Trust."

[34] It should be noted that this would not generally apply to shares acquired by a bank as a result of a defaulted loan since a subsidiary of a bank would not be defined as an affiliate for purposes of Section 23A, unless that subsidiary is itself a bank.

[35] This recommendation is consistent with Section 4(c)(2) of the Bank Holding Company Act, as amended, which exempts from the prohibitions of Section 4(a) of the Act ". . . shares acquired by a bank in satisfaction of a debt previously contracted in good faith, but such bank shall dispose of such shares within a period of two years from the date on which they were acquired, . . ."

[36] In the case of such affiliate relationships established prior to the enactment of these amendments to Section 23A, the Board would permit the exemption to continue for a period of two years, commencing with the date of enactment of the amending legislation.

[37] For example, bank loans to any single borrower are limited to a certain percent (normally 10 per cent) of the bank's capital and surplus.

[38] Companies described in Section 4(c)(1) are those engaged solely in: (a) holding or operating properties used wholly or substantially by any banking subsidiary or acquired for such future use; (b) conducting a safe deposit business; (c) furnishing services to or performing services for such bank holding company or its banking subsidiaries; and (d) liquidating assets acquired from such bank holding company or its banking subsidiaries or acquired from any other source prior to May 9, 1956, or the date on which such company became a bank holding company, whichever is later.

[39] The term "low quality asset" is defined on p. 7, note 2.

[40] In 1974, the Board issued an interpretation of Section 23A stating that the term "discount" meant "purchase," and that a bank's purchase at face value of a mortgage note from an affiliate was covered by Section 23A even though such purchase was not technically at a discount. (Board Interpretation #4110.)

[41] Presumably, asset "purchases" would also include asset "swaps."

[42] Ineligible acceptances are time drafts accepted by a bank that do not meet the requirements for discount with a Federal Reserve Bank.

[43] While there may be some difference in the credit risk associated with an eligible as opposed to an ineligible acceptance, all acceptances involve at least some credit risk.

[44] A reason for including this particular type of secured loan as a covered transaction is that the unaffiliated party might be serving as a conduit for channeling bank funds to an affiliate. The bank makes a loan to the unaffiliated party, who uses the proceeds to buy securities issued by the affiliate and then pledges these securities as collateral for its bank loan.

[45] The one exception is a bank subsidiary of another bank.

[46] Refer to p. 23, note 1.

[47] In a 1971 Interpretation, the Board stated that it would include undivided profits (defined to include certain reserves) as part of "capital stock and surplus." (Board Interpretation #2309.)

[48] Paper that is eligible for rediscount or purchase by the Federal Reserve Banks is generally limited to notes, drafts, bills of exchange, and banker's acceptances issued or drawn for agricultural, industrial or commercial purposes, and generally having a maturity of not more than 90 days.

[49] The term "low quality asset" is defined on p. 7, note 2.

[50] Section 23A, paragraph 4, of the Federal Reserve Act.

[51] The Board recommends that the collateral value to loan amount percentage for stocks be raised to 130 per cent (the highest percentage in the proposed list) from 120 per cent (which is the highest percentage in the present statute).

[52] See p. 7, note 2, for the definition.

THE AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION AND THE GENOCIDE TREATY

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, 2 years ago the American Bar Association passed a resolution which should have paved the way for the speedy ratification of the Genocide Treaty.

On February 17, 1976, the ABA recommended "the accession of the United States to the United Nations Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide." I am proud to point out that the statement accompanying this resolution was made by Bruno Bitker, a native of Milwaukee. Bitker, who was the chairman of the Committee on International Rights of the ABA, explained the bar's reasons for supporting a treaty it had formerly refused to endorse. He said,

". . . in 1949, the A.B.A. had decided not to support ratification because the treaty 'involves important constitutional questions . . .' not satisfactorily resolved . . . However upon further study and consideration, in February, 1976, the A.B.A. reversed its position and by an overwhelming vote recommended the ratification of the Convention."

The implications of this reversal are significant. The ABA's reluctance to endorse the treaty was based on the need to study the complex legal questions of a treaty making genocide a crime under international law.

But these constitutional questions have now been resolved. If one examines the arguments made against the Genocide Treaty, it becomes clear that they rely heavily on constitutional grounds. Therefore, it is now possible to ratify the treaty with full confidence.

This is a rare opportunity to further the cause of human rights. I therefore urge the immediate ratification of the Genocide Treaty.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I withhold that, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, does any other Senator wish recognition?

I believe the distinguished Senator from South Carolina wishes to make a statement.

DEATH OF J. O. WILLIS OF AIKEN, S.C.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, a distinguished South Carolina educator, Mr.

J. O. Willis of Aiken, S.C., passed away February 4, 1978.

It had been my pleasure to know Mr. Willis personally for a number of years. My association with him grew out of his position as principal of Aiken High School for 29 years.

During that period I had many opportunities to work with him on matters of importance to the school and to the students. In all instances he executed his duties in the most exemplary manner.

Besides his considerable administrative abilities, Mr. Willis established a beneficial rapport with his students. He took a deep interest in every problem brought to him, whether it was academic or personal. Because of this attitude, he was loved and respected by the students and their support enabled him to accomplish much for the school.

Upon his retirement in 1974, Mr. Willis was honored for his long service and achievements over the years. This expression of appreciation took special note of his "constant interest and concern for those under his supervision."

My wife, Nancy Moore Thurmond, was a student at Aiken High during his principalship. She remembers him as a kind, dedicated person whose life touched and improved the lives of all with whom he came in contact.

The untimely death of Mr. Willis was a shock to his wide circle of friends and former students. He will be greatly missed by all, and I hasten to extend to his family my heartfelt sympathy. Mrs. Thurmond joins me in this expression.

Mr. President, an article published in the Aiken Standard newspaper on February 6, 1978, titled "J. O. Willis, Former Principal Dies," and an editorial of the same date titled "J. O. Willis" recognize the many professional achievements of Mr. Willis. I ask unanimous consent that these two articles be printed at this point, along with a letter to the editor by my wife, in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Aiken Standard, Feb. 6, 1978]

J. O. WILLIS, FORMER PRINCIPAL, DIES

James Otis Willis, 65, principal of Aiken High School for 29 years, died Saturday at Aiken Community Hospital after a short illness.

The funeral was to be held at 3:30 p.m. today at St. Johns United Methodist Church. The Rev. Robert E. James, the Rev. Fulton S. James, and the Rev. Buddy S. Miller were to officiate. Burial was to follow at Aiken Memorial Park. George Funeral Home was in charge.

The family has suggested contributions may be made to the J. O. Willis Scholarship Fund. They can be sent care of Aiken High School.

All Area One schools closed at 2 p.m. today to allow teachers and students to attend funeral services.

Born in McCormack, Mr. Willis was a son of the late Charlie W. and Fannie Luella Singleton Willis. He graduated from McCormick High School, and then earned his bachelor's and master's degrees from the University of South Carolina. He later did additional graduate work at Duke University.

His 40-year career as an educator began at Pinewood High School in Sumter. Later he served as principal at Bishopville High School, and in July 1947 he came to Aiken to serve as principal of Aiken High.

His retirement from that past at the end of the 1975–1976 school year was marked by a special dinner in his honor, attended by over 200 former students and fellow educators, as well as others in the community.

Even before his retirement, though, he was honored by his students. In April 1974 the Aiken High School Key Club organized a tribute to their principal, expressing their appreciation for "his constant interest and concern for those under his supervision."

The ceremony was a surprise to Mr. Willis, who had thought he was going to participate in an Educator Appreciation Night honoring other teachers.

At the annual Awards Day ceremony in 1975, the Eight-Fifteen Club of Aiken High gave Mr. Willis a service award for his devotion to the school.

His local community has also honored him by naming the new vocational wing at Aiken High School after him. His national honors as an educator include his being listed in the 1969 edition of Who's Who in American Education and the 1971 yearbook, Leaders of American Secondary Education.

He served as head of the Aiken County Education Association, the State Executive Commission of Secondary Schools and the High School Standards Committee.

He was a member of St. Johns United Methodist Church, and served as a Sunday School teacher and as a member of the Official Board. He was also a charter member of the Bishopville Kiwanis Club.

County School Board Chairman Emilie Towler expressed her sorrow at Mr. Willis' death and described Mr. Willis as "a dedicated, gentle school administrator." He had an understanding nature and was "especially interested in the welfare of his students," she said.

She recalled that Mr. Willis' calm leadership had been "a great help" in the implementation of school desegregation in the early 1960s and early '70s.

"When he was principle, his total interest was the students," related Margaret Cato, who has taught at Aiken High for years. "He was concerned with people, with helping people. I know I have heard numerous former students comment how he helped them—even some of the ones you might have called troublemakers."

Pat (Mrs. Arthur B.) Emrich, a former student body president at Aiken High, said, "I remember him as being very available, a quiet, unhurried kind of man, and a very good friend."

Another former student body president, Robert M. Cook, who was at Aiken High the year Mr. Willis came, commented that he was the one who started a contest to come up with the school symbol, the Hornet; Mr. Willis was also the one who started the yearbook, he added.

"I would repeat again what I said at his retirement dinner on behalf of all the hornets who've flown from the hive, thanks for a job well done."

Aiken County School Superintendent T. B. Willis said: "The high esteem in which he was held by his colleagues and young people whose lives he touched attests to the fact that J. O. Willis was a man dedicated to encouraging his students to achieve excellence in their lives. He continually promoted the highest principles of education. More important, his life and career were undergirded by a deep Christian faith."

Percy E. Basley, recently retired Area One superintendent, remembered Mr. Willis' keen sense of humor and his way of telling stories.

"He had a special knack for obtaining scholarships for students," he added. "He was one of the best principals the state of South Carolina has ever known."

His heart was as big as his body. He had the pupils' interest always at heart," commented John B. Eubanks, retired Aiken High teacher who worked with Mr. Willis for years.

Miss Cato recalled that Mr. Willis was always able to carry on a conversation on any subject. He played both the piano and the organ, she remembered. On days when the faculty heard organ music coming from the gym, they knew Mr. Willis was upset about something and had gone to play the organ in the gym for a while to calm himself.

"He did a great deal to build Aiken High School to where it was noted academically across the state," she added.

Mr. Willis leaves his widow, the former Jeannie Lee Stacy Willis of 1010 Kerr Dr. SW; a daughter, Carolyn (Mrs. Fred Williams of North Augusta; and a son, James O. Willis Jr., of Arlington, Mass. One of 17 children, Mr. Willis is also survived by four sisters and seven brothers; Mrs. Robert Lewis, of Aiken; Mrs. Paul James of Martinez, Ga.; Mrs. L. P. Richardson and Mrs. J. P. Pinson, both of Anderson; Carl Willis, Paul Willis, Dewey Willis, Archie Willis, and Manley Willis, all of McCormack; Lee Willis, of Greenville; and Frank Willis of Calhoun Falls.

Mr. Willis also leaves three grandchildren. Active pallbearers will be W. R. Willis, William Gannon, P. E. Beasley, James Taylor, L. C. Jones, and Gene Jennings.

Honorary pallbearers will be the James Cannon Bible Class and the Katie Williams Bible Class, A. J. Rutland, L. L. Willis, Paul Knox, Dr. Beecher Morton, Jr., and James Dawsey.

[From the Aiken Standard, Feb. 6, 1978]

"J. O. WILLIS"

The 29 years during which J. O. Willis served as principal of Aiken High School could easily be termed the most tumultuous in the school's history. The ordeals that characterized those years were felt most keenly among the youth who were his responsibility.

Beginning in 1954 when the Supreme Court held segregation on the basis of color to be unconstitutonal, the schools were under increasing pressure to achieve compliance. Early in the 1970s all traces of a dual system were finally removed, and it was apparent that the nation had placed on the schools the greatest part of the desegregation burden.

Almost simultaneously came the Viet Nam war and the youth revolt that accompanied it. The period was characterized by violence, disrespect for authority and an alarming increase in the use of drugs and alcohol.

Mr. Willis throughout those years presided over the local high school with calmness and good humor, his gentle nature often serving as oil on troubled waters. He took a deep and sincere interest in his students, and he followed their careers long after they reached adulthood.

He lived to see many alumni return to express appreciation for the guidance and inspiration he provided them.

Upon his retirement in 1976, the school board chose to name the vocational wing of the high school in his honor. He was often recognized for his leadership in the field of education.

A graduate of the University of South Carolina and Duke University, Mr. Willis became a charter member of the Kiwanis Club in Bishopville, where he taught school as a young man. In Aiken, he was a teacher of an adult Sunday school class and a member of the official board of St. John's United Methodist Church.

Aiken and particularly several generations of its young people owed a great debt to J. O. Willis, who died Feb. 4 after a relatively short illness.

He will be missed from our community.

The Aiken Standard extends its deepest sympathies to his family.

[From the Aiken Standard, Feb. 15, 1978]

"J. O. WILLIS, FRIEND, ADIVSER"

To the Editor:

It was with deep regret that I learned of the passing of Mr. James Otis Willis.

Mr. Willis was a friend as well as an advisor to all those under his guidance. During his years as principal of Aiken High School (1947–1975) he had a tremendous influence on the young people there. He possessed a wonderful sense of humor and always took time to listen to questions from the students and to assist in solving their problems—big or small.

He will be missed not only by those in educational circles but also by those in our entire community. Mr. Willis was an outstanding gentleman and a dedicated American who lived his life to the fullest by giving of himself freely to others. He will long be remembered by myself and by all the other graduates of Aiken High School.

NANCY THURMOND.

COLUMBIA, S.C.

DEATH OF THOMAS ALBERT WOFFORD

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, it is my sad responsibility to inform the Senate of the death of one of its former members, Thomas A. Wofford of Greenville, S.C. Tom Wofford passed away on Saturday, February 26, at the age of 69, after a lifetime of able and dedicated public service.

Tom Wofford had an intellect of the first caliber. He was a graduate of the University of South Carolina and of Harvard Law School. His sharp, logical mind took to the law instinctively; it was almost second nature to him. He was admitted to the South Carolina Bar Association in 1931 and practiced continuously until the time of his death.

His prowess as an attorney is amply demonstrated by some of the legal assignments he was chosen to undertake. Tom Wofford served, at various times, as an assistant solicitor, an assistant U.S. district attorney, a special circuit judge, and president of the Greenville Bar Association. He was held in the highest esteem by the legal profession throughout the State of South Carolina.

Interestingly, I can claim Tom Wofford as both my predecessor and my successor in the U.S. Senate—though in reverse order. When I ran for the Senate in 1954, in a write-in campaign, I promised that, if elected, I would resign from my seat early in the 1956 election so as to enable the people of South Carolina to select their candidate in the primary election. I did resign pursuant to my promise, and the then-Governor of South Carolina, George Bell Timmerman, had to make an interim appointment. His choice fell upon Tom Wofford, and an excellent choice it was.

Tom Wofford performed his senatorial duties conscientiously and effectively. Freed from the demands of politics, he was able to devote himself to lawmaking and to furthering the interests of his State. He was a caretaker, but only in the sense of the noble steward in the Bible who went out and put to good use what had been entrusted to him.

When his interim tenure in the Senate ended with my reelection, he left behind many friends and admirers here in Washington. Some members of my staff had stayed on to work on his staff, and I particularly remember how fond of him they had become. No doubt those Senators who go back to those days all have their own pleasant memories of Tom Wofford.

Tom Wofford was a devoted family man, and one of the advantages of his return to Greenville in 1956 was that it gave him more time to spend with his charming wife and his five children. He did not abandon political life altogether, however, for he himself waged a successful write-in campaign in 1966 for the State Senate. In 1968, he was a delegate with me to the Republican National Convention. He served with distinction until 1972 in the South Carolina State Senate, which was honored by the membership of a former member of the U.S. Senate. Tom Wofford, as is obvious, was not a man to put on airs. He eagerly grasped every opportunity to render public service.

I know that the Senate will join me in extending sincere condolences to the family of Tom Wofford. His survivors include his wife Caro Wyche, of Greenville; his son Charles W. Wofford, of Greenville; his four daughters, Mrs. Oscar W. Bannister, Mrs. Charles W. Barker, and Mrs. Samuel B. Rouse, of Greenville, and Mrs. William O. Carpenter, of St. Petersburg, Fla.; his sisters, Mrs. Charles B. Siviter, of Pittsburgh, Pa., and Mrs. Vernon A. Crawford, of Black Mountain, N.C.; and his six grandchildren.

I know from personal experience what a privilege it was to have Tom Wofford as a friend, and what a tremendous sense of loss his passing occasions. For his fine family the sense of loss is even worse, but of course they had the greater privilege in being so close to this outstanding man. In character, achievement, and service to country, he ranks among the most eminent South Carolinians of his generation.

Mr. President, at the time of Tom Wofford's death, a number of articles appeared in South Carolina and regional newspapers. I know that my colleagues will be interested in them. In order that they may read these articles at their leisure, and in the hope that the exemplary life which these articles describe may influence others for the good, I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Greenville News and Piedmont, Feb. 26, 1978]

THOMAS WOFFORD, FORMER SENATOR, DIES

Former U.S. Senator Thomas Albert Wofford, 69, of Riverbend Apartments, died Saturday after a long illness.

Born in Laurens, he was the son of the late John Albert and Cleo Cunningham Wofford. He was the husband of Caro Wyche Wofford.

Wofford was appointed to the Senate in 1956 by then-Gov. George Bell Timmerman to fill the unexpired term of Strom Thurmond, who resigned. Wofford served as a senator for about eight months.

He was a graduate of University of South Carolina and Harvard University Law School.

He was admitted to the South Carolina Bar Association in 1931 and was a practicing attorney in Greenville.

He was a Trustee of Winthrop College from 1944–1956, Assistant Solicitor of the 13th Judical Circuit from 1935 through 1936, Assistant U.S. District Attorney-Greenville from 1937–43, Special Circuit judge 1945, 1953 and 1961.

He had also served as President of the Greenville Bar Association in 1965. He was chairman of the Greenville County Legislative Delegation 1966–68, during which time funds for the Greenville County Library where appropriated by the State Legislature.

He served as State Senator from 1966 through 1972 and was a Delegate to the U.S. Republican Convention in 1968.

He was a member of Pendleton Street Baptist Church.

Surviving also are daughters, Mrs. Oscar W. Bannister, Mrs. Charles W. Barker and Mrs. Samuel B. Rouse of Greenville and Mrs. William O. Carpenter of St. Petersburg, Fla.; a son, Charles W. Wofford of Greenville; sisters, Mrs. Charles C. Elmers and Mrs. Chalmers Siviter of Pittsburgh, Pa., and Mrs. Vernon A. Crawford of Black Mountain, N.C.; a brother, Bruce W. Wofford of Gastonia, N.C.; and nine grandchildren.

Services wil be at 2 p.m. Monday in Woodlawn Memorial Park.

The family is at the home of a daughter, Mrs. Charles W. Barker, 65 Winfield Road.

The family requests that flowers be omitted and memorials be made to the American Cancer Society.—The Mackey Mortuary.

THOMAS ALBERT WOFFORD, EX-STATE SENATOR, DIES

GREENVILLE.—Thomas Albert Wofford, 69, a former state senator and Greenville attorney, died Saturday at a Greenville hospital.

Born in Laurens, he was a son of the late John Albert and Cleo Cunningham Wofford.

A 1923 graduate of the University of South Carolina, he received a law degree from Harvard University in 1931.

He was a trustee of Winthrop College from 1944–56, assistant solicitor for the 13th Judicial Circuit from 1935–36 and assistant U.S. District Attorney for Greenville from 1937–43.

He was a special circuit judge and president of the Greenville Bar Association and chairman of the Greenville County Legislative Delegation.

He served in the South Carolina Senate from 1966–72 and was a delegate to the U.S. Republican Convention in 1968.

Surviving are four daughters, Mrs. Oscar W. Bannister, Mrs. Charles W. Barker and Mrs. Samuel B. Rouse of Greenville and Mrs. William O. Carpenter of St. Petersburg, Fla.; a son, Charles W. Wofford of Greenville; three sisters, Mrs. Charles C. Elmers, Mrs. Chalmers Siviter of Pittsburgh, Pa., and Mrs. Vernon A. Crawford of Black Mountain, N.C.; a brother, Bruce W. Wofford of Gastonia, N.C.; and nine grandchildren.

Services will be 2 p.m. Monday in Woodlawn Memorial Park.

Mackey Mortuary is in charge.

THOMAS WOFFORD: RARE INDIVIDUAL

Greenville attorney Thomas A. Wofford figured in historymaking events in South Carolina in the last couple of decades and coined a phrase which says much about the exciting era in which he played an important role.

Wofford was appointed by Gov. George Bell Timmerman, Jr., as interim United States senator to "fill in" for Sen. Strom Thurmond after the latter resigned to carry out a "write-in" general election campaign promise to run again in the next primary.

He later was elected to the State Senate from Greenville, running as a Republican against the incumbent Democrat, Bradley Morrah Jr., who was running for re-election and also for the U.S. Senate against Thurmond.

Earlier as a South Carolina Democrat, Wofford had been an assistant U.S. district attorney and an assistant state circuit solicitor. He also served as a trustee for Winthrop College.

Wofford was well known in both legal and political circles as a brilliant, tough advocate. He was a powerful and colorful figure. He was a strong person who practiced as well as professed rugged individualism.

Wofford was credited with the description of Strom Thurmond as a "political institution" above political parties.

In recent years ill health kept Wofford out of the public eye. But he is remembered still by numerous Greenvillians and by people throughout this state. His recent death brings sorrow to many friends, here and elsewhere.

SOLAR POWER AS A VIABLE ENERGY SOURCE

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise today to announce my strong support of solar prower as a viable and worthwhile energy source. It is appropriate, in my opinion, that the American people devote their energies to the development of all types of energy technology. I realize that controversy exists among scholars in the energy community as to whether "hard" technology, petroleum, coal, and nuclear, or "soft," such as solar and geothermal, is better. It is not my intention to enter that fray. My stand on the development of hard technology is well known. For instance, I have repeatedly voted for the removal of price controls on natural gas.

In addition, in my own State, we have a number of nuclear facilities, including the Barnwell Nuclear Fuel Plant and a number of nuclear electricity generating plants. More such plants are planned, as it is the conviction of South Carolinians that nuclear power is clean and efficient, that the safety record of American nuclear plants is impeccable, and that when the coal strike endangered electric power generation in many parts of the country, nuclear plants continued to operate reliably.

Mr. President, it is incumbent upon us to look to the future in our search for a solution to the energy problems which we face. Right now, I think it is safe to say that our economy is petroleum-daily. The effect of this on the American people for oil and oil products is voracious. Oil imports from the OPEC countries represent a form of blackmail, with gasoline prices rising higher almost daily. The effect of this on the American dollar and our economy is devastating.

Experts in the energy field foresee nuclear and coal resources as fulfilling our energy needs between the time that we shift from oil products to these sources, and the middle of the 21st century. What, then should our long-term goals be for energy research and development? Solarpower, to me, ought to receive first priority.

Solar power is abundant, it is dependable, and it is free. Unlike the fossil fuels, such as oil and gas, sunlight "flows" and is not a finite "stock" as we know it. Unlike finite fuel technology, improvements of which lead to exhaustion of the source, solar technology improvements lead to the better utilization of the source, followed by lower prices.

SOLAR HEATING AND COOLING

The process of using the Sun to heat water, which is subsequently used for heating and cooling, is simple. Unfortunately, the United States is far behind other nations in the development of related technology. For example, as I understand it, Israel has 200,000 homes with solar water heaters, Japan—over 2 million.

Systems which have been developed to heat and cool residential and commercial buildings are of two types, active and passive. Many feel that the use of passive systems—those which store energy right where the sunlight strikes the buildings walls and floors—is the most efficient and cost-effective way to heat and cool new buildings. Active systems, while more expensive due to the need for circulating equipment, can—when used in combination with passive systems—supply solar self-sufficiency to almost any region in this country.

SOLAR CELLS

The photovoltaic cell— the principal power source in our space satellites—is the most exciting solar electric prospect in the energy inventory. These cells generate electricity directly when sunlight falls on them. The advantages are numerous: they have no moving parts, consume no fuel, produce no pollution, operate at environmental temperatures, last a long time, and require little maintenance. Also, these cells can be fashioned from silicon, the second most abundant element in the Earth's crust.

STORING SUNLIGHT

Critics of solar energy point to the fact that is is an interruptible source, that it is too diffuse, intermittent and seasonally variable to serve human needs. However, it should be noted that every energy source is interruptible: power lines break, trucks back into oil pipelines, reservoirs which supply water for electricity from hydroelectric dams run dry, and nuclear plants need to be refueled. As a matter of logic, the intermittent nature of solar power can be advantageous. Virtually all areas in America have peak electrical demands during daylight hours, those during which solar facilities operate at an optimum.

SOLAR COSTS

I suppose, Mr. President, that the most frequently voiced criticism of solar energy is that its cost is prohibitive, thus making widespread application impossible. Responses to this criticism are obvious. Since 1973 the cost of solar equipment has steadily dropped while costs of other sources have rocketed. One estimate states that today's $25 a square foot collector will cost but $10 a square foot in 1981, this reduction due in large part to that American phenomenon known as mass production. As an aside, I would like to add that experts in industry and Government, including Dr. George Walters, president of Solar Systems of Hayward, Calif., and Secretary of Energy James Schlesinger, have voiced the message that home solar heating is now economical, and should not be viewed as an exotic novelty. Mr. President, I believe that it is up to the solar industry, solar industry enthusiasts and the Government to make a joint commitment to change public attitudes.

HELPING THE THIRD WORLD

In the realm of foreign policy, Mr. President, I see no reason why the Federal Government could not use solar technology for its foreign assistance programs. Think of it. To me, solar energy could possibly be argued to be even more important in the Third World than domestically. Developing countries in Africa, South Asia, and Latin America almost always have abundant sunlight. In addition, population patterns in these areas are decentralized, with the majority in each being in rural regions. The extremely high costs of present energy sources in these villages make the solar option economically competitive, at the very least.

AGRICULTURE AND SOLAR POWER

America is now well aware of the plight of its farmers. One solution to a small part of this important problem may lie in Federal assistance to the development of solar power for agriculture. Just recently, I sent a letter to Senator THOMAS EAGLETON, chairman of the Subcommittee on Agriculture of the Senate Appropriations Committee, seeking his support in obtaining a $67 million appropriation for an agricultural solar energy program in fiscal year 1979.

President Roosevelt brought the rural electrification program to our country areas. This program provided subsidized loans at 2 percent interest to get the Nation's electrical lines to the farms. It seems to me that one possible Federal response could be a like program for rural solarization.

THE SOLAR SOCIETY

Mr. President, as we look to the future energy needs of the Nation, and as we seek solutions to our immediate and longrange energy problems, we would be foolhardy to disregard the social changes which come with these transitions. History tells us that changes will come. The 18th century shift to coal brought the Industrial Revolution. The subsequent shift to petroleum led to the advent of the automobile, the supersonic transport, reshaped cities, and a smaller world.

Some energy sources, by their nature, demand centralization; solar sources are dispersable. Some sources engender profiteering cartels, solar sources narrow the gap between rich and poor, both here and abroad. Some sources are incredibly complex, involving technologies baffling to all but a few scientists; solar sources are universally understandable and useable.

Mr. President, I call on my colleagues to join me in rejecting political timidity and meeting the challenge of the future. One of the best futures we can choose is a solar-powered one. No one says that this will be an easy choice. Powerful interests now compete for Federal energy money and legislation, and are bound to continue to do so. Bureaucracy will be plagued, as always, by inertia. Ideas and designs will conflict, and people, being human, will be naturally reluctant to face up to the future.

Mr. President, I am optimistic. This great country, one blessed with inventors and entrepreneurs beyond count, one which claims Thomas Edison, George Washington Carver, and Henry Ford as its own, can and will meet the challenge. It is up to those of us in Washington to provide the leadership.

A QUESTIONABLE SUBSIDY

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, Mr. Charles Bartlett recently wrote an article for the Washington Star entitled "A Questionable Subsidy." This article addressed legislation, S. 270, that I have been concerned about in the past. I want to say now that current rumors concerning the resurrection of this bill are causing me more concern. I have said it before and I will say it now: The concept of consumer protection is a good one. No one can dispute that. But to subsidize lawyers in an atmosphere of "institutionalized confrontation" is a bad idea. Enough Senators on the Judiciary Committee realized this last summer to vote against reporting S. 270, and I hope that enough on the committee and in the full Senate still feel that way to defeat this measure should it be brought up.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article by Mr. Bartlett be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The mass of lawyers for whom the federal government has become a mother lode will find richer diggings than ever if Congress agrees to a plan to subsidize the activities of public-interest attorneys.

The premise of the Kennedy-Mathias proposal, as endorsed by President Carter, is that citizens who participate in regulatory deliberations in which they have no financial stake should be reimbursed for the costs of their efforts to affect the decisions. The aim is to insure that public interest spokesmen are as clearly heard in these forums as those who represent the government and private companies.

Complaining that cost is the chief obstacle to their efforts to block dams, nuclear plants, and other threats to the health and happiness of the people, the public interest lawyers are asking to be paid up to $50 an hour, plus costs for intervening in knowledgeable, relevant ways. To illustrate the costliness of this kind of participation, they report that the 1976 legal costs of CAB proceedings for the 10 major airlines was $2,851,000.

Their plan is being tried at the Federal Trade Commission, which has already paid over $1 million to 51 intervenors, mostly for testimony representing what one commissioner describes as "an extreme consumer view." These public interest lawyers participate in the deadly serious spirit that is characteristic of them and often furnish useful material which the commissioners would otherwise have to seek from the FTC staff.

There is plenty of competition for the ears of the regulators. The Washington Yellow Pages lists 71 columns of lawyers and 25 columns of trade associations. The latter are gathering into Washington at the rate of one per week and by the best available count, some 1,652 of them are already on the ground, doing battle for their members.

This accumulation of special interest talent gives the public interest lawyers reason to claim they can furnish some balance. The problem is that they pursue their own notions of the public interest and they tend, like other interest groups, to become part of the problem. If they are subsidized at the projected $10 million a year, they will, in the view of Joseph Swidler, a liberal regulator of long experience, institutionalize confrontation within the government.

In a pure democracy, all citizens would regularly participate in public deliberations. Jean Rousseau noted that the Greeks were constantly assembled in the public square because they had a mild climate, slaves to do their work and no greed for wealth. Their concern was with liberty.

However such pure democracies soon deteriorated because the factional nature of man transformed them, in James Madison's words, into "spectacles of turbulence and contention."

In a representative democracy, the use of public funds to pay self-appointed spokesmen to press their viewpoints in the name of the public can distort the system. If it were desirable to pay them to go before the regulatory interests, the same rewards should be available to all who expound what they claim to be the public interest before committees of Congress.

If the aim is deeper involvement of the public, logic would suggest that large sums be spent to bring representative masses here to press their views all over town.

The Carter White House is drafting an executive order directing all agencies to find creative, meaningful ways to bring the public into the decision-making process. This means taking surveys to discover how the people feel about the alternative solutions to regulatory problems. The President is pressing an effort to shape regulation to the popular taste.

This approach makes more sense than paying the costs of lawyers who claim to represent the public interest because they are hostile to government and business. They are more extreme than the average citizen on most of the issues in which they deal.

Mr. THURMOND. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business?

A RARE GENTLEMAN IS LEAVING OUR MIDST

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, it was with regret that we received the official word yesterday of the impending retirement from the Senate at the end of this session of our distinguished colleague from Mississippi, Senator JAMES O. EASTLAND. Senator EASTLAND first entered the Senate in 1941. For more than 36 years, he has ably represented the people of Mississippi in this Chamber, and he holds the record for longevity of tenure among the current Senate membership.

When applied to JAMES EASTLAND, the term "distinguished" assumes a renewed meaning. From the Latin, it signifies someone whose character and accomplishments are so superior that they stand out among their fellow men. This is an appropriate characterization of Senator EASTLAND.

JAMES EASTLAND is a native of Mississippi and the Deep South. After completing his formal education at the University of Mississippi and Vanderbilt, and receiving his law degree from the University of Alabama, he entered legal practice in his home State, and was elected to the State legislature, serving from 1928 until 1932. He again practiced law until 1941, when he was appointed to the U.S. Senate to complete the unexpired term of the late Senator Pat Harrison. In 1942, Senator EASTLAND was elected to his seat and has received the overwhelming endorsement of the people of Mississippi in five elections since then.

Senator EASTLAND has served his constituents with distinction for more than 3½ decades, and he must be considered a genuine philosophical descendant of the great John C. Calhoun. Throughout his career, JAMES EASTLAND has upheld the classic interpretation of a balance of responsibilities between the State and Federal governments, and he has won the admiration and respect of his colleagues thereby over the years. Through 22 years as chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, his insistence on the integrity of the law in our society has contributed significantly to the lives of all Americans.

Mr. President, when JAMES EASTLAND departs our midst and ends his tenure as President pro tempore, we shall bid farewell to a rare gentleman and a beloved friend. He will enter his retirement with the good wishes and deep appreciation of all his colleagues in the Senate, and we shall indeed miss him.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield to me?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. BAKER. I wish to be associated with him in the expression of good wishes to our distinguished President pro tempore (Mr. EASTLAND), who has announced his retirement from the Senate. Those of us who live in Tennessee know at first hand of the valuable service that the distinguished Senator from Mississippi has rendered to the public. I sometimes accuse him in jest of trying to annex the major city in my State, Memphis. Many Memphians do indeed regard Senator JIM EASTLAND as the third Senator from Tennessee.

We hold him in high respect and esteem. We will be sorry, indeed, to see him leave.

I am sure I express the sentiment of the people of my State in extending him our best wishes.

I thank the majority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the minority leader.

I yield to the distinguished Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN).

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I want to associate myself with the remarks of the distinguished majority leader and the distinguished minority leader with respect to the announcement of the retirement of Senator JAMES O. EASTLAND as the Senator from Mississippi.

Certainly, Senator EASTLAND's departure will leave a great void here in the Senate. I regard him as an outstanding statesman and one of the great Senators from a State that has produced many great Senators.

I have leaned on Senator EASTLAND for advice and for guidance since I have been in the U.S. Senate.

I must say that he is highly regarded in the State of Alabama, which I have the honor of representing. He is regarded there as one of the greatest Senators that the Nation has produced.

Things will never be the same in the U.S. Senate without Senator EASTLAND's presence here. Certainly, it will be the passing of an era when he leaves, because he has definitely left his mark on the U.S. Senate. I know of no Member of the Senate in recent times who has had the influence and the high regard of Members of the Senate that Senator EASTLAND has had through the years.

Certainly we will miss him. Much of the luster and greatness of the U.S. Senate will come to an end when Senator EASTLAND leaves these hallowed halls.

We recognize that he could have stayed in the Senate as long as he had a desire to do so.

We certainly wish for him many long and happy years in retirement and that he and Libby will enjoy their retirement.

We know he will never cease to have an interest in Government, an interest in the affairs of the Senate, the affairs of the Congress, and that his heart and his thoughts will forever be a part of the U.S. Senate.

I thank the distinguished majority leader for yielding to me.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN).

Mr. THURMOND. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes, I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOYNIHAN). The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I deeply regretted to learn that the distinguished Senator from Mississippi (Mr. EASTLAND) announced that he would not run again for the U.S. Senate.

I believe Senator EASTLAND first came to the Senate in 1941 by appointment and then later returned to the Senate after being elected in 1943 and has served here since that time.

This is one of the longest tenures of service of any Senator in the history of this country.

I have known Senator EASTLAND for many years. I have found him to be a man of character and integrity, a man who is dedicated to his country, a man who favors balanced budgets, a man who stands for a strong defense, and a man who is interested not in just legislating for the present generation, but also for the next generation.

Mr. President, I have had the pleasure of serving on the Judiciary Committee with Senator EASTLAND for a number of years. In the last few years, I have served as ranking minority member on that committee. In my opinion, he is one of the most capable, dependable, and finest chairmen of any Senate committee.

I have always found him courteous, helpful, and dependable. The Senate is going to suffer a great loss when he leaves.

I will have more to say later before his departure. But at this moment I just want to express my deep regrets that the able and distinguished Senator from Mississippi does not plan to run again.

It will be a loss to the Nation as well as to the State of Mississippi.

I want to take this opportunity to wish him and his family good health and happiness in future years.

THE CONVENTIONAL WISDOM

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, it has been the conventional wisdom in Washington for some time now that the Panama Canal treaties would be a political liability for any Senator who supported them. It has been contended that public opposition is so overwhelming that a Senator who supports the treaties runs a risk of having his constituents turn against him.

I, too, perhaps was reacting to that conventional wisdom when I said on the Senate floor, just before the historic vote on the Neutrality Treaty on Thursday, that—

> There is no political mileage in voting for these treaties, and there is no doubt in my mind but that every Senator who votes for these treaties will to some extent suffer a loss of support among his people.

Well, conventional wisdom is often proved wrong. That certainly seems to have been so in the case of our majority whip, the senior Senator from California, who came out strongly in support of the treaties more than a year ago.

Acting out of early conviction that the treaties are in the best interests of the United States—economically, militarily, and diplomatically—ALAN CRANSTON came out strongly in their support more than a year ago.

I think we are all pretty much aware of how hard ALAN has worked for the treaties among his fellow Senators. But he has also worked hard for the treaties among the people of California.

For more than a year, ALAN has spoken out for the treaty before all groups—businessmen, farmers, labor—up and down the length of California. And his views have been carried repeatedly by the mass media—newspapers, radio, and television—throughout his diverse and volatile State.

His activities have not gone unnoticed by opponents of the treaties in California who, most of us assume, are legion.

All of us in the Senate have been deluged with Panama Canal Treaty mail. But I do not know many of us who can match ALAN's figures. He tells me he has received 2,742 letters, postcards, and telegrams in favor of the treaties and 78,475 against.

Conventional wisdom would tell us that the treaties are a big issue in California and that ALAN must have lost support because of his stand on the treaties.

But, a poll made public Friday by Mervin Field, whose public opinion sampling in California have proved unusually reliable through the years, shows just the opposite.

An impressive 77 percent of the Californians who were polled just last month gave ALAN CRANSTON a highly favorable job rating. That was 4 points higher than his 73 percent good-job rating a year ago, in March 1977, shortly after he began talking out for the treaties.

Significantly, the survey reveals that there is a bipartisan aspect to the public's high regard for ALAN.

According to Mr. Field, twice as many Republicans say that CRANSTON is doing a good job as say that he is doing a poor job, and the ratio of good-job to poor-job ratings given CRANSTON by his fellow Democrats is better than 4 to 1.

Over the years that ALAN CRANSTON has been in the U.S. Senate, the Field poll has made six measurements of public opinion about him. There has been, according to Mr. Field, a steady increase in Senator CRANSTON's approval ratings. Obviously this is public recognition of the quality of ALAN CRANSTON as a U.S. Senator. Also one may fairly conclude that the supposed political liability of supporting the treaties has been highly exaggerated.

I bring this matter to my colleagues' attention because in other States this might also be true.

EXTENSION OF TIME TO INTRODUCE BILL

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished junior Senator from Missouri (Mr. DANFORTH) have until 6 p.m. this evening to introduce a bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SENATE RESOLUTION 425—ADDITIONAL EXPENDITURES, COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, on behalf of Mr. JACKSON, Mr. RIBICOFF, Mr. NUNN, and Mr. PERCY, I introduce a Senate resolution to amend Senate Resolution 370 agreed to by the Senate on March 6, 1978. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The resolution will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 425) to amend Senate Resolution 370, 95th Congress, authorizing additional expenditures by the Committee on Governmental Affairs for inquiries and investigations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to as follows:

S. RES. 425

Resolved, That section 3 of Senate Resolution 370, 95th Congress, agreed to March 6 (legislative day, February 6), 1978, is amended as follows:

(1) In the matter preceding paragraph (1) after "committee" insert ", or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof,".

(2) In the proviso to paragraph (1) after "committee" insert "or any subcommittee thereof".

(3) In the proviso following paragraph (7), after "committee" insert "or any subcommittee thereof".

(4) In subsection (c) after "committee" where it appears the first time insert ", or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof,".

(5) In subsection (c) after "committee" the second time it appears insert "or subcommittee".

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

SENATE RESOLUTION 423—AUTHORITY FOR A STAFF INVESTIGATOR TO PRESENT TESTIMONY

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of Calendar Order No. 654.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 423) to authorize a staff investigator of the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations to present himself and give executive session testimony before the Select Committee on Assassinations of the United States House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, is as follows:

Whereas, by letter dated March 16, 1978, the Chairman of the Select Committee on Assassinations of the United States House of Representatives has requested that Philip R. Manuel, a staff investigator of the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, appear and give executive session testimony before that body on matters pertinent to the inquiry currently being conducted by that body;

Whereas, the subject matter of that executive session testimony pertains to information obtained by Mr. Manuel in the course of his employment as a staff investigator for the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations; and

Whereas, by the privileges of the Senate of the United States and by Rule XXX of the Standing Rules of the Senate, no information secured by staff employees of the Senate pursuant to their official duties may be revealed without the consent of the Senate: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That Philip R. Manuel is authorized to present himself and give executive session testimony before the Select Committee on Assassinations of the United States House of Representatives pursuant to the written request of the Chairman of said Select Committee.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this resolution to the Honorable Louis Stokes, Chairman, Select Committee on Assassinations, United States House of Representatives, Washington, D.C. 20515.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

S. RES. 426—EXPRESSING APPRECIATION OF THE SENATE TO JAMES R. CALLOWAY

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, it is with considerable regret and sadness that I have learned of the retirement of James R. Calloway, the outstandingly able and dedicated chief counsel and staff director of the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

Since November 1972, when he was appointed to this important post by the late chairman, Senator John L. McClellan, Jim Calloway has effectively and efficiently served the Senate and the people of the United States during a significant period in our Nation's history.

Good staff work is an indispensable essential to the wise and sound deliberations of the Senate, and, speaking as a member of the Appropriations Committee, I can affirm that no committee has been better served in this respect than the Appropriations Committee during Jim Calloway's tenure.

Throughout his service, he has shown unusual qualities of tact, ability, and skill in fulfilling his committee duties. I am certain that virtually every Member of this body has, at one time or another, availed himself of Jim Calloway's experience, abilities, and advice. And I am equally certain that they have been completely satisfied with the results of these consultations.

Jim Calloway has loyally served the Senate for nearly three decades—and in that time he has become, as Senator McClellan described him, "a most skillful legislative technician" and "a professional in the finest sense and tradition of the term."

A native of Hot Springs, N.C., but a long-time resident of Delaware, Jim Calloway first came to the Senate in 1949 as a special assistant to Senator J. Allen Frear. He served in this post until 1960, except for 2 years in the U.S. Army in Korea.

In 1960, he was appointed a professional staff member of the Senate Committee on Government Operations and in 1966 was promoted to chief counsel and staff director. Among the significant legislation upon which the committee worked during that period were numerous proposals to reconstitute, restructure, and reorganize the Federal Government—including the establishment of the Department of Transportation.

As a close associate of Senator McClellan, Jim Calloway worked with him in establishing the Subcommittee on Criminal Laws of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, and in securing passage of several pieces of landmark anticrime legislation.

Few Senate committees have a wider realm of jurisdiction than the Appropriations Committee, and Jim Calloway proved to be an exceptionally skilled counsel and staff director. It was during his tenure that the new Budget Act was adopted, and he implemented the new procedures mandated by the act with thoroughness and expediency.

Thus, Jim Calloway's long years of service to the Senate have been filled with extraordinary achievement—testimony to his unparalleled professional abilities and his equally unusual personal qualities.

I know that I speak for all Members of the Senate when I say that we shall miss his loyal presence, his keen advice, and his administrative skill.

But we also take pride in his accomplishments because they reflect credit upon the Senate. We wish him continued success and every good fortune in whatever endeavors he may undertake.

Mr. President, on behalf of Mr. EAGLETON, I send to the desk a resolution in this respect and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

Mr. EAGLETON (for himself, Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD, Mr. BAKER, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. BAYH, Mr. CHILES, Mr. HUDDLESTON, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. SASSER, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. CASE, Mr. BROOKE, Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. PROXMIRE, and Mr. SCHWEIKER) proposes a resolution (S. Res. 426) to express the appreciation of the Senate to James R. Calloway.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, as a member of the Appropriations Committee for a number of years, I want to pay tribute to Jim Calloway.

He is an outstanding staff member. He impressed me from the very beginning with his understanding of very complicated issues on the Appropriations Committee, his willingness to work with all Members on both sides of the aisle, the great amount of time he spent helping members of the committee to develop an understanding of the biggest responsibility the Congress has, which is the responsibility for the purse. He was really a great contribution to the committee and to its work for many years.

I always have been impressed by the ability of the staff of the Appropriations Committee. It is a small staff, much smaller than I think most people realize. The work they have done is a great thing for the Senate and for the country.

I am very honored to have an opportunity to cosponsor this resolution.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution is agreed to; and, without objection, the preamble is agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

Whereas the Senate wishes to express its appreciation to James R. Calloway, who has served the United States Senate since 1959;

Whereas James R. Calloway has been Chief Counsel and Staff Director of the Senate Committee on Appropriations since 1972.

Whereas James R. Calloway served as Chief Counsel and Staff Director of the Senate Committee on Government Operations from 1965 through 1972;

Whereas James R. Calloway has discharged the difficult duties and responsibilities of his positions with high efficiency and abiding devotion which have earned for him our affection, respect, and esteem: Now, therefore, be it Resolved, That James R. Calloway is hereby commended for his long, faithful, and exemplary service.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate is directed to transmit a copy of this resolution to James R. Calloway.

● Mr. EAGLETON. During the past 5 years the Committee on Appropriations has had the distinct good fortune of being guided by a chief counsel and staff director of great ability, wisdom and skill. Of course, I am speaking of James R. Calloway, who is retiring on March 31 after nearly three decades of dedicated and highly professional service to the U.S. Senate and to the people of this country.

In early January of 1973, when I became a member of the Committee on Appropriations, one of the first staff members with whom I dealt was Jim Calloway. During the past 5 years of my tenure on the committee, I do not think anyone could have asked for more dedicated staff leadership and more dependable advice and counsel, not only about appropriations matters, but about many other facets of legislative business as well as tactics and strategies. Jim's wealth of experience—which included 11 years as special assistant for legislative matters on the staff of Senator Allen Frear of Delaware, 5 years as a professional staff member of the Senate Committee on Government Operations, and 6 years as chief counsel and staff director of the Senate Committee on Government Operations prior to his being appointed chief counsel and staff director of Appropriations in November, 1972—served all of the members of this committee well during a very important period of dynamic growth and change in the budgetary process of the Congress.

During his tenure, the total Federal budget rose from about a quarter of a trillion dollars to well over a half trillion dollars. During this same period, the Congress fashioned a new budget process and made it work. I need not tell my colleagues how important the dedicated work of staff members like Jim Calloway was and will continue to be in achieving continuing effective implementation of these new procedures.

While serving as chief counsel and staff director of the Committee on Government Operations, Jim helped the committee in its consideration of a variety of legislation, including scores of proposals to reconstitute, restructure and reorganize Federal departments and agencies, and in a variety of investigations into organized crime that led to enactment of landmark anticrime legislation in 1968—the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act.

I can only say that I fully endorse this resolution of commendation and appreciation for Jim Calloway.

Finally, I want to add a small personal note, in wishing both Jim and his wife Marcella the best of luck in their future endeavors. If the past is any guide to the future, his endeavors will, undoubtedly, be a success, just as they have been in the past for Jim throughout a long career of public service of which I am certain he is justifiably proud.●

COMMITTEE MEETING

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Governmental Affairs Committee be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today to consider S. 2236, the Omnibus Anti-Terrorism Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AUTHORIZATION FOR CERTAIN ACTION BY COMMITTEES ON THURSDAY, MARCH 30, 1978

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that all committees be authorized to report bills and resolutions between 9 a.m. and 3 p.m. on Thursday, March 30, 1978, during the nonlegislative period.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR FILING REPORT

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time the Committee on Governmental Affairs has for filing the report pursuant to section 310 of Senate Resolution 110, of the 95th Congress, be extended 1 week, to April 8, 1978.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AUTHORIZATION FOR CERTAIN ACTION WITH RESPECT TO PRESIDENTIAL MESSAGES DURING NONLEGISLATIVE PERIOD

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary of the Senate may be authorized to receive messages from the President of the United States during the nonlegislative period and that those messages may be appropriately referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE NOMINATION—DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the nomination of H. William Menard, of California, to be Director of the Geological Survey, has been cleared with the minority. I am authorized to proceed now to ask unanimous consent that the Senate may take up that nomination at this time, as in executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The nomination will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of H. William Menard, of California, to be Director of the Geological Survey.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the nomination was confirmed.

Mr. ALLEN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of the nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AUTHORIZATION FOR CERTAIN ACTION WITH RESPECT TO APPOINTMENTS DURING RECESS OF THE SENATE

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that during the forthcoming recess of the Senate until 12 o'clock noon on Monday, April 3, 1978, the President of the Senate and the President pro tempore be authorized to make appointments to commissions or committees authorized by law, by concurrent action of the two Houses, or by order of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

METRIC BOARD OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, yesterday the Senate confirmed the nominations of members of the Metric Board of the United States. I did not, at the time of their confirmation, ask for reconsideration, nor did I ask that the President be notified of Senate confirmation of these nominations. I did not ask that this be done because the nominations did not appear on the Executive Calendar, and I wanted to give all members the opportunity to ask for reconsideration in the event that they felt this was necessary.

Having heard no objection, therefore, I now move, as in executive session, to reconsider the vote by which those nominations were confirmed.

Mr. ALLEN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified of the confirmation of the nominations to the U.S. Metric Board.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR FILING ANNUAL REPORT

Mr. ROERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Special Committee on Aging be given until April 21 to file its annual report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

RECESS UNTIL MONDAY, APRIL 3, 1978

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President,

The year's at the spring,
And day's at the morn;
Morning's at seven;
The hill-side's dew-pearled;
The lark's on the wing;
The snail's on the thorn;
God's in His Heaven—
All's right with the world!

If there be no further business to come before the Senate, I move, in accordance with the order previously entered and in accordance with the provisions of House Concurrent Resolution 544, that the Senate, as in executive session, stand in recess until 12 o'clock meridian on Monday, April 3, 1978.

The motion was agreed to; and at 5:05 p.m. the Senate, in executive session, recessed until Monday, April 3, 1978, at 12 o'clock meridian.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

SOUTH AFRICA SHOULD MOVE INDEPENDENTLY FOR A SETTLEMENT IN NAMIBIA

HON. ROBERT L. F. SIKES

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 22, 1978

● Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, there may be a solution in sight on the problem of establishing a workable government for the new nation of Namibia in Southwest Africa. The apparent success with which a new black-controlled government has been developed and installed in Rhodesia points the way to a similar situation for Namibia. For more than 2 years, South Africa has been attempting to establish a coalition government in Namibia which could be representative of all the black tribes and would insure against an early takeover by Marxists.

The difficulty has been a militant black nationalist organization, SWAPO, which means Southwest African People's Organization. SWAPO is based in Angola and is conducting terrorist-type raids into Southwest Africa, killing and burning indiscriminately, and abducting young people who are forced to join their ranks. SWAPO has for years enjoyed the financial backing and open support of the United Nations, an organization which seldom makes the right decisions and which is dominated by Third World extremists and Communist nations.

A number of western powers, including the United States, Britain, West Germany, and France, have been holding periodic talks on the settlement of the dispute over the formation of a government for an independent Namibia. SWAPO has shown much the same attitude toward Namibia and South Africa that other foreign-based factions in Zambia and Mozambique show against participating in a coalition government in Rhodesia. They refuse to participate in elections and insist on virtual control of the new nation.

Thus far, Cubans in Angola have not participated in terrorist raids in Namibia. If this were done, it is certain that South Africa would retaliate. However, Cuban forces which supported the black Marxist regime in Angola were soundly trounced by South African forces during the period that South Africa was attempting to assist the United States in bringing into being an independent government in Angola. After Congress took steps to force an end to all U.S. aid, South Africa withdrew her forces and the Marxist takeover of Angola followed.

The South African Government has been negotiating for a new government in Namibia. Constant pressure has been exerted by the western powers.

It must be said that South Africa has leaned over backward to reach a solution acceptable to all factions. The foot dragging has been on the part of outside powers which insist on SWAPO's participation even at the cost of establishing a new Marxist-controlled nation.

The stumbling U.S. policy, which seems unable to think beyond the end of the U.N.'s nose, has helped hold back independence which could have been established for Namibia as early as 2 years ago. A reasonable summation of the situation in Africa was published in the Washington Post Sunday, February 26, 1978. It is entitled "Rhodesia-Style Settlement in Namibia?" and I submit it for reprinting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 26, 1978]

RHODESIA-STYLE SETTLEMENT IN NAMIBIA?

SOUTH AFRICA WEIGHS ATTEMPT TO RESOLVE INDEPENDENCE ISSUE INTERNALLY

(By Caryle Murphy and David Ottaway)

JOHANNESBURG.—There are increasing signs that South Africa is nearing a decision to attempt its own internal settlement in Namibia following the new sympathy being shown in Washington and London toward a similar solution to the Rhodesian conflict and a sharp upsurge of fighting in the South African-administered territory.

Western sources here said fears that South Africa was about to announce a date for its own elections in Namibia spurred vigorous diplomatic efforts last week to persuade Pretoria to wait, pending another Western effort in the next few days to break the deadlock in negotiations for an internationally acceptable accord leading to Namibian independence.

South Africa appears to be encouraged to take such a step by reports of growing disenchantment with the guerrilla activities, and increasingly pro-Marxist slant, of the militant black nationalist Southwest African People's Organization (SWAPO) among its supporters in the powerful Protestant and Catholic churches.

In addition, the South African government is under mounting pressure from both black and white leaders inside Namibia to proceed with its own settlement.

South Africa has administered Namibia, otherwise known as Southwest Africa, since the grant of a mandate over the former German colony by the old League of Nations at the end of World War I. Last year, it held a constitutional conference of representatives from the 11 different ethnic groups living in the territory to prepare for independence by the end of this year.

However, SWAPO, which is recognized by the United Nations as the only genuine representative of all the Namibian people, refused to attend because the conference was held on basis of ethnic representation. Instead, it stepped up training of guerrillas with Soviet and Cuban backing at camps in southern Angola.

The clearest indication yet of this country's growing inclination to go it alone even at the risk of economic sanctions came Friday when Foreign Minister Roelof Botha told Parliament that "It is not at all certain—indeed it looks to be unlikely—that an internationally acceptable solution will be reached."

"I want to say here today that we may get possible sanctions, that pressure on us will increase and that an escalation of violence may come in southern Africa," he added.

Botha said South Africa would continue to "lean over backwards" to reach an internationally acceptable solution through its ongoing talks with the five Western powers. But the thrust of his statement seemed primarily aimed at preparing South African and world opinion for a possible decision by Pretoria to go ahead with its own plan for holding elections and unilaterally granting Namibia independence by the end of this year.

Earlier in the week, Botha traveled to the Namibian capital of Windhoek to discuss "other alternatives" to the Western proposals with local white and black leaders.

A delegation of these internal leaders had just returned from a secret mission to Western Europe, where they held talks on the possible foreign recognition of a Namibian government headed by the South African-backed Democratic Turnalle Alliance. The delegation's leader, Dirk Mudge, described himself as "satisfied" with the results of the mission but refused to disclose with whom it had met.

A South African decision to opt for its own settlement would almost certainly escalate the guerrilla war being waged by SWAPO, which rejects this approach.

South Africa appears to be increasingly willing to run this risk rather than allow SWAPO to take over the mineral-rich territory populated by only about one million people. "We cannot allow the territory to fall into the hands of Marxist tyranny," Botha told parliament.

Western diplomatic sources ascribe the changing South African attitude partly to statements in London and Washington over the past two weeks suggesting that the two Western powers are now more favorably disposed towards Rhodesian Prime Minister Ian Smith's effort to work out his own internal settlement with three moderate black leaders based inside Rhodesia.

"The South Africans are looking carefully at the Rhodesian situation to see what the West is going to do," said one Western diplomat.

Britain and the United States have been holding separate negotiations with the militant Patriotic Front, the externally based guerrilla alliance that has rejected Smith's negotiations.

The South Africans seem to reason that if the two Western powers now swing away from the Patriotic Front and back an internal settlement in Rhodesia, there is a good chance they will take a similar attitude toward a South African-sponsored solution to the Namibian constitutional dispute.

The other factor in South African thinking about Namibia is said to be the sharp upsurge in SWAPO's guerrilla war. In the past week, several South African soldiers have been killed and one captured by SWAPO guerrillas in clashes in northern Namibia.

On Tuesday, 80 SWAPO guerrillas took more than 200 youths from an Anglican mission school across the border into Angola. South African authorities say they had been "abducted" but SWAPO and church sources in Namibia said they had gone willingly.

The size of the SWAPO guerrilla groups operating inside Namibia and the death of so many South Africans in just one week appeared to indicate that the war there is taking a sharp turn.

This development is likely to harden the South African position toward the Western proposal for a Namibian settlement based on elections in which SWAPO would participate. The United Nations would monitor the activities of both South African and SWAPO military forces.

Statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor will be identified by the use of a "bullet" symbol, i.e., ●

The United States, Britain, West Germany, France and Canada have been holding periodic talks over the past year with South Africa in the search for a settlement of the constitutional dispute.

The deadlock between South Africa and SWAPO led the five Western powers to intervene as mediators. These negotiations have narrowed differences to three main issues: the number and location of South African troops remaining in the territory during elections; the role and size of a proposed U.N. peacekeeping force, and the powers of the South African-appointed administrator general and the U.N.-appointed special representative in Namibia.

SCHENLEY HIGH SCHOOL WINS PENNSYLVANIA STATE BASKETBALL CHAMPIONSHIP

HON. WILLIAM S. MOORHEAD

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 22, 1978

● Mr. MOORHEAD of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I rise to note an uncommon event which seems to happen to Pittsburgh's Schenley High School quite commonly—winning the Pennsylvania State Class AAA basketball championships. Hundreds of schools compete to be State champions. Most never make it. However, over the past 12 years, Schenley High School, which I am proud to report is in my congressional district, has won the coveted title no less than four times, the latest coming last Saturday, March 18. A winning tradition such as this builds pride in self and institution and exemplifies the type of successful personal and team commitment which breeds character and maturity. I congratulate the Schenley High team, its coach, Fred Yee, and the students and faculty on this championship victory, and I commend the spirit and consistency of effort it represents.

I ask leave to insert into the RECORD the following newspaper articles from the Pittsburgh Press and the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette which report on the Schenley championship:

SCHENLEY ESTABLISHES TRADITION: SPARTANS THINK FIFTH

(By Bob Black)

The significance of capturing the school's fourth state basketball title in 12 years has barely had time to sink in, yet some of Schenley's players and fans have already started talking about next year.

Like the theme from "Fiddler On The Roof," Schenley's basketball program has something significant going for it—tradition.

"I don't think winning the state title this year will take anything away from going after it again next year," said 6-5 junior Larry Anderson, who teamed with 6-7 seniors Dave Thornton and James Smith to give the Spartans the most powerful inside game in the state.

"Next year the state finals will be held at the Civic Arena, which means people won't have to travel a couple hundred miles to see us win it."

When Schenley people talk about winning next year's title in such a matter-of-fact way, it is not arrogance. It comes from experience.

Two of those state titles won by Schenley came at the Civic Arena. The 1966 team, led by Ken Durrett and Petie Gibson, beat Chester, 74–64, and the 1971 team, with Maurice Lucas, Ricky Coleman and Jeep Kelley, topped Norristown, 77–60.

The other two have been won more than 200 miles away from home.

Three years ago, in just the second year of playing the state tournament at the Hershey Arena, Schenley used Kelvin Smith, Wayne Williams and Sonny Lewis to produce a 65–64 win over Abington, the team which had won the title the previous season.

Saturday night's 51–50 victory over Lebanon and its 6-11 junior Sam Bowie, who will be recruited by every college team in the country next season, gives Schenley the same kind of power identity formerly associated with Farrell under Coach Ed McClusky.

The difference between Schenley and Farrell is that the Spartans' four titles have been accomplished through three different coaching regimes.

In 1966, Willard Fisher led them to the titles, Spencer Watkins was the head man for the '71 and '75 title teams, while Fred Yee was this year's leader.

"Schenley's winning basketball tradition is built right into the school," said Yee, who's in his second year with the Spartans after producing a City League championship team several seasons ago at Westinghouse.

"There's a difference in attitude about basketball at Schenley than there was at Westinghouse," Yee said. "Westinghouse has always been a football school, so any basketball title was never given quite the same significance. At Schenley, it's just the opposite."

Schenley's victory gave the West just two winners in six classes for this year's state tournament, the other one being boys Class A champion Connellsville Father Geibel, which beat Darby Twp., 66–53.

Two Western losers—Mt. Lebanon in girls AAA and Northgate in boys AA—only lost by one point each.

Schenley's victory also means that a City League team has reached the state finals as the western representative in all but three seasons since the 1971 Spartan championship team.

Peabody lost to Abington in 1974 and Fifth Avenue beat Norristown in 1976. In between, Farrell won the state title in '72. General Braddock won it in '73 and Fox Chapel one year ago.

Next year, along with an expected strong Schenley team, the City League will also boast Allderdice and South Hills, a pair of state playoff teams this season who have impressive personnel returning.

And with the tournament returning to the Civic Arena next year for the first time since 1968, Schenley—tradition and all—is expected to be a factor.

SCHENLEY, GEIBEL MAKE WEST BEST

(By Tim Panaccio)

HERSHEY.—It was Schenley's greatest moment. No one dominated the scoring, but everyone played an important role in dominating the action.

Denying Lebanon's 6–11 junior Sam Bowie the ball on the inside, the Spartans (26–3) grabbed their fourth state basketball title in 12 years with a narrow, 51–50 victory over Lebanon of District 3 Saturday.

As it was, Bowie scored 24 points, but almost all came from outside. Schenley owned the boards, which, in the end, meant the game.

"Bowie could turn a franchise around," conceded Schenley Coach Fred Yee, who was not the Spartans' coach when they won their three previous state championships.

"If I had a choice," said Bowie, who led the Cedars to a gaudy 29–3 record, "I'd like to go against someone 6–11 or taller. I do better against better competition."

Schenley won in the final two minutes as Calvin Kane (10 points) drove left, accepted Bowie's challenge and passed back to teammate James Smith, who swished a seven-footer for a 49–46 Schenley lead.

"I knew Bowie would do that," Kane said. "I was going to set it for Snuffy. We try that play all the time."

"Calvin didn't have the shot," Smith said. "I knew it was mine as soon as Bowie moved."

Schenley also won because 6–4 junior James Walsh, who finished with eight points, came off the bench as he has been doing all year, to restore law and order to the Spartans offense.

"My job is to slow it up, work the ball for the shot said Walsh, the Spartans' sixth man," Walsh said. "It's an easy role. I think I'll get more recognition next year."

Dave Thornton led Schenley with 14 and played hard against Bowie; so hard the two got into a fight near the end of the third quarter.

"He (Bowie) wasn't playing defense," Thornton said. "I wanted him to play me aggressive. I wanted to get him in foul trouble and scare him. I threw an elbow, he retaliated. It was cheap of me, but I wanted to see if I could intimidate him."

Bowie was the intimidator for a while, filling the lane and blocking five of Thornton's shots. But when he moved outside to escape Schenley's triple-teaming under the boards, it left the lane open for the Spartans.●

THE SEVENTH SESSION OF THE LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE

HON. DONALD M. FRASER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 22, 1978

● Mr. FRASER. Mr. Speaker, Ambassador Elliot Richardson, Special Representative of the President to the U.N. Law of the Sea Conference, held a press conference last week on the eve of his departure for Geneva and the opening of the seventh session of the Conference. At this news briefing he stated very clearly that success of the Conference for the United States depends on "unravelling the tangle of conflicts surrounding the deep seabed mining issue." He set forth the nature of the U.S. position on the interrelated issues involved in deep seabed mining. He went on to outline other major U.S. interests in the session—navigation and security interests, fisheries, the continental shelf, marine scientific research, marine environmental protection, and the promotion of global order; and noted the need to begin to consider viable alternatives to the comprehensive treaty, if an acceptable treaty proves unattainable. This is an important statement. I commend it to the attention of the House and request that it be inserted in the RECORD.

The statement follows:

STATEMENT BY ELLIOT L. RICHARDSON FOR THE LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE

MARCH 16, 1978.

In less than two weeks, representatives of 156 countries will assemble in Geneva at the Seventh Session of the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea to try once again to hammer out a comprehensive treaty.

The last attempt to reach agreement, at the Sixth Session held in New York last summer, ended in disarray—and from the U.S. point of view—setback and disillusionment.

Through the exercise of procedural sleight-of-hand, compromises on the exploration and exploitation of the deep seabed—an issue of paramount import to the U.S. and a host of other nations—were summarily discarded.

These compromises—struck after weeks of painstaking effort and open discussion—were replaced in the negotiating text by provisions developed in secret that are clearly inimical to essential U.S. interests.

Disturbed by this abridgment of due process, and unsure of the advantages of continued participation, I felt constrained to recommend to the President that the U.S. undertake a searching review of both Conference procedures and the substantive matters before it.

This review is still in process. It is so advanced, however, that I can now appropriately share with you its principal conclusions which guide our preparations for the forthcoming session.

The first issue to come under scrutiny was the continued desirability of working toward a treaty. In light of discouraging reverses, did the U.S. still believe that a treaty was in its national interest?

The response to that question remains affirmative. We are still convinced that a new magnitude of global order can emanate from successful negotiations on the Law of the Sea. A treaty deemed just and equitable by the world community can dramatically enhance the prospects for the rule of law.

But commitment alone carries no guarantee of success. Agreement at the Seventh Session can come only through an exertion of political will and a determination by all nations to forge an accommodation that leaves no nation with its essential interests impaired.

DEEP SEABED MINING

For the U.S. success of the Conference will depend on unravelling the tangle of conflicts surrounding the deep seabed mining issue. More than our essential interests are at stake in this area. There is opportunity here to establish a precedent which can serve as a blueprint for the development of future international institutions concerned with common resources.

The deep seabed beyond areas of national jurisdiction contains vast quantities of nodules that can become a major source of the manganese, nickel, copper, and cobalt needed by an increasingly industrialized world.

We support the concept of an international Authority that would supervise the conduct of deep seabed mining. We believe that revenues stemming from these mining operations should be shared among the nations of the world. Yet the current negotiating text would discourage entry into the deep seabed by those nations which are both able to extract its minerals and have a growing need for them. The text imposes onerous financial conditions, dictates mandatory transfer of technology as a condition of access, and contains several other features which would combine to deter entrepreneurs from investing the $700–$900 million required to bring a single mining site into production.

Our position on mining the deep seabed is clear:

1. We accept a dual system of development which will give States and companies, as well as the international Enterprise reasonable assurance of access to seabed resources. We reject the concept of rigid state centralism projected on a global scale.

2. We accept some limitation on production of seabed minerals in deference to the essential interests of land-based producers—but not to the extent that it excessively restricts the availability of resources needed by an expanding world economy.

3. We believe that the Authority should be controlled in ways that adequately take into account such factors as production, investment, and consumption—and not be based on the simplistic, ideological platform of one nation, one vote.

There is room for compromise in these positions, but the fundamental concerns they express cannot be ignored. If the final text fails to recognize these concerns, the U.S. could not become a party to it.

Unfortunately we cannot be confident that we shall be able to achieve our goals.

It follows that the U.S. must stand ready to protect its interests should an unbridgeable split appear in the course of the negotiations.

There is little doubt that mining will begin during the next decade regardless of the outcome of the Law of the Sea Conference. The forces already in motion have an irresistible momentum. The deep seabeds are a new and inviting frontier, ready for exploitation. Technology is becoming increasingly advanced. Should the Conference fail to reach agreement on a seabed mining regime, it would be a distortion of the concept of the seabeds as the common heritage of mankind to allow this concept to prevent the development of this important new resource.

On the domestic front, legislation to facilitate the initiation of deep sea mining operations by American corporations is moving through Congress. The Administration favors this legislation—not for use as a club to beat down opposition in Geneva—but in the belief that we must be prepared to provide the necessary encouragement and support to our industry in its development of this new resource whether or not a comprehensive treaty on the law of the sea can be negotiated. I do not, however, anticipate Congressional passage of a seabed mining bill until some time after the Seventh Session closes on May 19th.

THE OTHER MAJOR U.S. INTERESTS

Our review has reached certain conclusions regarding other major law of the sea interests:

Navigation and Security Interests. As a global power with extensive interests in the maintenance of high seas freedoms, the U.S. has placed much emphasis in the negotiations on maintaining those freedoms in the face of unilateral actions that purport to assert national jurisdiction of various kinds over the high seas.

The negotiating text before the Conference provides for freedom of navigation through, over and under international straits by military and commercial vessels and aircraft. It also meets the environmental and safety of navigation concerns of the straits States.

The text makes clear that beyond a 12-mile territorial sea, the high seas freedoms of navigation and overflight and the laying of submarine pipelines and cables and other traditional uses of the sea related to those freedoms shall be fully maintained.

Although our maritime interests and responsibilities would in any case compel us to insist on the exercise of traditional navigational freedoms, it is clear that failure to achieve a comprehensive treaty would entail less stability and higher costs. It is thus our conclusion that a law of the sea treaty which adequately safeguards these freedoms would be clearly preferable.

Fisheries. The U.S. seeks to secure wide acceptance of international standards for conservation and optimum utilization of marine living resources.

In addition, we have specific and important commercial interests in our own coastal fisheries as well as in salmon, tuna, and species off the coasts of other countries. We are also deeply concerned about the protection of marine mammals. U.S. interests in coastal species within 200 miles are already protected by the Fisheries Management and Conservation Act of 1976. The negotiating text does, however, serve our interests in regard to salmon, tuna and fisheries off the coasts of other states.

It should be noted, however, that a comprehensive treaty will not of itself fully protect these U.S. interests but rather will foster regional and bilateral agreements. Finally, the negotiating text does promote international recognition of the need to protect marine mammals.

We believe that the understandable and legitimate interests in fisheries of the landlocked and geographically disadvantaged states should be fairly accommodated as part of an overall package.

Continental Shelf. It is estimated that there are significant amounts of exploitable petroleum beneath the continental margin off our coasts. We support the coupling of coastal state jurisdiction over continental margin resources beyond 200 miles with revenue sharing for the benefit of the developing countries. Although the Conference has not yet agreed upon a precise definition of the outer limits of that jurisdiction, we have every reason to believe that such a definition can be negotiated. The open-ended formula now contained in the negotiating text is undesirably vague and might be so interpreted as to lead to excessive claims of jurisdiction.

Without a treaty, the U.S. interest in the resources of the continental margin would nevertheless be protected. A comprehensive treaty, however, would enable us to protect this interest with greater predictability.

Marine Scientific Research. The U.S. places a high value on the conduct of research on a free and broad basis, accompanied by a maximum flow of information with respect to both the conduct of the research and its results.

Unfortunately, the U.S. has been unable to find more than minimal support in the negotiations for the creation of a free and open marine scientific regime in the economic zone and on the continental shelf. The consequence is that the negotiating text contains undesirably broad provisions requiring coastal state consent for research to be conducted within 200 miles. While the negotiating text introduces a degree of predictability that would make the administration and planning of research easier, it also creates rather complicated conditions for the granting of consent. In weighing the prospective benefits of a comprehensive treaty, therefore, science must be seen as a neutral factor. At a minimum the freedom of research must be maintained beyond the economic zone and on the deep seabed.

Marine Environmental Protection. The U.S. has a major interest in protecting its coastal areas from all forms of pollution. Regarding vessel source pollution, the negotiating text establishes a mixed system of port state, coastal state and flag state jurisdiction that, given shipping patterns off our coasts, would afford substantial protection against hazards to the marine environment within 200 miles. It must be noted that the negotiating text gives flag states the right to preempt jurisdiction, albeit with important exceptions. Protection of the marine environment will thus be, in part, a function of the responsible exercise of flag state jurisdiction. At the same time the negotiating text makes binding on all participating states those standards adopted by the Intergovernmental Maritime Consultative Organization. The treaty also provides protection against pollution from continental shelf resource activities, deep seabed mining and ocean dumping. While a treaty cannot accomplish all of our marine environmental objectives, it would create a useful framework for safeguarding the marine environment.

Global Order. Our review has recognized that agreement on the large number of issues dealt with by the Conference will introduce into the international system a greater measure of stability and predictability and a commitment to peaceful settlement of disputes. The U.S. shares with the world community as a whole the aim of avoiding chaos and conflict in the utilization of the world's oceans.

If the Conference succeeds in negotiating a treaty that serves the specific interests under discussion, it will have further advanced the goal of the elimination of conflict in international affairs. Moreover, it will have done so largely by the process of consensus, an important precedent in itself.

ALTERNATIVES

It follows that the U.S. must be prepared to protect its interests by other means than a comprehensive treaty if an acceptable treaty proves unattainable. Indeed, it would be irresponsible not to begin consideration of viable alternatives. In the case of deep seabed mining, reciprocal legislation is one such alternative, but not necessarily the most desirable. Another possibility—one which might be regarded as more consonant with the concept of the common heritage—would be a multilateral arrangement in which all countries could join and which provided for revenue sharing with developing countries. In the case of other subjects such as military and commercial navigation, satisfactory alternatives are less obvious, and we have begun an examination of the measures that would become necessary for the protection of these interests should the Conference fail to achieve agreement.

PROCEDURAL ISSUES

The Law of the Sea interests of the United States which I have described can only be served if the Conference operates on the basis of open discussion with broad, representative participation. Since the summer of 1977 this objective has been a major concern of a series of intersessional meetings. Although a substantial measure of agreement on these procedural matters has been developed, difficult questions remain to be resolved. For this reason, I and a number of colleagues intend to go to Geneva next week. We will discuss these questions with representatives of the Group of 77, which will be meeting there during the same week, in an effort to find accommodations which will prevent any protracted delay in the Conference.

CONCLUSION

In sum, our review of U.S. positions reinforces our conviction that a comprehensive treaty is the clearly preferable means to promote orderly use of the oceans and to ensure responsible and fruitful development of their resources.

The world community has before it a singular opportunity to consummate a breakthrough. We are resolved to do everything in our power to make this come to pass.●

THE DILAPIDATED STATE OF BRITAIN'S HOSPITALS UNDER ITS SOCIALIZED MEDICAL SYSTEM

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 22, 1978

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, Joseph D. Godfrey, M.D., of Orchard Park, N.Y., and one of the most respected orthopedic surgeons in the United States, has brought to my attention a recent article in Impact magazine on the dilapidated state of many of Britain's general hospitals under its socialized medical system. That same issue contains a commentary on this country's consideration of a similar health system and some appropriate relative cost comparisons as to medical care.

This matter is of substantial importance to this body, and although any immediate consideration of a mandatory national health insurance system as the key step toward socialized medicine seems unlikely, it will be around until the record is set clear on why that is not the way to go.

I particularly commend these items to the attention of the members of the Committee on Ways and Means which has legislative jurisdiction in this subject area. They follow:

"RUNNING ON A RUDDY SHOESTRING"

(By Arturo F. Gonzalez, Jr.)

LONDON.—"It began as a joke, really," sighs Dr. Geoff Watts, deputy editor of World Medicine magazine. "Offhandedly, we mentioned in a column last fall that there ought to be some kind of a prize for the British patient who has waited longest in line to receive medical care from a specialist. Suddenly, we were inundated with names of candidates from doctors. Apparently, we had touched a very raw nerve.

"Some of the horror stories told us were appalling. In Accrington, the eye, ear, nose, and throat specialists were taking appointments for June 1978—in all the fall of 1975. And some poor lady in Clitheroe, Lancashire, has been waiting since September, 1957, for an orthopedic operation!"

Dr. Norman Simmons, a consultant pathologist at London's Guy's Hospital, says flatly, "This is no bloody way to practice medicine. This hospital hasn't admitted 'cold' nonemergency cases for six weeks. National Health Service (NHS) is on the verge of collapse. If you are on a three-year waiting list of an orthopedic operation, then that's collapse."

Every doctor has his own favorite horror story of this British bureaucracy gone mad. At the Hull Royal Infirmary, supplies of 1½" screws used for fastening broken bones ran out because a nine-month-old order had not been filled. Investigators found there were 11 different and competing channels for ordering the equipment.

Documentation has become a mountain. One thousand major circulars have been issued in the past three-and-one-half years. Mr. George Watts,* a consultant surgeon, reports, "We did a survey at one Birmingham hospital and found the cost of paper work to admit a patient was greater than the average cost of drugs for patients.

*In England physicians tend to be called "doctor" and surgeons "mister."

THE ROOF FELL IN

One area authority issues 250 copies of every document sent to it for consultation and then circulates every comment on the report to the other 249 recipients. As Mr. Watts complains, "In one month I receive about 1,000 pages of all sorts of administrative data telling us how things should be done."

Equipment shortages in NHS hospitals are frequent and never-ending. Mr. Dick daCosta, the senior orthopedic surgeon at the 650-bed Shotley Bridge Hospital, complains bitterly about the lack of money to improve equipment. "Mine is largely a modern hospital, so I am not as badly off as some. Still, I only got a new operating table after quite a struggle. The leg fell off the one I was using, in the middle of an operation. We had to get a piece of rope and tie the table to the window.

"I want radio communication with our ambulances. You can save a life some time if you can tell the ambulance fellow what to do. I have been pressing for that expenditure for four years. We are running the service on a ruddy shoestring."

At the aging Northampton General Hospital, Dr. Alan Jennings complains, "The hospital roof fell in recently while the registar worked on his reports. Electric wiring collapsed all around him. He had to proceed with his work by candlelight." A Welsh surgeon reports a porous roof in an anesthetic room, where water leaked into the theatre and plaster came off the walls, falling on patients being prepared for operations.

A Newcastle surgeon seethes, "The present dilapidated state of the majority of the regional hospitals is deplorable. The complete lack of interest in maintenance is evidenced from flaking paint, leaking roofs, unmended loose tiles on staircases, clocks six hours slow or not working at all, and unhygienic toilets . . . It is indeed remarkable how doctors and patients both survive in such squalor."

Complains Mr. Dennis Wilkins, a surgeon at Hackney Hospital, "Our hospital is so impoverished that we don't have even a defibrillator. The old operating theatre fills with fumes and dust from the streets outside, vibrates with the traffic, and is used as a public throughway when the lift breaks down. The maternity block has just been shuttered because there's fungus growing on the walls, not enough water for the bedpans, and the sewer overflows. It's also very badly located—right next to the mortuary."

Even when the NHS painstakingly builds spanking new hospitals, things seem to go awry. The new Liverpool Teaching Hospital, budgeted at approximately $25 million and started in 1965, may wind up costing $110 million before it's finished in 1978. The problem is that the almost fully constructed skyscraper has recently been declared unsafe by fire safety authorities, who discovered that many inside walls did not go up to the ceiling, thus creating deadly voids which could suck flames and smoke quickly through the building. Construction delays drag on; meanwhile patients wait.

"ONCE YOU TRY IT, THERE'S NO TURNING BACK"

(By George Willis)

England is a great place to be hit by a taxi but a lousy place to have hemorrhoids. That about sums up what is good and what is bad about national health care in England under the National Health Service (NHS).

For instance, if you have a massive heart attack or need emergency medical service, the care you will get will be immediate, rendered by some of the finest physicians in the world, and you will be treated very politely. Furthermore, it will not cost you anything out of your pocket at the moment.

On the other hand, if you need nonemergency surgery, such as a tonsillectomy, hernia repair, a hysterectomy, or hip replacement, the wait could be anywhere from seven weeks to two years or even longer.

An orthopedic surgeon told me that an elderly person needing a hip replacement would probably die before getting to the top of the waiting list. Waiting time for an orthopedic appointment is usually nine months.

I questioned Mr. Laurie Pavett, MP, chairman of the health service committee of the Parliamentary Labour Party about the length of time people must wait for elective surgery, which he admitted is a problem. Here's his chilling answer:

"If a woman needs a hysterectomy, well, she might have to wait six to nine months. She'll be uncomfortable, she might be incontinent, but she'll live, she'll survive, she can manage."

Later Dr. S. J. Carne, honorary treasurer of the Royal College of Practitioners, told us that to be effective the National Health Service requires the British patient. He pointed out that the American patient and the British patient are not the least bit alike. It's my own observation after three visits to England that in spite of the similarity of language, British and Americans are in no way alike.

Because of a depression, a war, and 30 years of socialist government, the British are completely domesticated.

They will readily accept, without challenge, the problem of queuing even over simple things like waiting in a theater lobby to get an expensive seat. Since queuing in Britain seems to be a natural habit, the British see nothing wrong with having to wait in line patiently for medical service. Americans forced to wait for seats they had paid premium prices for would be demanding to see the manager, if not actually throwing the furniture around.

The minister of state for health, Dr. David Owen, said: "The NHS is a rationed service. There will never be a government or a country that has enough resources to meet all the demands any nation will make on a national health service."

However, the politicians love NHS because they can claim to be heroes. The labor unions love it, mostly because they have so much to say about it. The bureaucrats love it, and why not? There are 130 bureaucrats for every 100 people in NHS.

One of my own personal fears is that this country will listen to the voices amongst our politicians and bureaucrats who suggest that we try some form of NHS, "just to see how it goes." Once you try it, there's no turning back. Getting the health care system out of the hands of the bureaucrats would be like trying to get your ball back from the Harlem Globetrotters.

LEGISLATION TO DEAL WITH PROBLEMS IN CURRENT TAX SYSTEM

HON. MAX BAUCUS

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 22, 1978

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to deal with a number of problems in the current tax system. My tax proposals are designed to reduce unfair tax burdens currently shouldered by Montana's workers, farmers, and independent businessmen.

SUMMARY OF FIVE-PART TAX PROPOSAL

My tax package consists of five major proposals:

First. A bill to eliminate "taxflation" by adjusting tax brackets upward each year according to the Consumer Price Index;

Second. A bill to reduce regressive social security payroll taxes and to improve the efficiency of the social security system by funding medicare and disability programs from general revenues;

Third. A bill to eliminate tax-loss farming, whereby investors use loopholes to reduce their taxes on nonfarm income by unfairly competing with legitimate farmers;

Fourth. A bill to eliminate the "carryover basis" to make it easier for Americans to pass family-owned farms and other assets from generation to generation; and Fifth. A bill to establish a graduated income tax for small corporations, thereby eliminating the inequitable situation where small businesses, which earn small sums (for example, $50,000 per year), are required to pay the tax rate that General Motors and Standard Oil pay.

TAXFLATION

Inflation reduces the dollar's purchasing power. Today, it takes a lot more dollars than it did a few years ago to purchase the same amount of goods and services.

We in Congress must do all we can to stop inflation. And we have to stop the increased tax burden inflation is causing.

Our graduated tax system sets higher tax rates as incomes increase. Thus, workers who get cost-of-living increases often find themselves in higher tax brackets—even though their purchasing power stays the same.

Businessmen and farmers are also affected. Even if they sell the same volume of products, they have higher incomes and thus pay a higher percentage of their income in taxes.

This "taxflation" means tax increases take place every year as a result of inflation. One report I recently read says that a 10-percent increase in inflation produces a 16-percent increase in Federal tax revenues. That is not sound policy.

Also, taxflation permits Government programs to increase even though Congress has voted for tax cuts. That is unwise policy, too.

This loophole, which lets taxes increase automatically with constant or even decreasing levels of purchasing power, must be closed. The bill I am introducing today will do that by adjusting tax brackets upward each year according to the Consumer Price Index—the best available measure of inflation.

Currently, married couples pay a 22% tax on incomes from $11,200 to $15,200, and 25% from $15,200 to $19,200. Under my proposal, if the inflation rate was 10 percent in a given year, the brackets would be adjusted so the 22% tax would be on income from $12,320 ($11,200+10% ×$11,200=$12,320) to $16,720. The 25% rate would apply for income from $16,720 to $21,120.

My proposal would end creeping increases in taxes and Government expenditures. It would make the Government more accountable because revenues would no longer increase as a result of inflation. Passage of this legislation would be an important step toward restoring the confidence of taxpayers in our government system.

REDUCING PAYROLL TAXES

Last fall when the Social Security Trust Fund faced bankruptcy, Congress voted for payroll tax increases to insure that the 33 million people who receive monthly social security checks wouldn't lose what is often their only source of livelihood.

But it's clear that Congress must find a better long-term solution to avoid unacceptably high payroll taxes. The social security tax for self-employed farmers and businessmen under existing law would reach 10 percent by 1986, and for workers, the employer and employee would each pay 7.15 percent.

These high payroll taxes place unfair burdens on workers and contribute to unemployment by raising the cost of labor.

My proposed solution is to change funding for medicare and disability programs from payroll taxes to general revenues. In addition to reducing payroll taxes and insuring the financial integrity of the social security system, this proposal would lead to greater efficiency.

Currently, the medicare and disability programs are outside the scrutiny of the congressional appropriations committees.

The cost of these programs has ballooned. For example, from 1975 to 1977 medicare payments increased 28.5 percent. If Congress had to vote to appropriate money for medicare and disability programs each year, the programs would be more closely examined. This congressional oversight should lead to reductions in waste and inefficiency.

Below is a chart showing social security payroll taxes under the current system (CS) and under my proposal (BP):

	1979		1982		1985
	BP	CS	BP	CS	BP	CS
Employer/ Employee	4.33	6.13	4.40	6.70	4.40	7.05
Self Employed	6.50	8.10	6.60	9.35	6.60	9.90

In addition to reducing payroll taxes and promoting efficiency, my proposal would encourage employment in the private sector.

We in Congress are distressed by current high rates of unemployment and have considered numerous proposals to combat the problem.

High payroll taxes discourage employment by raising the cost of hiring workers. Adoption of my social security proposal would be a significant step in the battle to combat unemployment.

TAX LOSS FARMING

Legitimate farmers have faced unfair competition in recent years from outside investors who "farm the tax system." These investors shelter outside income by investing in agricultural enterprises. Because the tax advantages they gain are not available to bona fide farmers, they can operate their agricultural enterprises at profit margins that would be unacceptable to full-time farmers.

This competition is unfair, resulting solely from loopholes in the tax system, and should be eliminated.

The outside investors generally invest in enterprises involving development of capital assets, such as cattle herds or fruit orchards. In the years when the assets are developing, they offset cash losses incurred in the development with their outside income. Finally, when the assets mature, they are sold generally at profits which are reported as a capital gain. Thus these investors not only delay taxation, but they convert cash income from outside agriculture to a capital gain.

My proposal would eliminate tax loss farming by putting a limit of $15,000 on the amount of farm losses that could be deducted from nonfarm income in a year.

The $15,000 figure is designed to protect beginning farmers. Like outside investors, beginning farmers generally must develop capital assets. Often they depend on outside incomes as they struggle to get established in agriculture. The $15,000 exemption would let them continue to offset agricultural losses with their nonfarm salaries.

The limit on how much farm loss could be deducted from nonfarm income would not apply to any taxpayer using accrual accounting. Thus, a taxpayer who had an actual loss in agriculture could deduct the loss, no matter how large, from nonfarm income.

My proposal is intended to eliminate the cases where investors use the cash method of accounting to gain tax advantages, even though they eventually realize some profit from the agricultural enterprise.

REPEAL OF THE CARRY-OVER BASIS

The Tax Reform Act of 1976 was designed to reduce estate tax burdens to make it easier for families to transfer farms and businesses from generation to generation. It accomplished this goal by significantly increasing the marital deduction.

But another part of the 1976 act establishes the "carry-over basis" which may significantly increase taxes for some future transfers. Under prior law, the cost or other basis of property acquired from a descendant was "stepped up" to its fair market value at the date of death.

The act provides that the basis of property acquired from a descendant who dies after December 31, 1976 is to be the same as the descendant's basis immediately before his death. As a transitional rule, the adjusted basis of property held on December 31, 1976, is its fair market value on December 31, 1976.

Because of this transitional rule, families will not feel the major impact of this sweeping change until some time in the future. But I believe we should act now to repeal the carry-over basis and return to the earlier system.

An example will show the effect of the carry-over basis. Suppose a rancher purchased his ranch for $150,000 in 1966. Because of inflation, the value of land continually increases so by 1976 the ranch is worth $250,000. Even at a reduced rate of inflation, the ranch will likely be worth $350,000 by 1986 and perhaps $450,000 by 1996.

Suppose that the rancher dies in 1986 and that his son who inherits the property decides to sell it in 1996 in order to buy some other property.

Under the previous system, the son would have to pay capital gains tax on the $100,000 the ranch's value had increased since he acquired it at his father's death ($450,000—$350,000=$100,000).

But under the new carry-over basis he would have to pay capital gains tax on the amount the ranch's value had increased since the new law took effect in 1976. Thus, the taxable gain would be $200,000 ($450,000—$250,000=$200,000), and the son's tax bill on the inherited property would be doubled.

To prevent these future tax burdens, we should act now to eliminate the carry-over basis provisions of the 1976 Tax Reform Act.

GRADUATED INCOME TAX FOR SMALL CORPORATIONS

Today, many small businesses badly need equity capital to modernize and expand. The largest source of equity capital for small businesses is retaining earnings, or profits left over after taxes.

The present tax system simply takes too large a bite at the lower end, when a small firm is almost totally dependent upon retained earnings to generate growth. Small corporations reach the highest tax bracket, 48 percent, the same rate at which giants like General Motors and IBM are taxed, when they pass $50,000 in taxable income. This tax policy penalizes and discriminates against small business which cannot take advantage of many tax preferences available to larger corporations.

Present corporate tax rates are 20 percent on the first $25,000 of income, 22 percent for income from $25,000 to $50,000 and 48 percent for income in excess of $50,000.

The tax rates my bill proposes are:

	Percent
Less than $25,000	18
$25 to $50,000	20
$50 to $75,000	25
$75 to $100,000	30
$100 to $125,000	35
$125 to $150,000	40
Over $150,000	45

The independent business sector has contributed a great deal to the strength and vitality of the American economy. It has been the wellspring of innovation and inventiveness, the creator of jobs, and the guardian of competition.

I believe my proposal for a graduated corporate income tax will contribute to the continued vitality of his important sector of our economy.

AGRICULTURAL UPDATE

HON. GEORGE HANSEN

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 22, 1978

● Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I submit for the RECORD the following update on the agricultural situation particularly as it relates to Idaho farmers:

FARMERS NEED IMPROVED CONDITIONS

Overdue corrective measures to repair the situation causing farmers scandalously low returns for their crops in the face of skyrocketing inflation and costs of operation have resulted in serious unrest in rural areas which must be dealt with as a matter of high priority. Farmers are having to fight for their lives, but it is really the welfare of the consumers of the Nation and the world which is at stake.

The farmers need more than sympathy and lip service: they need action. This segment of our Nation's economy has become a whipping boy. When food prices go up the farmers are blamed but when farm prices fall off while food prices continue to go up the farmers still seem to get most of the credit.

In seeking a solution to this problem I will certainly continue to support any constructive measure and work with all means at my disposal to find answers to these critical problems and achieve the goal of a fair return for our farmers. This will require active pursuit of the grievances of the farmers in Congress, in the agencies of Government, and in the agricultural communities and marketplaces themselves until real answers are found and the rural communities of the Nation can return to the traditional calmness and stability which provides the breadbasket of the American way of life. To this end I have met with the various farming groups here in Washington and in Idaho in an attempt to arrive at a workable consensus for an effective approach for Idaho farmers.

The worst problem facing farmers as with all citizens is the overwhelming burden of big government. Taxes accumulated at State, Federal, and local levels amount to a major portion of the retail cost of farm products. There are Federal and State income taxes, employee taxes, social security taxes, sales taxes, personal property taxes, inventory taxes, licenses, regulations, and controls. These are all imposed on the producers, the processors (including food, plant, and equipment) the transporters at all levels and then a sales tax is again added at the end.

Most people blame the difference between farmer receipts and food prices on middleman profit without realizing that the big middleman is the Government as it taxes at every level and increases the cost of the end product by over 50 percent. Both consumer and producer are victims of the oppressive burden of big government.

Our domestic agricultural producers are the most efficient in the world and, therefore, produce much more than we consume domestically. It is, therefore, essential that we have an active export program for our farm commodities. This allows a hungry world to benefit from our agricultural efficiency and creates opportunity for reasonable profit to producers of farm products.

I have included a survey in this report which you are invited to fill out and return to my Washington office as soon as possible. This will give me a firsthand report of what you think should be done to improve the present situation.

There is disagreement on some of the presently proposed solutions and the best way for prompt constructive congressional action is for as many farmers as possible to agree on the approach. I will keep the appropriate individuals making the decisions aware of the results of my survey which will insure direct farmer impact in the formulation of new farm programs.

In the meantime I am working closely with Idaho and other farmers in Washington from across the Nation to utilize their efforts toward framing constructive legislative proposals to be aired by congresssional hearings and forums at State and community levels. Hopefully this will speeed the day of hoped for relief.

At the time of this publication a new farm legistlative package has passed the Senate and is in conference with the House. Its final fate or form is yet to be decided.

THE GRAZING PICTURE

As stated in my December report, I joined with other western Congressmen in sponsoring H.R. 9757, a grazing fee moratorium bill, to keep the current rates in force 1 more year. This measure was approved by the House on February 24, 1978, and is awaiting Senate action.

The Bureau of Land Management (BLM) and Forest Service (USFS) have announced that they will issue permits this year under the old rates while reserving the right to send out amended rate increase notices when necessary. The Senate must act quickly if we are to alleviate the dilemma and immediate danger facing our ranchers.

Under the current Department criteria, the 1978 fees for both the BLM and the USFS land were proposed to be raised to $1.89 for each animal unit month (AUM), a monthly charge for the amount of land needed for grazing each cow or steer. The fees would then be raised each year until they reach the so-called fair market value. Present fees are $1.51 per AUM on BLM land and $1.60 on USFS land.

A moratorium would freeze the prices at last year's rates for 1 year and thus allow Congress adequate time to thoroughly consider pending measures such as H.R. 10587, with which I have associated myself as a comprehensive proposal addressing several critical land use problems such as funding for range improvements, disposal of wild horses, 10-year grazing permits, and a comprehensive grazing fee formula based on production costs and market conditions. The final hearings are currently being held (March 30 in Salt Lake City) on this measure and action should be taken in the House during the month of April.

In February, I held an ad hoc field hearing in Twin Falls regarding the questions facing Idaho ranchers and users of federally controlled lands. Some 100 persons attended the meeting and much valuable insight was received. I am making this testimony available to the House Interior Committee as they deliberate on measures to correct these inequities. Hopefully within the next few weeks we will be able to arrive at a long-term effective solution to this situation.

THE 160-ACRE PROBLEM ON THE BACK BURNER

This situation has been neutralized somewhat for the time being. A California Federal court declared that the Department of the Interior could not put regulations into effect regarding this issue until an environmental impact statement had been prepared. The Interior Department agreed to prepare the statement and not appeal the court decision. The estimate is that it will take approximately 1 year to prepare the EIS.

WATER POLICY REVIEW

The National Water Policy Review Commission had a deadline of March for submission of its recommendations to the President regarding the various proposals placed in the Federal Register last year. A Federal court in North Dakota recently ruled that these recommendations could not be made until an environmental impact statement was prepared. The Government attorneys are currently preparing to appeal this decision, however. In the meantime Idahoans, use the water, it is still yours.

ORAL BIDDING

The Congress took action to amend the Forest Management Act regarding bidding procedures and the President signed Public Law 95–233, February 20, 1978. I supported this bill although it was not all we had hoped for. It was the best we could achieve at this time and does give some relief from the oppressive requirements of the previous procedures.●

PREDICTABLE FAILURE OF AMERICA'S FOREIGN POLICY

HON. ROBERT L. F. SIKES

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 22, 1978

● Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, the failure of America's foreign policy in Rhodesia was predictable from the start. A new coalition government transferring authority to the blacks in that country has been signed and the leaders sworn in. The transition occurred quitely and there is general optimism for success. The holdouts who continue to oppose the new coalition are the United States, with Mr. Andrew Young as policymaker; the extremists among the Third World nations who dance to Russia's tune; and, to a lesser extent, Great Britain, a nation which now would much prefer to let well enough alone. Mr. Young, and so forth, have insisted that the terrorist black factions which were based in Zambia and Mozambique be brought into the coalition. However, they continue to say they will come into the coalition only upon their own terms—meaning domination—and they threaten civil war if their demands are not met.

The United States may have gotten itself into a serious dilemma because the Russians are supplying the weapons and the training for terrorist factions. There is considerable apprehension now that the Cubans may be brought into the fighting on the side of the Russian-dominated terrorists. It is doubtful that the U.S. policymakers will ever be able to explain this series of miscues on our part.

We should at least make a show of good sense by supporting the coalition until it has had an opportunity to prove it can govern properly. Openmindedness is in order at long last. We have badly handled affairs in Africa for years, giving Russia almost a free hand to use Cuban mercenaries to subjugate local peoples without restraint and with complete indifference to world opinion.

The Washington Star said in an editorial on Sunday, February 19, 1978:

> Mr. Young must be weaned from his infatuation with the guerrillas. The weaning is already overdue.

I submit the Star's editorial on the entire Rhodesian controversy and Mr. Young's involvement for reprinting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

A pertinent discussion of the entire subject by James J. Kilpatrick entitled "Blunder Over Rhodesia" appeared in the Washington Star on Tuesday, March 21, 1978. This also deserves serious study and I submit it for reprinting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

[From the Washington Star, Feb. 19, 1978]

RHODESIA AND MR. YOUNG

Our United Nations ambassador, Mr Andrew Young, says that the so-called "internal" solution for majority rule in Rhodesia could spark a "black on black civil war." That is a possibility, especially if Mr. Young continues to sound his pessimistic note and his gloomy prophecies become self-fulfilling.

Mr. Young, for reasons he alone knows, believes that the guerrilla forces operating from Rhodesia's neighboring states must be included in any durable regime. Their cooperation would help, of course, and Ian Smith seeks it on reasonable terms. But their ambition is essentially rule or ruin, their co-operation unlikely.

Mr. Young has had an unusually free hand to speak for the United States on the delicate issues of Southern Africa. In keeping—perhaps—with his feckless view that Cubans are a "stabilizing force" in Angola, he has aligned U.S. policy with the Soviet- and Chinese-supported guerillas of the Patriotic Front and their hard-line attitudes.

He and Dr. David Owen, the British foreign secretary, have tried to talk the Patriotic Front leadership into a more conciliatory attitude; but so far without results. They have produced no born-again revolutionaries.

While the terms for majority rule in Rhodesia were under negotiation, as they have been since November, Mr. Young's personal—some would say eccentric—diplomacy may have been defensible in a way. Keeping one foot in the guerrilla camp may have added some pressure on the white Rhodesian regime to come to terms.

But now that there is agreement between Prime Minister Smith and three prominent blacks—an agreement looking to a reasonable and workable transition to majority rule—it is time to call Mr. Young from left field. His one-man policymaking will no longer do.

The reason is simple. In the coming weeks, if all goes well inside Rhodesia, the U.S. must make a crucial choice. We must choose between supporting and welcoming the new Rhodesian government, lifting economic sanctions against it, maybe even giving it military assistance to resist the assault of Soviet- and Chinese-supplied guerrillas, and Mr. Young's obstructive and unreasonable alternative.

Since the Patriotic Front flatly refuses to cooperate in a Rhodesian settlement which it cannot dominate, the Young policy could put us in league with the outside spoilers against the internal peacemakers—even after elections, even after a government is formed, and even, conceivably, after the new regime has been endorsed by the British government. Not even Dr. Owen clings, as does Mr. Young, to the stubborn view that an internal settlement is necessarily unworkable.

The obvious question, then: Is Ambassador Young alone to run a one-man show on American policy in Southern Africa? Or will his superiors at the White House and the State Department insist, as they should, that American policy is too important to be tied to the whim of one official?

The new arrangement between Prime Minister Smith and the black moderates of Rhodesia demands at least open-mindedness on our part. If that arrangement proves fair and workable, if it is sustained by fair elections, the U.S will have no choice consistent with our own political values but to endorse, welcome and assist it. If the Russians and Chinese and Cubans conspire to try to overthrow the new regime, we should see that the Rhodesian army has the means to defend the country.

That means Mr. Young must be weaned from his infatuation with the guerrillas. The weaning is already overdue.

BLUNDER OVER RHODESIA

(By James J. Kilpatrick)

LONDON.—In both London and Washington, we are witnessing these days the making of a monumental blunder. By their refusal to embrace the Rhodesian settlement, Britain and the United States are demonstrating to the whole world how the West will be lost.

There are terrible failures afoot—failures of understanding, failures of purpose, failures of will. Britain and the United States have been handed a golden opportunity to advance every conceivable interest they might have in southern Africa—and the two Western nations seem aimlessly inclined to muff it.

How can these interests be defined? Unless reason has fled our temples altogether, we are interested in halting the spread of Soviet-Cuban adventuring in Africa; we are interested in having an anti-Communist, as distinguished from a pro-Communist regime in this part of the world. We are interested in seeing in Rhodesia a peaceful, multiracial, more or less democratic society, in which the black majority rules without obliterating the rights and the property of the white.

The settlement reached between Prime Minister Ian Smith and the three moderate black leaders provides all these things. Without bloodshed, and without provoking incurable animosities, this agreement would transform white Rhodesia into black Zimbabwe by the end of this year. All that is required is for Britain and the United States publicly to welcome the compact, and to throw their influence, their money and their arms behind its acceptance.

In Washington, President Carter and Secretary of State Cyrus Vance are vacillating U.N. Ambassador Andrew Young, foot in mouth, is saying the fatuous things for which he is justly acclaimed. Here in London, Foreign Secretary David Owen is under heavy pressure from Conservative forces, but he seems to have no clear idea of what to do. He is stalling.

This is their explanation: The settlement does not include the terrorist factions headed by Joshua Nkomo and Robert Mugabe. The objection is quite simply fantastic. Nkomo and Mugabe, by the most generous description, are a pair of Marxist freebooters whose main interest lies in gaining power for themselves. Neither cares a fig for democracy, for human rights, for the ideal of one man, one vote.

Nkomo and Mugabe profess to lead the "Patriotic Front." Theirs is the patriotism of murder, mutilation and rape. Over the past two years, their ragtag guerrilla forces, amounting to no more than 5,500 persons, have committed unspeakable atrocities upon blacks unwilling to fall in line.

The fear voiced by the Carter administration is that guerrilla warfare will continue if Nkomo and Mugabe are not given power in a new government. But this is pusillanimous counsel. There is no way of knowing what support the two brigands might command in a free and fair election. Nothing in the pending settlement would prevent Nkomo and Mugabe from political participation in the future. If they can win power through the democratic process, well and good; but it is madness to insist that they be handed power on a platter.

There are times when great powers must act as great powers. Ordinarily nothing much may be lost, save only self-respect, in bootlicking the United Nations and fawning upon the Organization of African States. It is nice to be loved. But now and then great powers must flex their muscles and impose their will.

Such a time is at hand in Rhodesia. Britain and the United States need only to act decisively, promptly and fearlessly. So far as we are concerned, they might say that the U.N. sanctions no longer will be honored; we will support the new government with credits, loans, diplomatic recognition, and with whatever military aid may be required to smash the guerrillas and their Communist Cuban allies.

There would be howls from the Third World. The congressional black caucus would object. Ambassador Young might even resign. Hallelujah! Do Britain and the United States have the wisdom and the guts to stand up in Rhodesia for what is right? The maddening answer, so far, is: No.●

STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE DAVE STOCKMAN, MEMBER OF CONGRESS, BEFORE THE INTERNATIONAL TRADE COMMISSION

HON. DAVE STOCKMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 22, 1978

● Mr. STOCKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am presenting testimony today before the U.S. International Trade Commission concerning a petition for significant restrictions on free trade in zinc. In that testimony, I call to the attention of the Commission that the petition before them represents issues not confined solely to the limited issue of slab zinc imports, but is representative of a key issue in American economic policy.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Congress must maintain its commitment toward full and free trade. For this reason, I would like to share my remarks before the ITC with my colleagues:

STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE DAVE STOCKMAN, MEMBER OF CONGRESS BEFORE THE INTERNATIONAL TRADE COMMISSION

Mr. Chairman, I welcome the opportunity to appear before this distinguished panel today as you consider the questions raised by slab zinc imports. I know that in keeping with its outstanding tradition of fairness and impartiality, the Commission will give complete consideration to all the viewpoints represented in this proceeding.

The issue before the Commission is at once a very narrow question and a question with great ramifications for U.S. trade policy. I believe very strongly that within the limits of its statutory authority, the Commission should examine the petition of the zinc producers in the context of its potential to affect the domestic zinc industry as a whole. But the Commission must also look beyond the narrow confines of the petition to consider the effects on the nation's economy as a whole of establishing the severe import restrictions sought by the domestic zinc producers. The international trade policies of the United States are in a very real sense domestic economic policies as well.

The rising share of U.S. Gross National Product generated by international trade is the surest indication of the importance of a healthy export sector to our domestic economy. Merchandise exports and income from foreign investments constituted 7 percent of GNP in the fourth quarter of 1977, a substantial increase from a share of less than 4.5 percent just ten years ago. Nearly one out of every 14 jobs in this country—employment for some 13 million Americans—depends upon continued U.S. participation in world trade.

Any action by this Commission that inhibits foreign trade has the potential of injuring our prospects for contiued economic growth. The January 1978 Economic Report of the President contains a stern warning to U.S. policy-makers of the consequence of limiting foreign imports. The President's report states that the principal effect of such restrictions is to shift employment from the dynamic export sector firms that have generated much of our economic growth in recent years to low-productivity import-competing industries that offer little hope of job stability or employment growth.

Mr. Chairman, the petition of the zinc producers is a classic demonstration of the dangers inherent in unduly restrictive trade policies. I urge the Commission to reject this petition because of the effects it will have on the domestic zinc industry as a whole, as well as because of its effects on the national economy.

ADVERSE EFFECTS ON DOMESTIC ZINC INDUSTRY

The tariff-rate quota scheme proposed by the zinc producers constitutes an effective 25 percent ad valorem tariff at current prices. When compared to the existing ad valorem rate of 19 percent on zinc alloy, a value-added product, the magnitude of the tariff becomes clear. While the producers offer zinc importers the opportunity to maintain 350,000 short tons of volume without penalty—less than one half of the current sales levels—and permit allocation of this quota, it becomes clear that this tariff will have a profound effect on the price of slab zinc consumed in the United States over the next five years.

The proposed tariff of 7¢ per pound will not result in a direct 7¢ per pound increase in slab zinc prices. Nevertheless, its effect will be substantial. Based on historic price elasticities of demand for slab zinc, the price will rise to an effective "blended price" of about 34.3¢ per pound, in comparison to the current quote of around 29¢. This 18 percent price increase will have the further effect of reducing total demand for zinc from the current level by as much as 1.7–2.2 percent, depending on the extent to which foreign producers raise their within-quota sales price to the protected domestic price.

Because domestic producers will be relieved from competitive presures below this level, these price increases will have a significant impact on the costs of zinc to consumers. Toward the end of the proposed five-year period, the total cost to the economy in higher prices for slab zinc could reach $100 million annually.

Materials prices, however, are not the only measure of the internal cost of the proposed barriers. Domestic alloyers, who are major customers of zinc importers, will be pressed to the wall by this tariff-rate scheme. Unlike the producers, whose vertical integration allows them to purchase duty-free ores and concentrates which can be processed into alloy, the alloyers are dependent on a supply of slab zinc. As their competitors in the alloys market, domestic integrated producers rarely sell slab zinc to alloyers, who are thus completely dependent on imports for raw material. Price considerations aside, the problem of availability will assume major proportions should this petition be allowed. It is ironic that while this Commission has the power to do alloyers grave damage under the Trade Act of 1974, it has no statutory authority to repair that damage. On this basis alone, I would urge you to reject any tariff-quota system for controlling zinc exports. In short, this petition proposes that the Federal government devastate one industry in order to aid another. Other internal ill effects are also implicit in this proposal, however.

As with any tariff or quota, the Federal government is being asked to grant economic rents to zinc producers to the extent that their legally-protected price exceeds a free market price. As I noted above, these economic rents could reach $100 million dollars annually. The great bulk of these rents will be received by the producers in the form of windfall profits. To see this, we can view how conveniently the proposed tariffs fit into the producer industry's expansion plans.

As the petitioners' submission indicates, current domestic production capacity is roughly 640,000 short tons annually. With the addition of a 90,000 ton facility in Tennessee in 1978–79, capacity will reach 730 thousand tons. In their petition, the producers state that this amount of capacity will be sufficient to meet domestic demand when augmented by 350 thousand tons of additional-duty-free tariff-rate quota slab zinc.

Indeed it will. The price increase outlined earlier will depress domestic demand, based on historical elasticities, to a level equivalent to 1.08 million tons. As you can see, Mr. Chairman, when the allowable exports are subtracted from the projected demand, the remaining demand is for 730 thousand tons, which is precisely the projected capacity of domestic plants.

In order to achieve this degree of market penetration, the producers need an increase in the price of zinc equal to the tariff barriers they are seeking. In this sense, the Commission is being presented with a self-fulfilling prophecy. The cost of implementation is high, however. Other than allowing producers to complete their otherwise ill-advised expansion plans on schedule, few new jobs will be created in the zinc-producing industry. The zinc producers will report record profits. And the American consumer of zinc products—including anyone who drives a car or owns appliances—will be left with the bill.

ADVERSE EFFECTS ON U.S. ECONOMY

Even this presentation of the costs of the proposed tariff-rate quotas considerably understates the cost of the proposal to the U.S. economy. As I noted earlier, Americans should be concerned with the volume of U.S. exports as well as with the price of imports when formulating trade policy. If taken as a signal of things to come in American trade policy, granting this petition could not fail to have an adverse impact on United States exports.

Although the role of the European Community in zinc production is rising, the dominant share of the U.S. import market still belongs to Canada, which produces roughly half of all slab zinc imported in this country. Since 1971, we have achieved rough trade balance with Canada, with exports to Canada bringing in $29.6 billion to the U.S. in 1977. At present, despite the slide of the dollar against other major world currencies, we have made gains against the Canadian dollar, which has fallen from a value of $1.0256 in June of 1976 to $0.888 this week. This devaluation of the Canadian dollar may have a negative impact on our exports to Canada during 1978 as American goods become relatively more expensive. Yet, the inhibiting effect of currency differentials is mild compared to the potential damage of unilateral trade barriers. Canada could be allocated a substantial share of the 350,000 ton tariff-rate quota proposed by the zinc producers. But granting this petition would still reduce their imports volume by more than 10 percent even if they were allocated all of the quota. Even at today's low relative prices, this would represent at least a $26 million loss of foreign trade—and foreign exchange in stronger dollars—to Canada. I suspect that they will not be pleased. In particular jeopardy would be our agricultural exports to Canada, which have been growing at a rate of four times our overall export growth rate to Canada since 1972. A large share of Canada's food imports from the U.S. are of the supplementary type, which are particularly susceptible to retaliatory barriers. I, for one, do not believe that the domestic agricultural economy is sufficiently strong to overcome any amount of new restrictive trade practices, which are the inevitable result of a policy which will be construed as highly discriminatory against Canada regardless of the quota allotment offered.

I could continue, if time would permit, to catalogue the unique sets of circumstances which bind us to zinc exporting nations through the channels of international trade, and the highly negative reaction these countries would have to such massive additional barriers to free trade in slab zinc. In all, the potential losses in international markets of U.S. export potential far outweigh any illusory employment effects at home.

Mr. Chairman, I have never endorsed the concept of public jobs as a policy alternative to deal with high unemployment. Yet I would far prefer to offer such a job to those workers whose jobs are alleged to be in jeopardy from imported slab zinc than to allow this petition. Combining the producers' own employment estimates with reasonable estimates of the total economic cost of this proposal, it is plain that the price of restoring employment in the zinc industry to 1971 levels would be over $75,000 per job. If we only wish to save those existing jobs allegedly jeopardized by imports, the cost per job would be even higher. In short, trade barriers are the highest cost solution to domestic employment problems.

Mr. Chairman, the ITC is under increasing pressure from those who find political fictions easier to swallow than hard economic fact. The Commission is asked with increasing frequency to restrict the flow of imports into the United States. According to Administration data, the Commission's actions last year resulted in tariffs and non-tariff barriers affecting roughly $3 billion dollars of imports, or three-fifths of the total dollar volume of exports you were petitioned to restrict. The 1974 Trade Act directs the Commission to consider the overall public interest in deciding questions of import relief. I urge that after a careful evaluation of the facts in this case, you deny this petition. The overall economic health of the nation is inextricably tied to full and free trade.●

SENATE—Monday, April 3, 1978

(Legislative day of Monday, February 6, 1978)

The Senate met at 12 noon, on the expiration of the recess, in executive session, and was called to order by Hon. JIM SASSER, a Senator from the State of Tennessee.

PRAYER

Ever-living God, we come into this place fresh from moments of spiritual exaltation with hearts full of praise and thanksgiving for Thy wondrous acts in the long pilgrimage of man. Help us

Statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor will be identified by the use of a "bullet" symbol, i.e., ●

Beyond this prayer may a private petition arise from every heart seeking to know and to do Thy will, through Him who is the Lord of all life. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. EASTLAND).

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

U. S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D.C., April 3, 1978.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable JIM SASSER, a Senator from the State of Tennessee, to perform the duties of the Chair.

JAMES O. EASTLAND,
President pro tempore.

Mr. SASSER thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, as in legislative session, that the legislative Journal be approved to date.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF LEADERSHIP

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be, as in legislative session, a period under the control of the two leaders for not to exceed 10 minutes each.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NOMINATIONS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of nominations beginning with New Reports.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I advise the distinguished majority leader that the nominations under National Council on the Arts, U.S. Marine Corps, and nominations placed on the Secretary's desk, have been cleared on our calendar, and we have no objection to proceeding to their consideration at this time and to their confirmation.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished minority leader.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The nominations will be stated.

NATIONAL COUNCIL ON THE ARTS

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Theodore Bikel of Connecticut, to be a member of the National Council on the Arts.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Maureen Dees, of Alabama, to be a member of the National Council on the Arts.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Jacob Lawrence, of Washington, to be a member of the National Council on the Arts.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

U.S. MARINE CORPS

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Lt. Gen. Robert H. Barrow to be general.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

NOMINATIONS PLACED ON THE SECRETARY'S DESK

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the U.S. Air Force and in the Army placed on the Secretary's desk.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the nominations be considered en bloc.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations are considered and confirmed en bloc.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order to move to reconsider en bloc the votes by which the nominations were confirmed.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I make that motion.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of these nominations.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE CALENDAR

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, there are three bills which I believe have been cleared on the calendar for action. They are Calendar Orders Nos. 650, 651, and 652.

I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of those measures, as in legislative session.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, the majority leader is correct. These items are cleared, and we have no objection to proceeding to their consideration and passage at this time.

AMERICAN INDIAN RELIGIOUS FREEDOM

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 102) entitled "American Indian Religious Freedom," which had been reported from the Select Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments as follows:

On page 1, line 4, strike "American Indians" and insert "Native Americans";

On page 3, line 4, strike "rites; and be it further" and insert "rites.";

On page 3, line 5, strike "Resolved, That" and insert "SEC. 2. The President shall direct";

On page 3, line 6, strike "executive" and insert "departments,";

On page 3, line 6, after "agencies" insert a comma and "and other instrumentalities";

On page 3, line 7, strike "responsible for administering such laws are directed" and insert "whose duties impact on Native American religious practices";

On page 3, line 9, after "procedures" insert "in consultation with Native religious leaders";

On page 3, line 10, after "determine" insert "and implement";

On page 3, line 11, strike "appropriate";

On page 3, line 12, strike "Indian";

On page 3, line 13, after the period insert the following:

"Twelve months after approval of this resolution, the President shall report back to Congress the results of his evaluation, including any changes which were made in administrative policies and procedures, and any recommendations he may have for legislative action.".

So as to make the joint resolution read:

Whereas the freedom of religion for all people is an inherent right, fundamental to the democratic structure of the United States and is guaranteed by the first amendment of the United States Constitution;

Whereas the United States has traditionally rejected the concept of a government denying individuals the right to practice their religion and, as a result, has benefited from a rich variety of religious heritages in this country;

Whereas the religious practices of the American Indian (as well as Native Alaskan and Hawaiian) are an integral part of their culture, tradition, and heritage such practices forming the basis of Indian identity and value systems;

Whereas the traditional American Indian religions, as an integral part of Indian life, are indispensable and irreplaceable;

Whereas the lack of a clear, comprehensive, and consistent Federal policy has often resulted in the abridgment of religious freedom for traditional American Indians;

Whereas such religious infringements result from the lack of knowledge or the insensitive and inflexible enforcement of Federal policies and regulations premised on a variety of laws;

Whereas such laws were designed for such worthwhile purposes as conservation and preservation of natural species and resources but were never intended to relate to Indian religious practices and, therefore, were passed without consideration of their effect on traditional American Indian religions;

Whereas such laws and policies often deny American Indians access to sacred sites required in their religions, including cemeteries;

Whereas such laws at times prohibit the use and possession of sacred objects necessary to the exercise of religious rites and ceremonies;

Whereas traditional American Indian ceremonies have been intruded upon, interfered with, and in a few instances banned: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That henceforth it shall be the policy of the United States to protect and preserve for Native Americans their inherent right of freedom to believe, express, and exercise the traditional religions of the American Indian, Eskimo, Aleut, and Native Hawaiian, including but not limited to access to sites, use and possession of sacred objects, and the freedom to worship through ceremonial and traditional rites.

SEC. 2. The President shall direct the various Federal departments, agencies, and other instrumentalities whose duties impact on Native American religious practices to evaluate their policies and procedures in consultation with Native religious leaders in order to determine and implement changes which may be necessary to protect and preserve Native American religious cultural rights and practices. Twelve months after approval of this resolution, the President shall report back to Congress the results of his evaluation, including any changes which were made in administrative policies and procedures, and any recommendations he may have for legislative action.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be considered and agreed to en bloc.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95–709), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PURPOSE OF THE MEASURE

The intent of Senate Joint Resolution 102 is to insure that the policies and procedures of a variety of Federal agencies are brought into compliance with the constitutional injunction that Congress shall make no laws abridging the free exercise of religion.

BACKGROUND

Native Americans have an inherent right to the free exercise of their religion. That right is reaffirmed by the U.S. Constitution in the Bill of Rights, as well as by many State and tribal constitutions. The practice of traditional native Indian religions, outside the Judeo-Christian mainstream or in combination with it, is further upheld in the 1968 Indian Civil Rights Act.

Despite these laws, a lack of U.S. governmental policy has allowed infringement in the practice of native traditional religions. These infringements came about through the enforcement of policies and regulation based on laws which are basically sound and which the large majority of Indians strongly support. These laws often embody principles such as the preservation of wilderness areas and the preservation of endangered species for which Indians have actively fought, literally generations before the non-Indian became convinced of their importance.

But, because such laws were not intended to relate to religion and because there was a lack of awareness of their effect on religion, Congress neglected to fully consider the impact of such laws on the Indians' religious practices.

It is only within the last decade that it has become apparent that such laws, when combined with more restrictive regulations, insensitive enforcement procedures and administrative policy directives, in fact, have interfered severely with the culture and religion of American Indians. Interference with the free exercise of native religions has taken place in three general areas.

The first restrictions are denials of access to Indians to certain physical locations. Often, these locations include certain sites—a hill, a lake, or a forest glade—which are sacred to Indian religions. Ceremonies are often required to be performed in these spots. To deny access to them is analogous to preventing a non-Indian from entering his church or temple. Many of these sites not in Indian possession are owned by the Federal Government and a few are on State lands. Federal agencies such as the Forest Service, Park Service, Bureau of Land Management, and others have prevented Indians in certain cases from entering onto these lands. The issue is not ownership or protection of the lands involved. Rather, it is a straightforward question of access in order to worship and perform the necessary rites.

Further, there is the question of cemeteries which were in use at the time of Federal subjugation. In some instances, these lands were put under Federal supervision because they were Indian cemeteries. Yet, today the same tribes cannot bury their religious and political leaders there. There is no overriding reason to deny Indians the right to inter their dead in sanctified ground. Revised regulations and enforcement procedures could allow access for religious purposes and still follow the intent of these laws.

The second major area of Federal violations is the restrictions on use of substances. To the Indians, these natural objects have religious significance because they are sacred, they have power, they heal, they are necessary to the exercise of rites of the religion, they are necessary to the culture integrity of the tribe and, therefore, religious survival or a combination of these reasons. To the Federal Government, these substances are restricted because the non-Indian has made them scarce, as in endangered species, or because they pose a health threat to those who misuse them, as in peyote.

The Federal court system has shown that this apparent conflict can be overcome with the institution of well thought out exceptions. Although acts of Congress prohibit the use of peyote as a hallucinogen, it is established Federal law that peyote is constitutionally protected when used by a bona fide religion as a sacrament. Yet, a lack of awareness or understanding of the law has led some Federal officials to confiscate sacramental substances. Things which have never been prescribed by law, such as pine leaves or sweet grass, have been confiscated by Federal officials who were suspicious that they were some form of drugs. Even worse, medicine bundles once sealed by religious leaders are never to be opened or handled by others. They are worn or carried by Indians for health, protection, and purity. Although containing only legal substances, these medicine bags or bundles have been opened by custom officials searching for drugs, thus making them unclean and valueless.

Another example of overzealous officials is the confiscation of turkey feathers and the feathers of other common birds which are legal for all Americans to possess, but which are taken with the fear that they might be from some endangered bird.

Even the most ardent conservationist cannot match the need of traditional Indians for preserving eagles and hawks. For some plains tribes, much of their religion depends on the existence of these species. Yet, prohibiting the possession and exchange by Indians of feathers in one's family for generations, or the use of feathers acquired legally does not help preserve endangered species. It does prevent the exercise of American Indian religions. Although the enforcement problems create more difficult administrative issues and requires more careful consideration of regulation changes in this area, it is possible to both uphold the intent of the laws and allow for religious freedom.

Where necessary, tribal representatives will be able to institute self-enforcement procedures designed to insure that any exception to general regulatory laws surrounding access to sites, use of sacred objects, et cetera, will be confined to tribal members actually participating in the religious exercise or event.

The third area of concern is actual interference in religious events. In some instances, those who interfere have good motives or are merely curious. These instances include being present at ceremonies which require strict isolation, even to the extent of circling the ceremony in small aircraft. Unlike the other areas, some of these incidents happen because of Federal omissions, rather than actions. In areas where the Federal Government has a duty to act or is the only law enforcement at the site. Federal officials have failed to protect Indian religions from intrusions.

In other instances, it is the Government official who directly interferes. This direct Federal interference in the religious ceremonies imposes upon one religion, by Government action, the values of another. Such action is a direct threat to the foundation of religious freedom in America. It comes far too close to an informal state religion.

America does not need to violate the religions of her native peoples. There is room for and great value in cultural and religious diversity. We would all be poorer if these American Indian religions disappeared from the face of the Earth.

Much can be done to prevent the destruction of Indian religions. For instance, several States have already taken supportive action. During the eagle feather crisis of 1974, many Oklahoma State officials issued statements of support. Montana went beyond rhetoric to pass a State resolution setting forth the policy of free exercise and protection for Indian religions. The State of California has enacted the Native American Historical, Cultural, and Sacred Sites Act of 1976 which takes giant strides in overcoming the problems of access. Unfortunately, to date, with the exception of sporadic efforts by a few individuals, the Federal Government's lack of policy has allowed infringements of religious rights to continue.

ACCEPTANCE AND USE OF RECORDS TRANSFERRED TO THE CUSTODY OF THE ADMINISTRATOR OF GENERAL SERVICES

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1265) to amend chapter 21 of title 44, United States Code, to include new provisions relating to the acceptance and use of records transferred to the custody of the administrator of General Services, which had been reported from the Committee on Governmental Affairs with an amendment to strike all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That chapter 21 of title 44, United States Code, is amended as follows:

(a) In section 2103 delete the words "fifty years" in subsection (2) and substitute in lieu thereof the words "thirty years".

(b) Section 2104 of title 44, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by inserting "(a)" immediately before "The Administrator";

(2) by striking out the third and fourth sentences therein and inserting in lieu thereof the following "Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, when the head of a Federal agency states, in writing, restriction that appear to him to be necessary or desirable in the public interest with respect to the use or examination of records being considered for transfer from his custody to the Administrator of General Services, the Administrator shall, if he concurs, and in consultation with the Archivist of the United States, impose such restrictions on the records so transferred, and may not relax or remove such restrictions without the written concurrence of the head of the agency from which the material was transferred, or of his successor in function, if any. In the event that a Federal agency is terminated and there is no successor in function, the Admininstrator is authorized to relax, remove, or impose restrictions on such agency's records when he determines that such action is in the public interest. Statutory and other restriction referred to in this subsection shall remain in force until the records have been in existence for thirty years unless the Administrator of General Services by order, having consulted with the Archivist and the head of the transferring Federal agency or his successor in function, determines, with respect specific bodies of records, that for reasons consistent with standards established in relevant statutory law, such restrictions shall remain in force for a longer period."; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) With regard to the census and survey records of the Bureau of the Census containing data identifying individuals enumerated in population censuses, any release pursurant to this section of such identifying information contained in such records shall be made by the Administrator of General Services pursuant to the specifications and agreements set forth in the exchange of correspondence on or about the date of October 10, 1952, between the Director of the Bureau of the Census and the Archivist of the United States, together with all amendments thereto, now or hereafter entered into between the Director of the Bureau of the Census and the Archivist of the United States. Such amendments, if any, shall be published in the Register.".

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95–710), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PURPOSE

The purpose of this bill is to require the concurrence of the Administrator of General Services in restrictions placed by agency heads on records that are being transferred to the National Archives. The bill also reduces from fifty (50) to thirty (30) years the period during which such restrictions can remain in force. Additionally, it permits the Administrator to relax, remove, or impose restrictions in the public interest of records of agencies which have been terminated. Finally, the bill requires that the release of any information from Census Bureau records shall be governed by the agreement set out in correspondence between the Archivist of the United States and the Director of the Bureau of the Census (see appendix A); the bill further requires that any such agreements, now or hereafter entered into, shall be published in the Federal Register.

BACKGROUND

Chapter 21 of title 44, United States Code, places the responsibility for archival administration of records being transferred to the National Archives in the Administrator of General Services. However, under present law, the Administrator has virtually no authority with respect to restrictions placed by the transferring agency on the use or examination of its records, when transferred other than to refuse to accept records with improper restrictions. In addition, Federal law requires that statutory and other restrictions on access to historical documents remain in force until such documents are fifty (50) years old. The result of these extended restriction periods has been that access to areas of intense historical significance, as far back as 1927, is severely limited.

MANDATORY APPLICATION OF GENERAL RECORDS SCHEDULES

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1267) to amend sections 3303a and 1503 of title 44, United States Code, to require mandatory application of the General Records Schedules to all Federal agencies and to resolve conflicts between authorizations for disposal and to provide for the disposal of Federal Register documents, which had been reported from the Committee on Governmental Affairs with amendments as follows:

On page 2, line 17, strike "33" and insert "15";

On page 2, line 24, strike "promulgated" and insert "submitted";

On page 2, line 25, strike "pursuant to regulations issued under this chapter" and insert "and authorized by the Administrator pursuant to regulations issued under chapter 33 of this title";

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 3303a of chapter 33, title 44, United States Code, is amended:

(a) by deleting subsection (b) of section 3303a in its entirety, and substituting in lieu thereof:

"(b) Authorizations granted under lists and schedules submitted to the Administrator under section 3303 of this title, and schedules promulgated by the Administrator under subsection (d) of this section, shall be mandatory, subject to section 2909 of this title. As between an authorization granted under lists and schedules submitted to the Administrator under section 3303 of this title and an authorization contained in a schedule promulgated under subsection (d) of this section, application of the authorization providing for the shorter retention period shall be required, subject to section 2909 of this title.";

(b) by striking out the word "may" and substituting in lieu thereof the word "shall" in the first sentence of subsection (d); and

(c) by inserting immediately after the last sentence of subsection (d) the following new sentence: "A Federal agency may request changes in such schedules for its records pursuant to section 2909 of this title.".

Section 1503 of chapter 15, title 44, United States Code, is amended by deleting the fifth sentence and substituting in lieu thereof the following sentence: "The original shall be retained by the General Services Administration and shall be available for inspection under regulations prescribed by the Administrator, unless such original is disposed of in accordance with disposal schedules submitted by the Administrative Committee of the Federal Register and authorized by the Administrator pursuant to regulations issued under chapter 33 of this title; however, originals of proclamations of the President and Executive orders shall be permanently retained by the Administration as part of the National Archives of the United States.".

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be considered and agreed to en bloc.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95–711), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PURPOSE

The purpose of this bill is to require mandatory application of the general records schedules to records of Federal agencies to assist in the orderly disposition of such records. The amendment to 44 U.S.C., section 3303a, would clarify the retention period for records in cases in which an authorization of a general disposal schedule conflicts with a specific disposal schedule for the records of a particular agency.

BACKGROUND

The general records schedules promulgated by the Administrator describe records common to several or all agencies. At present there are 20 general records schedules covering disposal of routine agency records in such areas as personnel, payroll, procurement and supply, and travel. About 35 percent, or 10.5 million cubic feet, of all Federal records are subject to the general records schedules. Under present law these schedules are permissive, that is, agencies are authorized, but not required, to dispose of records when they become eligible for disposal.

Mandatory application of the schedules would require disposal of records now commonly retained by agencies long after the usefulness of the records has ended. Retention of these records is very costly; mandatory application of the schedules could result in an (estimated) annual savings of $2.5 million per year. If the records are unique to an agency, rather than simply of a general nature, they would not be affected by this bill.

Under existing law, section 1503, title 44 U.S.C. provides for the retention in the National Archives of the originals of certain documents published in the Federal Register. The statute also provides for inspection of these documents pursuant to regulations issued by the Administrator of GSA.

With the exception of Presidential proclamations and Executive orders, which will be retained, these documents have sufficient historical or intrinsic value to justify their permanent retention, particularly since they have been published in the Federal Register.

Approximately 1,200 cubic feet of records will be eligible immediately for disposal under this provision, thereby saving storage costs and freeing needed space for more valuable records.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to move to reconsider en bloc the votes by which the three measures were passed.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I make that motion.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I have no further need for my time. So I yield to the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I yield my time under the unanimous-consent agreement and the standing order to the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon (Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD).

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon is recognized.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I thank the leadership for allocating a part of their time to me this morning.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that members of my staff, Rick Rolf and Tom Getman, be accorded the privilege of the floor during the reading of my statement.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UGANDA

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, it is my desire today to insert both into the RECORD and into our consciousness a brief overview of some of the economic considerations which are critical to an understanding of relations between Uganda and the United States. The reasons for our silence on this issue are complex and range from racism to being overwhelmed with other apparently more important issues. But whatever the reasons, it is time that the silence ends.

In the 7 years that Idi Amin has ruled Uganda, what was once a prosperous and promising economy has become an experiment in regressive economics. In the not-so-distant past Uganda's gross national product was growing at a healthy rate of 5 to 6 percent a year. Recently, the rate of productivity has been consistently negative in virtually every sector of the economy. We are all familiar with the horror story of life in Uganda, but what we have not chosen to familiarize ourselves with is the essential (however indirect or unintentional) role that the United States plays in this national monument to the dark side of human behavior. Richard H. Ullman, a member of the editorial board of the New York Times, and formerly a professor of International affairs at Princeton University, aptly summarizes the uniquely nightmarish situation which exists in Uganda:

> In any contemporary lexicon of horror, Uganda is synonymous with state-become-slaughterhouse. The most conservative estimates by informed observers hold that President Idi Amin Dada and the terror squads operating under his loose direction have killed 100,000 Ugandans in the seven years he has held power. Some estimates run as high as 300,000. Many victims have been guilty of nothing more than catching the eye of the killer—a shopkeeper with coveted goods, a Christian in a Muslim village, a civil servant who questions a command, a judge with foreign friends.
> Other governments, in Africa and elsewhere, rule by terror and reward opposition by death: Equatorial Guinea and Cambodia would belong on any list, and there are more. But the scale of official murder in Uganda, its ferocious brutality, and its terrible capriciousness all place Idi Amin's Uganda in a category of its own in which the nearest analogues may be Hitler's Germany or Stalin's Russia. Just as South Africa is unique—an entire system of political and social repression resting on racial distinctions—so Uganda is also. Each, for different reasons, deserves international condemnation.[1]

Prior to the time Amin assumed power, Uganda's principal exports had been coffee, tea, cotton and copper. As a result of his mismanagement of the economy, neglect for the educational system, purging of professionals, and the need to fund mercenaries—the essential underpinning of his regime—Uganda's dependency on revenues derived from coffee exports has increased significantly. Amin's hold on power is critically vulnerable to the dictates of American foreign policy. Last year, coffee exports to the United States constituted roughly a third of Uganda's total export earnings—over $220 million in the first 9 months of this year alone; and more than any other nation in the world.

At the same time, however, this amounts to slightly less than 5 percent of the total amount of coffee imported into the United States; a sum which would cause little if any change in the price of coffee produced at the consumer level. All indications seem to confirm the ability of American companies to seek alternative sources of coffee with relative ease. In fact, the board of directors of the National Coffee Association of the United States, an organization comprised of coffee roasters and coffee importers, has issued a statement of unanimous support for whatever determination the Government of the United States shall reach in this matter. In other words, while our domestic economy would emerge relativley unfazed from a discontinuation of Ugandan coffee purchases, the impact in Uganda would, in all probability, be quite severe.

A critical point to be kept in mind is that a regime which is grounded on demagoguery and fear is incapable of sustaining the loyalty of its inhabitants. The New York Times reports that as much as "95 percent of Amin's armed forces are mercenaries who are loyal only so long as Amin pays them in hard currency." In 1976 estimates place at between 25 and 60 percent the amount of Uganda's GNP used to finance this army. The United States can no longer remain indifferent to the reality of its role as the No. 1 source of financial backing for a man who can only maintain power by systematic genocide.

We can no longer hide in the shadow of indifference and inaction that has characterized the attitude of the Organization of African Unity and the United Nations. To those who would stereotype a boycott of Ugandan coffee as nothing more than a token display of moral outrage, I say that if there were ever a situation where economic sanctions are likely to be effective, it is this one. More importantly, though, successful or not, we will no longer be giving our stamp of approval to the oppression and slaughter of innocent people.

In assessing the possible advantages and disadvantages of a boycott, one issue has been at the forefront of my thinking; that is, what is the possibility that such an action would backfire and thereby cause undue hardship or danger to the lives of innocent Ugandans, specifically the farmers engaged in coffee production? Under normal marketing procedure it would be plausible to assume that a drastic reduction in coffee purchases would severely undercut or eliminate altogether the income of the coffee farmers. The evidence, however, paints a different picture. Indeed, the unique manner in which Uganda's economy functions is precisely the reason why the usual arguments in opposition to economic sanctions, arguments which I generally accept, do not apply here. The population is predominately rural and essentially dependent on subsistence farming—the average farmer lives on a small plot of land averaging 10 to 15 acres.

Staggering inflation and devaluation of the currency rate has led to the elimination of a money-based economy in the rural areas. If it were not for Uganda's favorable climate and fertile soil, rampant starvation would be occurring right now—

> Uganda's coffee is grown almost entirely by peasant smallholders, not on plantations. Growers are required to sell their beans to the state marketing board, and are paid, at a price set by the board, in vouchers redeemable only in nearly worthless Ugandan shillings. Sometimes they are not even paid at all. Their crop is simply seized.[2]

The vouchers are nothing more than empty promises because the revenue generated from these sales is used to finance Amin's regime of terror. Because of this economic and political pressure, many farmers are forced to smuggle their coffee crop into nearby Kenya. The legally exported coffee crop was worth more than a half billion dollars on world markets. The maximum share of this deserved income actually received by Ugandan farmers totaled less than 10 percent of that. According to a number of sources, if a farmer complains, he is immediately slaughtered and silenced forever.

[1] Ullman, Richard: "The United States versus Idi Amin", Foreign Affairs, pp. 529–530, April, 1978.

[2] Ibid., p. 532.

Richard Ullman underscores the fact that the arguments against economic sanctions, while valid in many cases, are not always applicable:

. . . There is a direct relationship between foreign purchases of Uganda's coffee and Amin's murderous regime. Whether he would fall from power if those purchases ceased is a question impossible to answer Many knowledgeable persons think that he would. There is no doubt, however, that he and his closest collaborators would feel the impact of a boycott of Uganda's coffee, and feel it hard. . . Economic sanctions, so the accepted wisdom runs, are blunt instruments. They cannot be 'fine tuned' to impinge only upon those persons whose actions deserve censure. . . . But Uganda's situation is very different. The vast majority of Ugandans, more than 90 percent and including most of the peasant coffee-growers, depend in large measure upon subsistence agriculture for the necessities of life and participate only marginally in the cash economy. An effective boycott of Uganda's coffee would thus seriously curtail the livelihood only of the country's small urban sector, including Amin's army and police.[3]

The State Department's position with regard to this matter is that, and I quote:

It would be extremely difficult to convince all or even most of the countries of Western Europe, Japan or Canada to join any such boycott. And that, historically, boycotts have been relatively unsuccessful and have failed to achieve the objectives desired.

I challenge this argument on several grounds. First, to speak in terms of the necessity to convince all or most of the developed capitalist world in order to bring about significant economic pressure on Amin is not an accurate assumption on which to rest. Payments for coffee from Great Britain and the United States alone account for over 54 percent of Uganda's total export earnings. When France, West Germany, and Japan are added the figure is over 69 percent—

If an American lead were followed by the United Kingdom, where there is perhaps even a greater awareness and abhorrence of Amin, and by only one or two other Western countries, the impact would likely be large. . . . A strong American lead might well stimulate consumer boycotts elsewhere. In any case, denial only of the American market would crimp Uganda's foreign exchange supply. Even that might be enough to precipitate defections from the ranks of Amin's lieutenants.[4]

Thus, while the participation of these countries would be welcome, being in the shambles that it is, the Ugandan economy would be unlikely to withstand the loss of revenue that American companies now provide. The result would be a serious impairment of Amin's ability to buy weapons from the Soviet Union in cash, to meet the payroll of his estimated 20,000 to 30,000 mercenaries and to purchase luxury items.

The concept of unrestrained free trade, which on the whole, and under most circumstances is a wise and logical policy, does not deserve unquestioned allegiance; our commitment to human dignity, freedom, and our abhorrence of Hitler-like barbarism does deserve such allegiance. A failure to act in the face of systematic brutality on a scale rivaled only by Hitler's Third Reich not only undermines the credibility and consistency of U.S. foreign policy, but serves as a symbol of rejection to the hopes and dreams of oppressed peoples around the world who look to us as a source of humane leadership.

Mr. HATCH. My President, I rise to compliment the distinguished Senator from Oregon, my dear friend, for his excellent statement made this morning, and I certainly would like to associate myself with his remarks.

Not only is Senator HATFIELD a tremendous human being——

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HATCH (continuing). But I know how well he thinks these things through and how deeply he feels about moral issues, and I compliment him and support him in his statement.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS: CLASSROOMS OR CLINICS?

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I wish to compliment one of my distinguished colleagues, Senator EDWARD ZORINSKY, who has written a most enlightening piece on the Federal role in developing educational curriculums. He has done the Congress a great service in citing several examples of experimental programs and the alarming effects they have on the physical, mental, and moral development of children.

Questions regarding the funding of these federally initiated projects ought to be raised. I share the opinion of my friend and distinguished colleague, Senator ZORINSKY, that Congress cannot ignore the damaging effects of this curricula any longer. We cannot hide if someone erroneously accuses us of "censorship." We must accept our responsibility to impose restrictions where necessary on those agencies which have substantial budgets and authority to produce educational material.

Mr. President, I urge every Senator to read Senator ZORINSKY's cogent article prior to full Senate consideration of S. 1753, to reauthorize the Elementary and Secondary Education Act. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS—CLASSROOMS OR CLINICS?

(By Senator EDWARD ZORINSKY)

My constituents as well as parents all over the country have become increasingly alarmed by certain changes taking place in our schools. They see dangers in the schools becoming more concerned with children's attitudes, beliefs and emotions than providing them with a basic education. The techniques being widely used today to change children's attitudes and values are an invasion of privacy, a threat to the family unit, and the emotional stability of the child.

Vance Packard, whose books have alerted the public conscience to changes in society which alter our lives, writes in "the People Shapers": "In less than a decade the behavioral technologists have moved in a major way into our compulsory government-operated schools."

The curriculum writers theorists and behavorial scientists who have managed to change the thrust of American education in recent years have been able to accomplish their goals through the use of federal grants from various agencies, particularly the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

A large portion of these grants come under the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (mainly titles I and IV) and are generally described as "innovative" programs. Many of the techniques used in these projects are objectionable to parents and do not improve academic performance. Some examples are: Pre- and post-testing of students for attitudinal change towards sociological problems such as the aged, population, death, etc.; Role playing to diagnose attitude and simulation games to change attitudes; Keeping of diaries; and, Behavior modification, not just for the handicapped or special education students, but the normal child. As stated by one of my constituents, "A great majority of these materials deal with some sort of desperate need to treat ALL students as if they lived in a mental health center." Some of the objectionable programs funded under the Elementary and Secondary Education Act which have been brought to my attention include the following:

1. Project Reflect. Pre-testing and post-testing to achieve "desirable concepts."

2. Hilda Taba Social Studies. Altering attitudes through emotional, psychological and psycho-therapeutic techniques. This course was investigated by the California Legislature, hearings were held, and the program was dropped. It was later introduced into other states and additional funds were granted.

3. APEX English curriculum. Subjecting students to radical, sensational materials most of which are contrary to basic family concepts.

4. Contact Language Arts Series. Self-disclosure techniques leading to invasion of privacy of students and parents.

5. Human Development in the Family—Home Economics. Students being asked to read Sexology Magazine, discuss homosexual marriage, keep diaries about conflicts in the home. They are asked how much money the family spends on them, how many charge accounts parents have, etc. Students are sacrificing class time in nutrition, diet, cooking and sewing for this human development unit.

6. Project Developmental Continuity. Materials and techniques for students with handicapping conditions are being used in regular classes with students not identified as having handicapping conditons. Children placed in this project can be harmed emotionally and socially, and participation should be voluntary.

7. Understanding Child Maltreatment. For all grades—kindergarten through 12th. Teaches children how to tell if they are being abused by their parents who are referred to as "caretakers." Some typical acts of "abuse" are "unrealistic demands, unequal sibling treatment, consistently negative responses . . ." of which almost all parents would be found "guilty" in the children's minds at one time or another.

8. Humanities Education Materials. Includes How to Live With Your Parents and Survive, a "humorous" presentation on why parents of today are such poor excuses for parents. Another course, Living with Dying, insinuates that it is unrealistic to search for immorality. Other death education courses in this project have led to fixations to the point where children have nightmares and physicial symptoms such as stomach pains. Doctors have stated this is unhealthy and unnecessary. (Note: This program was evaluated. The third quarterly evaluation report stated that lack of full teacher involvement remains an area of concern, yet the evaluators recommended that the program be continued and the following year the entire school profile should be coordinated into a Humanities Learning Center—a total Humanistic School).

These are a few examples of behavior modification programs which HEW should be required to justify before Congress approves continued funding for such projects. Usually HEW describes the entire program in glowing and general terms, rather than on the basis of the number of programs funded as compared to those found to be successful. However, my requests for evaluation and justification of these types of programs have gone unanswered. It may well be they are unable to justify these expenditures for the following reasons:

1. There is not even a listing of total innovative projects funded, despite the requirement for such a listing in Section 424 of the General Education Provisions Act, 1974. Even though HEW is now attempting to identify currently funded projects, where there was a measure of effectiveness, they claim a complete listing is impossible.

2. A very small percentage of the innovative projects have been evaluated. The few examples listed in "Educational Programs that Work" are those which local school districts voluntarily evaluated and submitted to the Joint Dissemination Review Panel. This would indicate that the vast majority of these programs do not work.

3. A recent study at the U.S. Office of Education and the National Institute of Education entitled "A Research Perspective on Educational Improvement" questions the effectiveness of many of these federally-funded projects. This work was based on reviews of nearly all the major studies on educational innovation since 1970. The report states that "Most projects funded by these programs were designed primarily to take advantage of the availability of federal money."

4. An earlier study by the National Institute of Education indicates that the Office of Education provides little clear guidance or supervision in administering federal aid to education. Auditors have become so discouraged with the infighting and failure to enforce federal laws that they are now reluctant to audit school aid programs.

5. The GAO report on Office of Education Programs (9/77) stated unequivocally that the Congress should recognize that HEW is not incompliance and does not intend to comply with the General Education Provisions Act requirement regarding evaluation of Office of Education programs.

6. The GAO report on Federal Support of Curriculum Materials and Behavior Modification Techniques Used in Local Schools (4/77) indicated that federal funding for curriculum development and dissemination and for other education techniques, such as behavior modification, is significant. Yet it noted that data needed to accurately assess the impact of federal funding on behavior modification techniques used in local schools does not exist.

An article in the New York Times Magazine in 1977 and recently reprinted in Readers Digest entitled, "The More We Spend, the Less Children Learn," claimed that "in 1976, $75 billion bought schools filled with new technology, 'innovative programs'—and poorly educated pupils." It stated, "The factor that does appear to affect academic performance is the degree to which the schools sacrifice traditional disciplines and subjects for the sake of 'innovative' teaching activities." Similar articles have appeared in such magazines as the New Republic, The American School Board Journal, Psychology Today, Learning Magazine and Newsweek.

Many teachers are becoming disturbed by these programs. Instructor magazine, a monthly publication for elementary teachers, recenty conducted a survey of its readers, asking "Is Teaching Hazardous to Your Health?" Most of the 10,000 teachers who responded cited "stress" as their biggest health problem and complained of headaches, hypertension and nervous stomachs. When asked what the one factor contributing most to this stress was, a significant number responded that it was the growing pressure of monitoring students' social and moral development. This finding was reported in the feature article of the February 26, 1978, issue of Parade magazine.

A serious question is raised when Congress permits programs such as those I have described to continue with federal help. When concerns are voiced, the advocates of behavior modification cry "censorship" and demend even more federal funds with less controls. They ignore warnings from authorities such as Dr. David Elkind of the University of Rochester, speaking at the annual meeting of the American Psychological Association in 1977. He stated that "a segment of mental health specialists is putting its own interests ahead of children's welfare . . . that for children under 12, affective education can be confusing and possibly disturbing." He stated that "one-fourth to one-half of young children categorized as 'learning disabled' are really curriculum disabled, victims of the floods of untested, poorly written learning materials that inundate the schools."

Those who defend these grants, in the agencies as well as in the Congress, argue against Federal interference, citing the law prohibiting Federal control of education. However, an analysis of the intent of this provision prepared by the American Law Division of the Library of Congress, Congressional Research Service, states, "The prohibition would not, however, appear to limit the applicability of conditions which Congress attaches to its grant-in-aid programs." This is only sensible. The picture of Congress sitting by helplessly while the bureaucrats indiscriminately hand out money for all kinds of social experiments is absurd.

My findings indicate that even those persons who favor innovation admit that it fails to bring about significant educational improvement. Walter Borg of the Far West Laboratory for Educational Research and Development, at a 1970 conference of persons actively involved in attempts to change the schools, stated that:

"Local innovations are almost never subjected to any sort of rigorous evaluation. Thus, for most innovations we do not really know whether the new approach is better than the old. Innovations are usually adopted not because they are better, but because they are different." He further stated, "Perhaps the best reason for abandoning local innovation as national strategy for improving education is that it is incredibly inefficient and expensive. We need look no further than Title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 to illustrate this point. The proponents of Title I assumed that if you gave local schools enough money they would build new programs and bring about improvement in education.To date Title I has provided us with a shocking six-billion-dollar test of this assumption. Although it is not easy to get quantitative data on Title I projects (since most of them have collected little or no valid research evidence), what information we do have indicates that these projects have brought about virtually no real improvement in the schools. Of course, no program that involves thousands of projects and spends billions of dollars can be completely barren, but it is sadly apparent that Title I has produced tons of chaff for every ounce of wheat. He further stated, ". . . large scale attempts to legislate educational improvement through local innovation, such as Title I, without doubt constitute the most wasteful and unproductive strategy that has ever been devised."

It should be noted that these comments were directed only to Title I, while most innovative programs are funded under Title IV.

How many more years we will continue to perpetuate this waste—not only of tax dollars but of children's precious school years? Children can be properly educated without infusion of new federal funds. The President has requested higher expenditures to support emphasis on the teaching of basic skills. If additional funds are needed, Congress can fund these efforts by yielding to the overwhelming evidence and ending the funding of unproven, unnecessary and unwanted projects.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY DEBATE

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the proposed Panama Canal treaties will soon be reaching the Senate floor for a vote. It is not fashionable to oppose these treaties, a situation reflected most clearly in the news coverage of the ongoing debate. Opponents have been consistently characterized as indulging in grade-school chauvinism, and the overwhelming disapproval expressed by the American public has been repeatedly represented as "backward" and "blind to present-day realities."

This attitude of condescension is dangerous for several reasons. It calls into question the integrity of a system that was originally designed to reflect the will of its citizens. It divests treaty proponents of their responsibility to answer the very many serious questions that remain unresolved by the present version of the treaties. And it deprives the issue at hand of the larger context within which a matter of such grave implications should necessarily be considered.

An extremely perceptive article, appearing in the December issue of the American Security Council's Washington Report, does a great deal toward restoring the perspective vital to the consideration of these important treaties. I commend it to the careful attention of my colleagues, and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY WE MUST KEEP THE CANAL

The abysmal level of the public debate over the Panama Canal was epitomized in a national interview with a prominent undecided Senator. Asked what considerations he was weighing in making up his mind, the first thing he mentioned was the veto power the new treaties give Panama over a second canal. The public pondering of such details has spread the impression that only trivia is at stake in this debate. Nothing could be further from the truth.

The public advocates of keeping the canal, however, have missed the point almost as badly as that Senator. The primary issue is not the military importance of the canal. It is not the economic importance of the canal. And it is certainly not the details of the new treaties. The primary issue is the right of the United States to exist.

The moral principle at stake is the right of the United States to keep her values, her achievements, her wealth, in the face of overwhelming global opposition. And since a country, like a man, cannot survive without values, at issue is the right of the United States to survive.

That is why the American people oppose the new treaties. That is the principle behind their desperate feeling that giving away the canal would be wrong in some way much more important than they know how to say. When they tell reporters "we have given away too much already," and "we have to stop letting them push us around," that is what they are trying to say. Though they lack the words, they see surrender of the canal for what it would be: a step in the direction of renunciating the United States' right to her values and her life.

Unfortunately, a national debate cannot be won without the words. It is not enough for people to be right. They must know why they are right. They must have the words and principles to defend their position. What happens when they do not has been most evident in the United States Senate.

Because they did not know how to oppose surrender of the canal in principle, a number of Senators have tried to prevent its surrender by becoming enmeshed in debate over the details of the new treaties. In doing so, they have made several significant contributions to the other side.

They have accepted a context for debate where it is treated as already established that we should give up the canal and the dispute therefore, is only over the side conditions. They have trapped themselves in a position where, if the conditions to which they object are changed, they cannot vote against the treaties. And they have been diverted from giving any effective leadership or voice to their enormous support in the general population.

What position should they have taken? How should the new treaties be opposed? The most damning evidence against the treaties is the arguments that are given in their favor. Those arguments fall into two general categories: the practical arguments and the moral arguments; or the arguments from fear and the arguments from guilt.

THE PRACTICAL ARGUMENTS

The most extreme, and therefore the clearest, of the practical arguments holds that if the Senate rejects the new treaties, Panama will become "another Vietnam." In other words, we should give up the canal out of fear of a war with Panama or, even more disgraceful, out of fear of independent guerrillas.

This argument marks a new low in the level of political discourse in this country and not many have had the effrontery to make it openly. That it has been left largely to implication and innuendo is the only sign that our leaders retain any respect for the American people.

For example, it was argued explicitly before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that the best way to retain access to the canal is to give it to Panama so they will be on our side if we should have to defend it. It is very revealing (and somewhat frightening) that this argument was taken at face value by all the news media, and its implications went completely unnoticed.

Militarily, observe the helplessness of the United States implied by so desperate a need for support, and from Panama of all places, as to justify giving away the canal.

Strategically, observe the absurdity of assuring access to the canal by placing all the complex, delicate machinery and equipment and controls for its operation in the hands of a potential enemy.

And, finally, since attacks by Panama are the only current danger to the canal's security, observe the threat implied by raising the issue of, and hence doubts about, our access to the canal. The real meaning of that argument was that if we try to keep the canal, Panama will deprive us of its use, and therefore we had better give it to them.

To spread this kind of thinking an unforgiveable campaign has been carried on through the media for the last several months, specifically directed at undermining the self-confidence of the American people and frightening us into giving up the canal. Its most disgraceful element has been the effort by our own military leaders to leave the impression, again by hint, insinuation, an innuendo, that the United States is militarily impotent to assure the security of the Panama Canal.

The argument about access to the canal, for example, was repeated several times before the State Foreign Relations Committee by military leaders. When the Panamanian dictator was making thinly veiled threats of guerrilla war, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff did not dismiss him as absurd. Rather he implied that the threat was serious by saying he could not defend the canal with 100,000 men.

In the face of this atmosphere of national self-abasement, when President Carter clearly stated that we can and will defend the canal, his declaration came like a breath of fresh air. Then, he threatened that it would be a major, difficult, dangerous undertaking, thus contributing to that atmosphere himself.

It is shameful that this kind of fear was a major factor in the negotiations for the new treaties. Fear is a disastrous motive on which to base policy in any case. But whatever consequences might have been expected from such a policy, ceding the canal out of fear of Panama would have been beyond anyone's ability to predict.

There is no way that Panama could become another Vietnam. Militarily, the two situations have nothing significant in common. Guerrillas could be even a minor problem only if we insisted on following the same insane policy we pursued in Vietnam of fighting effects rather than causes.

In this case, however, fighting of any kind can be avoided altogether. All that is necessary is a statement by the President that an attack on any part of the Canal Zone would be considered an attack on the United States, and that any country supporting such an attack would be considered an enemy of the United States and treated accordingly.

The practical argument also holds that surrender of the canal is essential for good diplomatic relations with the Latin American countries. But even if they were the great powers of this hemisphere, it would be obviously self-defeating to curry their favor by giving away our possessions.

Yet, blinded by a frantic, suicidal anxiety over the good opinion of the world in general and our southern neighbors in particular, that is the course insisted on by most of our political and intellectual leaders. The tragic failure of their leadership to be worthy of the American people was never more evident.

It would undoubtedly be pointless to remind those leaders that it is we who are the great power here, and if anyone should worry about good opinions, it is our southern neighbors who should worry about ours.

THE MORAL ARGUMENTS

But if the practical arguments are insulting, the moral arguments are worse, much worse.

It is said we stole the canal and our presence in the area represents a colonialist affront to the sensitive feelings of the Latin American people. We should give up the canal, it is implied, out of guilt for these offenses.

The charge of colonialism, thought repeated mindlessly by everyone, is a transparent fraud. A colony was a settlement of people, not an industrial engineering enterprise. A colony, by definition, was administered for the economic benefit of the mother country. The Panama Canal is not a colony, nor has the United States ever had a colony anywhere in the world.

But the vilest distortion in the whole debate is the charge we stole the canal. It is the exact opposite of the truth.

The opposite of theft is production. We did not steal the canal; we built it. The moral right of the United States to the canal is the right of any creator to what he has created. That right, however, is a property right, the root of all property rights, and it is not surprising that modern intellectuals and politicians are unwilling to defend anything based on that source.

It is their view that control of the canal by the Panamanians is a legitimate aspiration of the Latin American people. But there is no such thing as a "legitimate aspiration" by some to an achievement created by others.

Not only did the United States pay the costs of constructing the canal, it was her citizens who figured out how to conquer the previously unconquerable obstacles and then directed the construction in an enormously heroic effort. The Panama Canal was the greatest engineering feat in the history of many up to that time and we did it.

Nothing is more depraved than ridiculing the American people for their pride in their canal, a tactic adopted by some, not all, of the advocates of the new treaties. No people ever had a better right to pride in any national accomplishment. The Panama Canal is a reflection and embodiment of all that is best in the American character.

Whatever shenanigans were involved in getting sovereignty over the Canal Zone, and no one's account makes them very serious, they are nothing next to the incredible achievement of the canal itself. Without us, the Canal Zone would be just so much empty, deadly, malaria infested lakes and jungle—as would the rest of Panama.

If one considers what Panama would be like today without the canal, it is clear who has received a disproportionate share of the benefits, and if moral debts were to be collected, who would owe what to whom. Then consider that an agreement reached in conjunction with the new treaties calls for us to pay them some 345 million dollars. This is over and above the negotiated increase in payments for use of the Canal Zone from 2.3 million to about 60 million dollars a year.

WHY THEY WANT THE CANAL

There is no moral justification whatever for the demand that the United States give up the canal. What then is the cause of that demand? The same cause that is the leitmotiv in the treatment of the United States by most of the undeveloped world.

It is the motive behind the burning of American consulates, the attacks on American diplomats, the seizure of American fishing boats, the expropriation of American property, the constant attempts to humiliate us in the U.N., all of it accompanied by demands for more money, and lately, by claims of a right to a share of our wealth.

Stripped of the meaningless vicious jargon about colonialism, imperialism, and exploitation, the moral argument holds that we must give up the canal to satisfy the malice, hatred, and envy of the worst elements in the Latin American countries, and indeed, in the whole undeveloped world. Those are the "sensitive feelings" we are accused of affronting.

What is the cause of this global hostility toward the United States? It comes from two related sources.

First, whether communist, fascist socialist, or non-ideological, the undeveloped countries of the world are almost all dictatorships. As such, their hatred and fear of the United States has a purely practical element.

We are the last, best, shining example of the kind of life that is possible to man on earth when he is left free. We are the unavoidable proof that the brutality, torture, terror, and death they have imposed on their people are unnecessary.

But the more fundamental cause of their opposition is also the cause of tyranny as such. It is "envy" in its most vicious, virulent, destructive sense. It is what Ayn Rand has identified as "hatred of the good for being the good."

Today that motive is widely regarded as normal and natural. It is sympathetically explained, "Of course they hate us and would like to see us destroyed. After all, we are rich, and they are poor; we are great and they are small; we have created achievements they cannot approach; we built a canal they could not conceive."

What that view sanctions and expresses is the ultimate evil in human psychology, the lowest and worst motive that is possible to man. It represents a hatred of every living human value, the same motive that sets up concentration camps, torture chambers, and dictatorships as ends in themselves.

The canal is a hatred symbol all right, but not of a nonexistent American colonialism. What the canal really symbolizes, and what the value-haters want symbolically to wipe out by making us give it up, is the overflowing abundance of energy, efficacy, and pride of a free people.

To surrender the canal in the face of such a motive is unthinkable. It would mean accepting their view of our virtues as vices and our achievements as stains on our national character. It would mean sanctioning hatred of the United States as natural and right and deserving a positive response. To what portion of our wealth and achievements could we claim a right after that and on what grounds?

That is the most important reason for keeping the Panama Canal. If there were no other reason whatever, that would be sufficient to hold on to it for dear life.

CONCLUSION

Those who think the Vietnam War demonstrated the unwillingness of the American people to fight for their values should think again. The only thing that war demonstrated was that the American people will not fight indefinitely for nothing.

The difference between Vietnam and the Panama Canal is the difference between fighting to save the house of a remote neighbor you have never met and fighting to save your own home.

The American people want to keep the Panama Canal. They are right to want it. And they will support the policies necessary to do so.

There is no practical reason for surrendering the canal. There is no moral reason. There is nothing but the pressure of a viciously irrational global opposition. The Senate should confound that opposition and assert the United States' rights to keep her values and life by rejecting the new treaties.

HALF OF HOUSE MEMBERS WOULD VOTE AGAINST CANAL TRANSFER

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, on March 10, 1978, Scripps League newspapers, including the Daily Herald of Provo, Utah, published an article entitled "Half of House Members Would Vote Against Canal Transfer," by Lee Roderick and Mike Richins.

Based on an off-the-record survey of all 435 Members of the House of Representatives, the article indicates that if a vote on the transfer of the Panama Canal were held today in the House, a majority of the voting Members would vote against the treaties. Roderick and Richins suggest that Members of the House, who all face the voters every 2 years, reflect the sentiments of their constituents more accurately than their counterparts in the Senate.

As the Senate votes today on the future of the Panama Canal treaties, I would like to request that this article appear following my remarks to act as a timely reminder of the responsibility my colleagues and I must accept as we cast our votes.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HALF OF HOUSE MEMBERS WOULD VOTE AGANIST CANAL TRANSFER

(By Lee Roderick and Mike Richins)

WASHINGTON.—If the House of Representatives voted today on whether to transfer the Panama Canal to Panama, nearly half of its 435 members say they would definitely or likely vote no. Less than one-third say they would definitely or likely vote yes.

This is the key finding of an off-the-record survey of all 435 offices by Scripps League Newspapers. The telephone survey was conducted between March 3–9. It suggests the treaties are in even more trouble on Capitol Hill than generally believed.

The House's role in the canal negotiations is a hot issue, with the Carter administration holding that the Senate alone, through its treaty power, can transfer Canal Zone property to Panama. Others cite Article IV, Section 3 of the Constitution to argue that the full Congress must vote on property aspects of the canal treaties as part of the ratification process—rather than after the fact. The House at least will be voting on implementation of the treaties.

Members of the House or their key aides were asked this question in the Scripps League survey: "If the House were allowed to vote today on transferring the Panama Canal and related property to Panama, how would you vote?" Offices not giving a firm "yes" or "no" were then asked: "Are you leaning for or against the property transfer?"

One hundred seventy congressional offices said they would vote no on transferring the property to Panama. An additional 38 said they are leaning against the transfer. The two groups total 208 representatives—48 per cent of the House membership.

Congressmen who say they would vote for transferring the canal to Panama number 102. Another 30 report they are leaning in that direction, for a total of 132 who favor the property transfer. The figure represents 30 per cent of House membership.

Seventy members are uncommitted on the issue and another 25 declined comment.

Almost an equal number of House Democrats and Republicans—106 and 102 respectively—are against, or leaning against, giving the canal to Panama. Only 22 Republicans say they would definitely or likely vote for the transfer along with 110 Democrats.

On a regional breakdown, only 13 members from southern and border states are for, or leaning for, transferring the canal to Panama, with 76 southerners going the other way. In the Northeast, 47 members favor the transfer, with 44 members opposed. In the Midwest, 41 members are in favor, with 53 opposed. In the Far West, 31 members and in favor, with 31 opposed.

The Scripps League findings reveal a sharp contrast between the House and the Senate, which is debating the two canal treaties. Senate Majority Whip Alan Cranston (D-Calif.) said Thursday that 62 Senators—which also means 62 percent—are "almost surely" prepared to vote for treaty ratification, as opposed to only 30 per cent who feel that way in the House.

It is generally believed that representatives, a great majority of whom must face voters in November, reflect the sentiments of their constituents more accurately than their Senate counterparts. Only one-third of the Senators are up for reelection this year.

More than 230 Members of the House have signed a resolution introduced by Rep. George V. Hansen (R-Idaho), which calls for a House vote on property aspects of the treaties as part of treaty ratification.

Constitutional scholars are divided on whether the House has a right to participate in the property aspects of the treaties. The Senate alone clearly has the power, on a two-thirds vote, to ratify or reject a presidential treaty. However, Article IV, Section 3 of the Constitution says "The Congress shall have Power to dispose of . . . the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States; . . ."

Most scholars are in agreement that, if the House did have a say in the canal transfer, it would take a majority of its voting members to approve the transfer. The Scripps League survey indicates that if such a vote were taken today, the House would deny President Carter the right to sign away the canal and adjacent property to Panama.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume the consideration of Executive N, 95th Congress, 1st session, Calendar No. 2, which the clerk will report.

The second assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

Calendar No. 2, Executive N, 95th Congress, 1st session, the Panama Canal Treaty.

AMENDMENT NO. 92

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on agreeing to the amendment (No. 92 by the Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH), with the time thereon to be equally divided and under control.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I have prepared a very lengthy statement in support of my amendment (No. 92) to the Panama Canal Treaty, which has been cosponsored by Senators ALLEN, CURTIS, GARN, HELMS, LAXALT, MCCLURE, THURMOND, EASTLAND, and GOLDWATER. I would like to compliment all of those Senators for the work they have put forth, but in particular the Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN), the chairman of the Separation of Powers Subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, for his excellent work and leadership in this regard. He has permitted me to speak first on this matter, and he will have some very cogent and important words to say as the debate continues.

I would just like to mention that my distinguished friend and colleague, Senator ALLEN, has led the fight in the Senate as chairman of the Separation of Powers Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee pertaining to raising the constitutional issue regarding article IV, section 3, clause 2.

My amendment states:

It is expressly provided that this Treaty shall, in no event, enter into force until the Congress of the United States, in accordance with the provisions of Article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution of the United States of America, shall have disposed of, or shall have authorized the disposition of, the property belonging to the United States of America, or of any of its agencies in the Panama Canal Zone, as it existed on September 7, 1977.

Mr. President, as I have stated, I have prepared a very lengthy statement in support of my amendment to the Panama Canal Treaty, consisting of 89 pages. There will be a number of highly technical constitutional issues involved. I estimate that it will take me between 2 and 4 hours to deliver it.

For those reasons, I would appreciate the courtesy of my colleagues not to interrupt me, because it is technical, analytical, and difficult to deliver, and will be difficult to follow unless I deliver it in toto before questions are asked.

Therefore, I would like to say at the outset that I do not intend to yield the floor for questions until I have completed the statement. As everyone knows, I have always yielded the floor at any time in the past in this debate, but in the delivery of this particular message I will not be able to do that and have the message be as meaningful as we believe it should be. At the conclusion of the delivery of my statement, I shall be happy to respond to any questions Senators may have, and I am prepared to spend the entire day, tomorrow, and right up until Wednesday at 11 o'clock when we are supposed to vote on this amendment, on the floor, to answer questions if that is necessary. I have a few copies of the speech with me, and if any Senator wishes to have a copy of the speech to make notes, I shall be happy to provide him with a copy; but, in accordance with the statement I have just made, Mr. President, I do ask unanimous consent that the statement I am about to deliver be printed in the RECORD in its entirety, without interruption.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATCH. I also ask unanimous consent that Kenneth Merin of the Congressional Research Service of the Library of Congress be accorded the privilege of the floor during the consideration and vote on my amendment No. 92.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.). Without objection, it is so ordered.

MAY THE PRESIDENT DISPOSE OF PUBLIC LANDS BY A SELF-EXECUTING TREATY?

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the Panama Canal Treaty raises the serious constitutional issue of whether the President of the United States has the constitutional authority to transfer U.S. territory in the Canal Zone to the Republic of Panama by treaty alone, without the approval of both Houses of Congress.

The Foreign Relations Committee, as well as representatives of the State Department and the Justice Department, argue that the President possesses authority to dispose of American territory and property by a self-executing treaty. Senate approval of the treaty, they insist, is all that is necessary in order to meet the requirements of the Constitution.

As a member of the Separation of Powers Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee, which has held extensive hearings on this constitutional question, I was somewhat surprised to learn that none of the State Department's legal advisers who testified before the subcommittee was able to cite a clear and unequivocal judicial precedent in support of this novel interpretation of the President's treatymaking power. The testimony of Attorney General Bell, who appeared before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, was, in my judgment, equally deficient of valid judicial precedents that would justify this extraordinary exercise of Executive power. What is more, there appears to be no prior instance in American history when a President laid claim to the existence of such authority.

In effect, then, the President is now claiming for himself a new power, a power to enter a legislative field which Congress has definitively and exclusively controlled since the creation of the Constitution. The Canal Zone was acquired in accordance with the terms of a 1902 statute passed by Congress known as the Spooner Act. By law, Congress authorized the President to acquire from Colombia perpetual control of the necessary lands for the construction of an interoceanic canal across the Isthmus of Panama. Acting in pursuance of this congressional authorization, the President negotiated the Hay-Buneau-Varilla Convention on November 18, 1903, between the United States and that portion of Colombia which became the Republic of Panama. In this manner did the United States acquire in perpetuity the rights to the territory now known as the Canal Zone, with sovereign and exclusive powers to administer it.

Since that time, the Canal Zone has remained an unincorporated territory of the United States. It is administered by the President of the United States, but only in accordance with enabling legislation enacted by Congress. This includes appropriation authority for its administration during the current fiscal year. Laws enacted by Congress have directed the form and substance of the administration and jurisprudence of the Canal Zone from the moment of acquisition to the present. In short, it is Congress which authorized treaty negotiations for the permanent acquisition of the land; and it is Congress which subsequently enacted legislation setting forth the legal status of the Canal Zone, establishing courts of justice, enacting civil and criminal codes, providing for defense, and appropriating money for the maintenance and operation of both the zone and the canal.

Comes now the President, standing on an unprecedented and previously unexercised claim of "concurrent authority," asserting that he has the right to abrogate the power of Congress and repeal the entire statutory structure which Congress has developed since the beginning of the 20th century, without the consent of both Houses of Congress. If the Senate stands aside and allows the President to usurp the powers of the Congress—as it has often done before—it will be preparing the way for further encroachments in the future.

In the first place, "the Panama cession will constitute a landmark which, should the State Department prevail, will be cited down the years for concurrent jurisdiction of the President in the disposition of U.S. property. Acquiescence in such claims spells progressive attrition of congressional powers; it emboldens the Executive to make even more extravagant claims." Second, "it needs constantly to be remembered that a succession of Presidents have circumvented Senate participation in treaties of gravest import by resort to executive agreements."

These are the words, Mr. President, of Raoul Berger, the eminent constitutional authority whose scholarly writings on executive privilege were so vitally instructive to the Congress when we confronted the Presidential claim of self-serving "precedents" relied upon by the executive branch for the purpose of withholding information from Congress or sending American troops into battle without congressional authorization. Today, the President seeks to circumvent the House of Representatives and gain approval for the disposal of billions of dollars worth of American territory merely by a two-thirds vote of the Senate. And what of tomorrow? How long will it be before another President seeks to dispose of other territories by an executive agreement—which is very similar in power to a treaty and does not require any congressional consent at all?

Article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution states that—

> The Congress shall have the power to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States.

The courts have repeatedly ruled that this is an exclusive power of the full Congress. Any authority of the Chief Executive to dispose of U.S. territory, therefore, must first be derived from authority given by an act of Congress.

In light of these considerations, Mr. President, I am offering an amendment to the treaty which would require that it shall enter into force only after both Houses of Congress have authorized the transfer of Canal Zone territory and property to the Republic of Panama.

Mr. President, this is an amendment which all Senators should eagerly support, whether they favor the treaty or oppose it, because it calls upon the Senate to debate the merits of the treaty in its proper constitutional context. It speaks not to our economic, political, or strategic interests, or to the advantages or disadvantages of transferring the canal to the Panamanians, but to the higher law which must govern our proceedings.

What is more important than whether the treaties are approved or rejected is whether they are approved or rejected in the proper constitutional manner. I appeal not to the supporters of the treaties or to the opponents, but to all Senators who believe, as I do, that our constitutional procedures must be obeyed.

Even if I favored this treaty in every respect, even if changes were to be made to make it acceptable, I would continue to insist that article IV of the Constitution be followed. For there is more at stake here than the Panama Canal. There is our Constitution to consider, our separation of powers, and our commitment to limiting the growth of executive power. I would hope that past experience has made it clear to every Member of this body that any President, be he Republican or Democrat, will be tempted to reach beyond the constitutional limits of his office if we neglect our responsibilities to check his advances.

Already we observe that a succession of Presidents have skirted the Constitution in order to get the treaties before the Senate. The Kissinger-Tack agreement of 1974, setting forth the general principles of agreement, was never submitted to the Senate for discussion and debate. Congress has never indicated that it favors any new agreements or treaties with Panama or asked the President to make a new treaty. Presidents have simply labored at their self-appointed task in total disregard of the wishes of Congress and the American people. At no stage of the proceedings, in fact, has the Senate participated in these negotiations, or been given an opportunity to give its advice and consent until after the treaty was signed. To be sure, the Executive has bypassed the Senate, just as it is now seeking to bypass the House.

Mr. President, even the Senate's confirmation process has been avoided by the acquiescence of the Senate in the interim appointment of Sol Linowitz, one of the chief negotiators of the treaties. Where does this abuse of Presidential power stop? At what point does the Senate tell the Executive: "You shall go no farther." I submit, Mr. President, that our last opportunity to confine the office of the President to its proper constitutional limits is embodied in the amendment to the treaty that I have already proposed and am speaking to today.

We have a constitutional duty to perform, and if we do not perform it this treaty will come back to haunt us for years to come. Not only will the legality of the treaty always remain in doubt, but other Presidents will use the treaty as a convenient precedent to bypass the legislative process in future international agreements involving property transfers and territorial cessions.

IS THE PANAMA CANAL ZONE A TERRITORY OF THE UNITED STATES?

Let us turn our attention, then, to the constitutional problem before us, and examine it in detail. The first issue is whether the property ceded by the United States in the Panama Canal Treaty is "territory or other property belonging to the United States" within the meaning of article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution. The answer, of course, is "yes." The State Department, the Attorney General, the Foreign Relations Committee, and the Federal courts all agree that it is United States territory. In the recent case of United States v. Husband R (Roach) 453 F. 2d 1054 (5 Cir. 1971); cert. den. 406 U.S. 935 (1972), the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals asserted that, "The Canal Zone is an unincorporated territory of the United States."

Earlier, in the case of Wilson v. Shaw, 204 U.S. 24 (1907), the Supreme Court also observed that the United States owns the Canal Zone. "It is hypercritical," declared the Court in that case, "to contend that the title of the United States is imperfect, and that the territory described does not belong to this Nation, because of the omissions of some of the technical terms used in ordinary conveyances of real estate."

These decisions of the Federal courts are, of course, entirely consistent with the terms of the 1903 treaty between the United States and Panama. Article 2 of that treaty "grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of said Canal." Article 3 "grants to the United States all the rights, power, and authority within the zone mentioned and described in article 2 of this agreement * * * which the United States would possess and exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority."

In sum, the Canal Zone is an unincorporated territory of the United States, to which the United States has full and complete title. The terms "use, occupation, and control," "in perpetuity," mean, of course, ownership. Our Federal courts have confirmed this, past Congresses have confirmed this, past Presidents have confirmed this, and even the Panamanians have confirmed it. As a matter of law, then, the Canal Zone is a U.S. territory. The fact that it has not been incorporated by Congress is a matter of no consequence, since the question is whether the territory belongs to the United States. Article IV of the Constitution does not state that Congress shall have the power to dispose of only that territory which has been incorporated, but any and all territory that belongs to the United States.

Likewise, the question of whether the United States has sovereignty over the Canal Zone is beside the point. It is an interesting academic question, but it has no bearing on the constitutional issue at hand, for the obvious reason that Congress territorial powers are in no way contingent upon, or determined by, the theoretical question of sovereignty, Congress power over territories extends to any and all territories which, in the language of article IV, belong to the United States. The Constitution speaks only in terms of ownership, and makes no mention of sovereignty.

This understanding of article IV is reaffirmed by the Foreign Relations Committee, which concludes in its report that—

> The Committee does not . . . believe that the issue of sovereignty—as a strictly legal matter—is relevant to the Canal debate." (p. 69).

IS THE POWER OF CONGRESS TO DISPOSE OF U.S. TERRITORY AND PROPERTY AN EXCLUSIVE POWER?

It is a well-established principle of our constitutional system that Congress has exclusive power over the disposition of territory and property belonging to the United States. By exclusive we mean that only Congress, that is the House of Representatives and the Senate, may exercise this power. There can be no cession of a U.S. territory, in other words, unless Congress has authorized it.

This view was expressed as early as 1833 by Justice Story of the Supreme Court, one of the most distinguished jurists in the history of our country, who stated in his authoritative Commentaries on the Constitution, that—

> The power of Congress over the public territory is clearly exclusive and universal. (Vol. II, section 1328).

In 1899, the Attorney General of the United States, John Griggs, reaffirmed this principle in a formal opinion. "The power to dispose permanently of the public lands and public property in Puerto Rico," he asserted, "rests in Congress, and in the absence of any statute conferring such power, cannot be exercised by the executive department for the Government." (22 Op. Atty. Gen. 544, 545.) Attorney General Harlan Fiske Stone, who later became Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, declared in 1924, that—

> Property once acquired by the government may not be sold, or title otherwise disposed of, except under the authority of Congress . . . This authority may be generally expressed or may be specifically granted to permit the disposition in whole or in part of particular property rights. But until that power is given by Congress expressly or impliedly, the Executive is without power to act. (34 Op. Atty. Gen. 322–323).

Likewise, the Supreme Court of the United States and the lower Federal courts have repeatedly and consistently affirmed the exclusivity of Congress power to dispose of U.S. territory. Reference to just a few of the decisions that have been handed down by the Supreme Court over the years will amply demonstrate this constitutional principle. Thus in Wisconsin Central RR Co. v. Price, 133 U.S. 496, 504 (1890), the court declared that article IV, section 3, clause 2 "implies an exclusion of all other authority over the [public] property which could interfere with this right [of Congress] or obstruct its exercise."

In the case of Sioux Tribe of Indians v. United States, 316 U.S. 317, 326 (1942). the Supreme Court flatly asserted that—

> Since the Constitution places the authority to dispose of public lands exclusively in Congress, the Executive's power to convey any interest in the lands must be traced to congressional delegation of its authority.

Referring to the territorial clause of article IV, Justice Hugo Black stated for the Court in United States v. California, 332 U.S. 19, 27 (1947), that—

> The constitutional power of Congress in this respect is without limitation. Thus neither the courts nor the executive agencies could proceed contrary to an act of Congress in this congressional area of national power.

See also Gibson v. Chouteau, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 92, 99 (1872), where the Supreme Court stated that this "power is subject to no limitations."

And, in Utah Power & Light Co. v. United States, 243 U.S. 389, 404 (1916), a unanimous Supreme Court attested that—

> The settled course of legislation, congressional and state, and repeated decisions of this court, have gone upon the theory that the power of Congress to dispose of United States territory is exclusive, and that only through its exercise—in other words, Congress' exercise—in some form can rights in lands belonging to the United States be acquired.

Mr. President, the legal and constitutional precedents to which I refer have been firmly rooted in our political system since the earliest days of the Republic. Significantly, no representative of the State Department or the Department of Justice has cited a single case, or read from the text of a single constitutional treatise, any statement by any member of the Supreme Court or any other court that even remotely suggests that Congress power to dispose of U.S. territory is not an exclusive power. The reason is quite simple: There is no basis in American law for the assumption that Congress power is anything less than exclusive in this regard.

As I shall proceed to demonstrate, the State Department and the Foreign Relations Committee now apparently concede this point. This concession, as I shall also show, is a fatal defect in the administration's case for the proposition that the President may lawfully dispose of the Canal Zone by treaty alone.

Let me first direct the attention of the Senate to the testimony of Mr. Herbert Hansell, legal adviser to the State Department. When Mr. Hansell appeared before the Separation of Powers Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee on August 29, 1977, he cited the treaty and territorial clauses of the Constitution, and argued that—

Nothing in the language of the two clauses limits the treaty power with respect to disposition of property or makes the power of Congress with respect to disposition of property exclusive.

But when Hansell testified before the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee on January 17, 1978, a number of months later, he offered an entirely different construction. On this occasion he argued that—

Nothing in the language of these clauses limits the treaty power with respect to disposition of property, or makes the legislative power the exclusive method to effect such disposition.

Thus in the first instance, Hansell insisted that Congress power to dispose of property was not exclusive, and, in the second, that the legislative power to dispose of property is not the exclusive method.

From this it must be inferred that the State Department has substantially—and quite cleverly, I might add—changed its position in order to comply with established precedents and the objections raised by witnesses appearing before the Separation of Powers Subcommittee on November 3, 1977, just a couple of months before the later statement of Mr. Hansell.

Mr. Hansell's statement before the House Committee in January is the most recent view expressed by the State Department on the question of Congress power to dispose of property, and nowhere in that statement does he deny the fact that this is an exclusive power. He merely asserts that there is nothing in the language of article IV to indicate that Congress disposal power is the exclusive method for disposing of property. This, of course, merely states the obvious, since it is clear that the Executive may also dispose of property, providing he has statutory authority. In any event, the point is that the State Department seems to have abandoned its original theory and no longer denies the exclusivity of Congress territorial powers.

The report of the Foreign Relations Committee reflects the revisions and corrections made by the State Department. On page 65 of the report, the committee quotes approvingly the 1899 opinion of Attorney General Griggs, and says that the committee "fully concurs" with the views expressed therein. It is curious to note, however, that the committee quotes only the second clause of the relevant passage in that opinion, and, by omitting the first half of the clause, creates the erroneous impression that the Attorney General did not address the issue of whether both Houses of Congress must approve a transfer of territory by the President.

A complete disclosure of the Attorney General's statement indicates that the committee report, like the testimony of the State Department, misrepresents the actual precedents. In that 1899 statement, the Attorney General said:

The Power to dispose permanently of the public lands and public property in Puerto Rico rests in Congress, and in the absence of any statute conferring such power, cannot be exercised by the executive department for the government.

I ask my colleagues to compare this statement with the language of the report, wherein it is simply observed that—

An 1899 opinion of the Attorney General concluded that the power to dispose of certain governmental lands "cannot be exercised by the executive department of the government."

The report goes on to say that the Foreign Relations Committee "fully concurs" with the Attorney General's 1899 statement, but insists that there is still the question of "whether the concurrence of the House of Representatives, in addition to that of the Senate, is constitutionally required. How, Mr. President, can the question then be "whether the concurrence of the House of Representatives, as well as the Senate, is constitutionally required, when the Attorney General has already said that it is required, in the very same sentence which the Foreign Relations Committee quotes, part of which was left out?

It is not necessary to dwell on these omissions and misrepresentations of the precedents at length. Suffice it to say that neither the State Department nor the Foreign Relations Committee disavows the constitutionally binding principle that the disposal power of Congress is exclusive.

Nor, it should be added, does the Department of Justice. "I am aware of a number of decisions of the Supreme Court," said Attorney General Griffin Bell, when he testified before the Foreign Relations Committee on September 29, 1977, "holding that article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution is of an exclusive nature." But this was not an issue of any consequence, Bell then suggested, because:

The decisions declaring article IV, section 3, clause 2 to be exclusive related to the authority of the Executive and Judicial branches to dispose of the territory or property of the United States. None of them dealt with the question here involved, the power of the treaty making authority to make such a disposition.

All of the parties are agreed, then, that the power of Congress to dispose of American territory and property is exclusive. Neither the State Department, the Justice Department, nor the Foreign Relations Committee flatly denies this. Rather, they suggest that the treaty power creates an exception to the general rule, and renders concurrent what is already exclusive.

As we shall see, this claim is utterly without foundation. The President may, of course, dispose of property by treaty. The exclusivity of Congress power to dispose of such property is maintained, however, only if Congress consents to the disposition. Otherwise it is fatuous to say that the power is exclusive. Exclusive means exclusive jurisdiction, possessed to the exclusion of all the other branches, not just some. By conferring exclusive jurisdiction on Congress respecting the disposal of property, the Constitution necessarily deprives the executive of such jurisdiction. In effect, the Foreign Relations Committee is not simply arguing that the treaty power as such creates an exception, but that the President's power to make self-executing treaties creates an exception to Congress exclusive power. The question to be resolved, then, is whether the President of the United States may negate an exclusive power of Congress respecting the disposition of property by a self-executing treaty. To this issue we now turn, and we may ask that question.

MAY THE PRESIDENT DISPOSE OF PUBLIC LANDS OVER WHICH CONGRESS HAS EXCLUSIVE POWER BY A SELF-EXECUTIVE TREATY?

The Constitution is silent regarding limitations on the President's treaty-making powers. Article II, section 2, clause 2 states only that—

The President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

The grant of power to the President is thus expressed in unlimited terms. The only express restriction on the exercise of this power in the language of the Constitution is the requirement that "two-thirds of the Senators present concur."

It would thus appear that the Constitution confers an unlimited power on the President to make any treaty he pleases, under any circumstances, and that such treaties automatically become the law of the land once the Senate agrees to ratification. Such an interpretation, however flies in the face of the Constitution, and is wholly inconsistent with the basic principles of limited government and separation of powers that rest at the foundation of our fundamental law. For this reason, it is universally acknowledged that there is an implied limitation on the President's treatymaking power, which emanates from the Constitution itself and restricts the scope and method of the treaty process.

As the Supreme Court stated in the well-known case of Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 16–17, decided in 1957:

> No agreement with a foreign nation can confer power on the Congress, or on any other branch of government, which is free from the restraints of the Constitution . . . the prohibitions of the Constitution were designed to apply to all branches of the national government, and they cannot be nullified by the Executive or by the Executive and the Senate combined.

The President and the Senate, in other words, cannot use the treaty power to override a prohibition of the Constitution. I would assume that this also means that the President and Senate cannot use the treaty power to invade a sphere of power that is exclusively reserved to the Congress, since the Constitution prohibits either the President or the Senate or the two in concert from exercising a power that is under the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress.

Judicial declarations similar to those expressed in Reid against Covert can be traced back to the formative period of our Republic, indicating that our Federal courts have always adhered to the principle that the treaty power is limited by the Constitution. Thus in Doe. v. Braden, 16 How. (57 U.S.) 635, 656 (1853), the Supreme Court asserted that—

> The treaty is . . . a law made by the proper authority, and the courts of justice have no right to annul or disregard any of its provisions, unless they violate the Constitution of the United States.

"It need hardly be said that a treaty cannot change the Constitution," said the Supreme Court in 1871, in the Cherokee Tobacco case, 11 Wall. (78 U.S.) 616, 620, "or be held valid if it be in violation of that instrument."

One of the best known statements on implied limitations on the treaty power is that of Mr. Justice Field, in Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U.S. 258, 267 (1890), where the Court declared:

> The treaty power, as expressed in the Constitution, is in terms unlimited except by those restraints which are found in that instrument against the action of the government or of its departments, and those arising from the nature of government itself and of that of the states. It would not be contended that it extends so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids, or a change in the character of the government, or in that of one of the States, or a cession of any portion of the territory of the latter, without its consent.

Although the Constitution does not expressly impose prohibitions or prescribe limits on the President's treatymaking powers, it is nevertheless well established, then, that treaties are subject to the same constitutional limitations that apply to all exercises of Federal power.

One of the most fundamental limitations is the requirement of implementing legislation. Early in our history, the Supreme Court distinguished between those treaties which are self-executing and those which are non-self-executing. The former take effect without implementing legislation; the latter require implementing legislation of the Congress before they become the law of the land. In other words, certain obligations which the United States accepts under a treaty cannot be executed by the treaty itself.

In the case of Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet. (27 U.S.) 253, 314, decided in 1829, Chief Justice John Marshall explained that it is the nature of the obligation undertaken by a treaty which determines whether implementing legislation is needed to make the treaty effective. "Our Constitution," said Marshall, "declares a treaty to be the law of the land. It is, consequently, to be regarded in courts of justice as equivalent to an act of the legislature, whenever it operates of itself, without the aid of any legislative provision."

But under what circumstances does a treaty not operate of itself, and require the aid of legislation? Here is Marshall's answer:

> When the terms of the stipulation import a contract—when either of the parties engages to perform a particular act, the treaty addresses itself to the political, not the judicial department; and the legislature must execute the contract, before it can become a rule for the Court. (Emphasis supplied.)

To put it another way, a treaty requiring the United States to perform a particular act would not become the law of the land unless Congress executed the contract—that is, enacted legislation implementing the treaty.

Based on their analysis of the judicial precedents, legal scholars have supplied another guideline for determining whether a treaty is self-executing. One authority is Quincy Wright, whose study entitled "The Control of American Foreign Relations," is quoted at length by the Library of Congress in "The Constitution of the United States of America: Analysis and Interpretation." This is the authoritative, encyclopedic study of our Constitution which all Members of Congress rely upon extensively and have in their offices. In his work, Wright observes that the question of whether a treaty provision can be executed without legislative action "depends upon whether the obligation is imposed on private individuals or on public authorities. (Page 207.)

He further explains:

> Treaty provisions which define the rights and obligations of private individuals and lay down general principles for the guidance of military, naval or administrative officials in relation thereto are usually considered self-executing. Thus treaty provisions assuring aliens equal civil rights with citizens, defining the limits of national jurisdiction, and prescribing rules of prize, war, and neutrality, have been so considered. . . .
> On the other hand certain treaty obligations are addressed solely to public authorities, of which may be mentioned those requiring the payment of money, the cession of territory, the guarantee of territory, etc. (Emphasis supplied.)

According to these authorities, then, a treaty addressed solely to public authorities, requiring a cession of territory, would be regarded as a nonself-executing treaty that would not be effective in the absence of congressional authorization.

Then we also have a third guideline, offered by the State Department itself. In a 1907 memorandum approved by the Secretary of State—and it is cited in our own authoritative analysis of the Constitution published by the Library of Congress—it is said that—

> The limitation on the treaty power which necessitates legislative implementation may be found in the provisions of the Constitution which expressly confide in Congress or other branches of the Federal Government the exercise of certain delegated powers. (Quoted at page 489.)

The same thought was expressed in Congress in 1815, at the conclusion of debate on a convention with Great Britain involving a reciprocal reduction of duties. President Madison recommended to Congress such legislation as the convention might require for effectuation, and legislation was thereafter enacted. House conferees observed that they thought, and that in their opinion the Senate conferees agreed, that legislative implementation was necessary to carry into effect all treaties which contained "stipulations requiring appropriations, or which might bind the nation to lay taxes, to raise armies, to support navies, to grant subsidies, to create States, or to cede territory" (29 Annals of Congress 1019 (1816), as quoted page 489). As early as 1816, therefore, Congress adopted the view that a treaty ceding territory is not self-executing and requires legislative implementation to be effective. The State Department memorandum of 1907, also regarded as authoritative by the Library of Congress, asserts that implementing legislation is necessary when a treaty employs a power expressly confided in Congress.

Thus we see, Mr. President, that at least three general principles of construction have evolved in our constitutional history for determining whether a treaty requires implementing legislation to be effective. If the terms of the treaty import a contract, and either party agrees to perform a particular act; if the obligation is imposed on public authorities; and if the agreement embraces a power expressly confided in Congress, then the treaty is not self-executing and cannot become effective as the law of the land until Congress enacts implementing legislation.

Judged by these established principles of law, Mr. President, it is clear that a treaty ceding our territory and public property in the Panama Canal Zone to the Government of Panama is not self-executing.

Does the Panama Canal Treaty contain provisions requiring either party to perform a particular act? To be sure, the treaty contains not one but numerous provisions whereby the United States agrees to perform a particular act, that involving the transfer of the zone being most significant.

Does the treaty impose obligations on public authorities? Again, the answer is in the affirmative, for this is a treaty which is addressed directly to public authorities.

Does the treaty concern a power expressly confided in Congress? Article IV, section 3, clause 2 supplies the answer. It stipulates that—

Congress shall have power to dispose of . . . the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

What is more, Congress power to dispose of territory is not only express but also exclusive.

Have prior agreements with Panama involving the transfer of property conformed to these principles? The Treaty of Mutual Understanding between the United States and Panama in 1955 bears directly on the issue. Article V of that treaty states in clear and precise language that the cession of certain property in the zone is dependent upon action by Congress. In fact, the phrase "subject to the enactment of authorizing legislation" appears three times in article V of the 1955 treaty with Panama. Article V states that:

The United States of America agrees that, subject to the enactment of legislation by the Congress, there shall be conveyed to the Republic of Panama free of cost all the right, title and interest held by the United States . . . to certain lands and improvements . . . The lands and improvements referred to in the preceding sentence and the determinations by the United States of America respecting the same, subject to the enactment of legislation by Congress, are designated and set forth in Item 2 of the Memorandum of Understanding . . . The United States also agrees that, subject to the enactment of legislation by the Congress, there shall be conveyed to the Republic of Panama free of cost all its right, title and interest to the land and improvements in the areas known as PAITILLA POINT . . .

In 1942, when the President made an Executive agreement promising to return certain property and installations to Panama, the transfer was based upon, and subject to, congressional approval (agreement of May 18, 1942, 59 Stat. 1289, Part 2: "When the authority of Congress—shall have been obtained"). During the course of Senate debate, Senator Tom Connally, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, asserted that—

Under the Constitution of the United States, Congress alone can vest title to property whch belongs to the United States. The Constitution itself confers on Congress specific authority to transfer territory or lands belonging to the United States . . . The House of Representatives has a right to a voice as to whether any transfer of real estate or other property shall be made either under treaty. (88 Con. Record 9267).

In its report on the transfer, the House Committee on Foreign Affairs reaffirmed the principle that a cession of public land belonging to the United States requires congressional approval. "As disposition of property of the United States," said the committee, requires "an exercise of the legislative power, independently of the treatymaking power."

Congressional approval was also sought and obtained in 1932, when the United States decided to erect a new legation building on land within the Canal Zone. Because it is improper to build a legation on territory under American jurisdiction, a bill was drafted by the State Department to authorize the Secretary of State to modify the boundary line between Panama and the Canal Zone so as to cede the land back to Panama and allow for the construction of the legation on "Panamanian territory" instead of American. This legislation was subsequently introduced and passed by Congress (72 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 4657).

Prior practice in Panama, it may thus be seen, reaffirms and strengthens the principle that a treaty ceding public lands to a foreign government is not self-executing. In all previous agreements with Panama, it would seem that all cessions of property belonging to the United States have been based on Congressional approval. It seems reasonable to me, I might add, that if all previous transfers of real estate to Panama have occurred under the authority of Congress, the transfer of the entire zone should proceed on the same basis; otherwise, we are left with the dubious proposition that prior enactments of Congress authorizing the property cessions were gratuitous exercises of legislative fantasy which the President was free to ignore; or we are left with the peculiar proposition that as the amount of property increases, the power of Congress decreases. I am not aware that any Congress or previous President has ever entertained either proposition as a valid interpretation of the Constitution.

The legal precedents and established practices all point to the conclusion that the treaty now under consideration cannot by any stretch of the imagination be regarded as self-executing. Against the tremendous weight of the precedents that I have cited, what evidence does the Foreign Relations Committee offer to show that this new treaty is self-executing and does not require implementing legislation to effect the transfer of the land and improvements in the Canal Zone to the Republic of Panama? What evidence does the Foreign Relations Committee offer to exempt this treaty disposing of property from the established rule of law?

The answer, Mr. President, is nothing. Nothing. The Foreign Relations Committee report completely ignores the precedents concerning the differences between self-executing treaties and non-self-executing treaties.

The committee's report makes no mention of the rules that have traditionally been followed by Congress, by our courts, and by past Presidents—rules that must be consulted in order to determine the character of this treaty. The report simply assumes, without discussion, without even acknowledging the existence of these precedents, that this is a self-executing treaty.

I ask my colleagues: How much trust should the Senate place in a committee report which seeks to expand the powers of the President beyond the limits to which they have been confined since this country was founded, and says not a word, not one word, about any of these binding precedents indicating that this treaty cannot possibly be construed as a self-executing treaty? If the Senate is to embark upon a bold new course, conferring more power on the Chief Executive, then the Members are entitled to know, I believe, the reasons for this sudden departure from the established norm. What are these reasons? Where are the precedents to support this radical transformation of the treaty process? I suggest, Mr. President, that the Senate can place no trust in a committee report which so conveniently ignores these precedents and misrepresents others.

On these grounds alone, for lack of any evidence that the transfer of property contemplated in these agreements can be effected by a self-executing treaty, the committee's argument against the need for implementing legislation should be rejected out of hand. For the basic question is whether this treaty is self-executing. If it is not, there is no point in belaboring the issue of whether legislative approval is necessary.

Such considerations have not, however, deterred the Foreign Relations Committee. Fearlessly disregarding the precedents used to define the nature of this treaty, the committee leaps to secondary matters and comes up with the conclusion that—

The Constitutional text, the intent of the Framers, opinions of the Supreme Court, and historical precedent all suggest that the Panama Canal treaty can validly transfer to Panama property belonging to the United States without a need for implementing legislation. (Page 69).

As we shall see, this conclusion is doubly wrong. In the first place, it is based upon a fatally defective and wholly false assumption that this treaty is self-executing. In the second place, it is based on precedents which, when examined, fail to support the committees' position.

(Mr. CANNON assumed the chair.)

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, let us talk about the constitutional text.

CONSTITUTIONAL TEXT

We first encounter in the committee's argument that the constitutional text and the location of the disposal-of-property—or territorial—clause of the Constitution support the conclusion of the committee. But every sentence of the opening paragraph of the report, it would seem, is either false, misleading, or irrelevant. Let me enumerate.

The first sentence states that—the constitutional text gives no reason to assume that the power to dispose of property may be exercised only by statute, and not by treaty (P. 65.)

This assertion is obviously irrelevant, inasmuch as it is freely admitted that the President has the power to dispose of property by treaty. The question is not an "either-or" proposition, but whether he may dispose of it by a self-executing treaty.

The second and third sentences state that—

The disposal-of-property clause is drafted in the same way as the provision conferring enumerated powers upon Congress (article I, section 8): both say that Congress "shall have power . . ." where two substantively similar provisions of the Constitution are in their jurisdictional terms worded identically, and where one of those provisions has been construed as conferring concurrent power, it is not unreasonable to construe the other provision also as conferring concurrent power. (P. 65.)

This statement is false and misleading. According to the committee's reasoning, the President is free to exercise any power of Congress through a self-executing treaty where it is declared in the Constitution that "Congress shall have power," and "where two substantively similar provisions of the Constitution are in their jurisdictional terms worded identically." Article I of the Constitution states that Congress shall have power to perform a number of functions—to lay and collect taxes, to borrow money, to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, to declare war, and to provide and maintain a Navy, to mention only a few. Article III states that "Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason," and we may presume that the President may also by treaty circumvent the House of Representatives regarding this power of Congress as well. All of the "Congress shall have power" powers, suggests the committee, may be eclipsed by the President of the United States through a self-executing treaty. Carried to its logical conclusion, this theory offered by the committee would whittle down the powers of Congress to the point of extinction; for it elevates the power of the President to make self-executing treaties to a higher station than the legislative power itself, which is contrary to the Constitution.

Moreover, by its own admission in the following paragraph, page 66, the Foreign Relations Committee concedes that this theory admits to numerous exceptions. Thus, a treaty cannot appropriate money, says the committee, impose taxes, or declare war. Why can a treaty not appropriate funds? Because, opines the committee:

> The language of the appropriations clause . . . unlike that of the disposal-of-property clause, does appear to be exclusive. (Page 66.)

Since the Supreme Court has repeatedly asserted that Congress power to dispose of public lands is also an exclusive power, irrespective of the specific language of the clause, the theory presented by the committee collapses under the weight of judicial precedent. What appears to be true to the committee is false under the established law. To be sure, the committee concedes the whole argument by inferring that the President cannot exercise an exclusive power of Congress under a self-executing treaty.

With respect to the matter of Congress power to declare war, the committee arbitrarily abandons the argument based on language, and asserts that this is an exclusive power "because the unique legislative history of the declaration-of-war clause clearly indicates that the power was intended to reside jointly in the House of Representatives and the Senate." Thus we now learn that the language by which the powers of Congress are expressed in the Constitution are not determinative after all regarding the question of exclusiveness, and that other factors such as "legislative history" must be considered. But if the legislative history must be taken into account, surely the decisions of the Supreme Court and constitutional history must also be given weight. The committee cannot have it both ways, invoking legislative history only when it is convenient to do so. In any case, the legislative history of the territorial clause of the Constitution, as we have already observed, clearly indicates that Congress has traditionally rejected the view that the President may dispose of public lands by a self-executing treaty.

These matters aside, it should be borne in mind that the committee cites no decisions of the Supreme Court to support its curious interpretation of the Constitution, the reason being there is no basis for it in American law.

Returning to the committee's report, we next greet the assertion that—

> It has long been established that Article 1, section 8 of the Constitution confers concurrent power—that the enumerated powers conferred upon the Congress therein may be exercised by both statute and treaty.

Once again, the committee misses the point. The question is whether he may exercise all of these powers by a self-executing treaty.

How many self-executing treaties has the President made, bypassing the House of Representatives, regarding such article 1, section 8 powers as the power of Congress to establish an uniform rule of naturalization? To provide and maintain a Navy? To coin money? To raise such questions is to reveal the absurdity of the committee's theory.

One of the so-called "long established" examples specifically mentioned by the committee are the "hundreds of self-executing treaties dealing with—postal services" (page 66). But what is the basis for this claim? Volume I of the U.S. Government publication entitled "Treaties and Other International Acts of the United States," edited by Hunter Miller, states that—

> Arrangements with foreign post offices were authorized by statute as early as 1792 (1 Statutes-at-Large 239) and are made under statutory authority now (act of June 8, 1872, 17 Statutes-at-Large 304).

Indeed, observes Miller:

> Postal conventions are not, and, with a very few exceptions, never have been submitted to the Senate as treaties. The character of postal conventions makes them inappropriate for inclusion in a general collection of treaties and international acts. To a large extent they are business arrangements between offices of transport rather than agreements between governments in the ordinary sense. (Page 7.)

So much, then, for the "hundreds" of self-executing postal service "treaties" relied upon by the committee. In any event, we are not dealing with the postal or any other article I power of Congress in the first place, but with the power of Congress to dispose of public lands under article IV of the Constitution.

This brings us finally to the issue that the committee has raised in connection with the location of Congress territorial powers. "It seems relevant," concludes the committee, "that the disposal-of-property clause appears in article IV of the Constitution, the article dealing with Federal-State and interstate relations. While by no means conclusive, this placement does suggest an intent to set out a power of the Federal Government as against the power of the States, rather than a power of the Congress as against the joint power of the Senate and the President." (Page 66.)

What significance should we attach to the location of Congress power to dispose of U.S. territory, in light of the fact the Supreme Court has never deemed its location as bearing on the issue of exclusiveness, and has, in fact, consistently ruled that this is an exclusive power of Congress? The answer, of course, is none. The Supreme Court has never even suggested that the power is exclusive in relation to the States and is not exclusive in relation to the President. It is simply exclusive, and the Court has never qualified that position.

What is clear is that the location of the territorial power is unrelated to the scope of the power itself. The powers of Congress are not confined to article I, but are scattered throughout the Constitution. Article II, which deals principally with the Executive power, also confers numerous powers on Congress—to determine the time of choosing the electors to the electoral college, to provide by law of the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability of the President. Article II also gives one branch of the legislature, the Senate, the power to advise and consent on treaties and the appointment of Ambassadors, judges, and other officers of the United States. Article III, which deals principally with the powers of the Judiciary, also specifies that Congress shall establish inferior courts, regulate the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, direct the place where criminal trials shall be held when the crime has not been committed within any State, and declare the punishment for treason. In addition to the enumerated powers of Congress under article IV, the Constitution also provides under article V that Congress shall have the power to propose amendments or call a constitutional convention.

None of these powers is located in article I, where we find most of the delegated powers of Congress. May we therefore assume that the President is free to make self-executing treaties and bypass the House of Representatives in the exercise of these powers? May the President make a self-executing treaty with a foreign power providing for his successor in the case of his removal from office? Exactly where in the Constitution are the exclusive powers of Congress located? Where do we look to find those that are allegedly "concurrent"? What the committee seems to overlook, Mr. President, is the plain and simple fact that the purpose of distributing the legislative powers throughout the Constitution is not to block out those which are exclusive and those "concurrent," but primarily to provide for a system of checks and balances under the separation of powers.

In sum, neither the text of the Constitution nor the location of the legislative power to dispose of property supports the committee's newfangled theory that the Chief Executive may transfer the Canal Zone by a self-executing treaty. Indeed, the committee has not even been able to cite a single decision of any Federal court which would lend respectability to the notion that the text of the Constitution and the location of the disposal-of-property clause authorize the President and the Senate to override this express power of Congress. For these reasons, the committee's theory must be rejected as hopelessly absurd.

WHAT WAS THE INTENT OF THE FRAMERS?

The second pillar of the Foreign Relations Committee report on Congress territorial powers concerns the original intent of the framers of our Constitution. This pillar, like the first, collapses under the weight of close scrutiny; and once again we are dismayed to learn that every sentence of the report on this aspect of the issue is either false, misleading or irrelevant.

The opening sentence of the report reads as follows:

From all available records it appears that the Framers evidenced no intent to preclude the United States from disposing of governmental property by treaty.

This statement is, of course, irrelevant, as we have seen twice before in this report, since the question is not whether the United States may dispose of public lands by treaty, but whether the President may do so by a self-executing treaty.

In the second sentence, the committee asserts that the Framers "rejected all proposals to limit the treaty power." This statement is false on its face, for the obvious reason that it creates the erroneous impression that the President's power to make treaties is by design absolute and unlimited. In addition, the treaty power is obviously limited by the requirement that the Senate must give its advice and consent to the ratification of a treaty, any treaty. Thus, although the treaty power itself is not limited by express terms, there is nevertheless an implied limitation on the exercise of the power stemming from the check of the Senate as well as the principle of limited government that is inherent in our Constitution.

The third sentence of the report states that,

A review of the discussion of the disposal-of-property clause indicates that the Framers' concern was that the Federal government have primacy over the states in resolving disputes among the states over certain Western lands—suggesting, again, an intent to delineate Federal power versus that of the States.

This statement is misleading and false because it erroneously suggests that the Framers were not also concerned that Congress have a voice in the disposal of American territory and property by treaty.

Significantly, the committee report makes no mention of the argument based on the Framers' intent that was propounded by the Attorney General when he testified before the Foreign Relations Committee. In his prepared statement to the committee on September 29, 1977, Attorney General Bell made reference to four separate events that occurred during the course of debate on the framing and adoption of the Constitution. He thought it significant, for example, that George Mason of Virginia had observed "that the Senate by means of a treaty might alienate territory, etc. without legislative sanction." Mason's actual words, as reported in Farrand, were that:

He was extremely earnest to take this [appropriation] power from the Senate, who he said could already sell the whole Country by means of Treaties. (Farrand, II, 297).

From this, Bell deduced that Mason's remark indicated that the Framers were supportive of the idea that the President should have the power to dispose of property by a self-executing treaty.

In his testimony before the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries on January 18 of this year, Raoul Berger correctly observed that Attorney General Bell's reliance on Mason's remark was based on an erroneous understanding of time sequence. Mason made his remark on August 15, 1787. The property clause was not even debated for 15 days, until August 30, 1787. As Berger notes,

Mason spoke before the Article IV progenitor was even proposed and referred to the Committee on Detail, (2 Farrand 321, 324), and of course before the resultant 'disposition' provision was debated, (id. 466). Manifestly his earlier remark hardly expressed the view that the treaty power overrode the as yet unborn "power to dispose."

Bell also relied on remarks made at the Convention by delegates Gerry, Williamson, and Spaight, an amendment proposed by the Virginia ratifying convention, and on a letter written by Williamson to James Madison a year after the framers had completed their work, as further proof that the history of the Convention supports "the proposition that a treaty disposing of the territory and property belonging to the United States can be self-executing." But it is not necessary to analyze these statements and events here. In the first place, Raoul Berger has already shown that they do not provide evidence to support the Attorney General's assertion. In the second place, the Foreign Relations Committee makes no reference to them—and wisely so, I might add. Unlike the Attorney General, the Foreign Relations Committee has enjoyed the benefit of Berger's careful dissection of the debates and prudently avoids challenging them.

This brings us back, then, to the position which the Foreign Relations Committee has now retreated—to the argument of the third sentence where it is claimed simply that:

A review of the discussion of the disposal-of-property clause indicates that the Framers' concern was that the Federal Government have primacy over the States in resolving disputes among the States over certain Western lands—suggesting again, an intent to delineate Federal power versus that of the States.

Since the Foreign Relations Committee offers no evidence even for this revised and emasculated version of the administration's original argument based on intent, I leave it to the Senators themselves to judge the merits of this unsupported claim. In my judgment, the Records of the Convention fail to show that the framers were anxious to allow the cession of American territory by the President, acting alone or with the concurrence of the Senate, without the approval of Congress. The Foreign Relations Committee fails to offer any evidence indicating that the Framers thought otherwise.

Finally, in the fourth and last sentence of the report, the committee concludes that:

A number of statements, indicating that territory and other property could be transferred by treaty, were made by the Framers during the debate on the treaty power after article IV was adopted.

Aside from the fact this statement is unsupported, it is wholly irrelevant since the question, once again, is not whether the President has the power to dispose of public lands by treaty, but whether he may do so by a self-executing treaty.

In sum, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee Report fails to show that the framers of the Constitution favored the idea that the President should have the power to dispose of territory and property by a self-executing treaty. The committee offers no evidence to support this assertion and it fails to challenge any of the evidence to the contrary that has been offered. What is more, the committee report twice misrepresents the constitutional issue that is under consideration in the brief paragraph on this subject of the framers' intent. For these reasons, the Senate should reject the committee's argument that constitutional history lends any strength to the President's position.

JUDICIAL AUTHORITIES

We come now to the third pillar of the committee's report suggesting, in the words of the committee, that—

The Supreme Court appears to have favored a construction of the Constitution which would permit the disposal of property by a self-executing treaty. (p. 66).

The cases as we shall see, fail to lend any credibility to this interpretation of the judicial precedents.

The committee cites seven Supreme Court decisions evidencing the right of the President to transfer territory without the consent of Congress. Let us examine them in detail.

Says the committee:

It is well settled as the Attorney General noted during the Committee's hearings, that the treaty power "extends to all proper subjects of negotiation between our government and the government of other nations," although it does not "extend so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids." (p. 66–67).

It therefore follows, avers the committee, that:

The transfer of property from one nation to another clearly constitutes a proper subject of negotiation; the question is whether the Constitution forbids such transfer by treaty.

The cases cited are Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U.S. 258, 266–267 (1890) and Asakura v. Seattle, 265 U.S. 332, 341 (1924).

In other words the committee fully agrees, contrary to its earlier statement that the framers "rejected all proposals to limit the treaty power" (p. 66), that the scope of the treaty power is indeed limited by the Constitution. The committee also agrees with the undisputed fact that the President has the authority to make treaties with foreign nations ceding public lands.

But once again the committee misstates the constitutional issue that we are considering. The question is not "whether the Constitution forbids such transfer by treaty," but whether it forbids such transfer by a self-executing treaty that circumvents the Congress.

So much, then, for the first paragraph of the committee's report on the judicial precedents. All that the committee has demonstrated is that it apparently does not understand the constitutional issue before us, and is able to belabor obvious points of law that prove what everybody knows in the first place. In short, the first paragraph is false, misleading, and irrelevant.

In the second paragraph, the committee report opens with another irrelevant statement, and asserts that "A number of cases suggest" that the Constitution "does not" forbid the transfer of property by treaty. Significantly, the committee scrupulously avoids all mention of those cases which indicate that the Constitution forbids cessions of territory by a self-executing treaty.

Conspicuously missing from the report, for example, is the frequently mentioned case of Sioux Tribe of Indians v. United States, 316 U.S. 317, 326 (1942), where the Supreme Court flatly stated that—

> Since the Constitution places the authority to dispose of public lands exclusively in Congress, the executive's power to convey any interest in the lands must be traced to Congressional delegation of its authority.

Undaunted by such cases as Sioux Tribe, which clearly demonstrate the very opposite point of law favored by the committee, the report plods forward, noting that—

> The Court had no problem with several treaties transferring United States property to various Indian tribes.

Citing the case of U.S. v. 43 Gallons of Whiskey, 93 U.S. 188 (1876), the committee observes that prior to the year 1871, when Congress passed the Indian Appropriation Act, "Indian tribes were recognized as independent nations with whom the United States could contract by treaty"; and, it is further noted, "the Court has held that 'the power to make treaties with the Indian tribes is * * * co-extensive with that to make treaties with foreign nations.' "

One wonders whether the committee has even read the case of U.S. v. 43 Gallons of Whiskey. In the first place, the statement quoted in the report does not appear on page 188 of the decision, but on page 197. In the second place, the case actually involves an 1863 treaty between the United States and the Chippewa Indians whereby the Indians—not the United States—ceded territory to the United States.

As the court correctly observes in that case—

> The acquisition [not the cession] of territory has been the moving cause of all Indian treaties . . . and will continue to be so until Indian reservations are confined to very narrow interests. (93 US 188, 196–197).

Added to this is the fact that the treaty in question, which actually involved a cession of territory by the Indians to the United States in Minnesota, and is thus a treaty for acquiring territory rather than a territorial cession, incorporated an act of Congress concerning the introduction and sale of liquor in Indian territory. The act was passed by Congress on June 30, 1834, (amended March 15, 1864), and applied to all Indian territory. As the Court noted—

> The act defines what shall be deemed Indian country, directs the manner in which trade and intercourse with the Indians shall be carried on, and forbids anyone, under certain penalties, to give or sell liquor to an Indian in charge of an agent, or to introduce it into the Indian country. (93 U.S. 194).

Obviously, treaties with Indian tribes differ from treaties with foreign nations in a number of respects. As seen in the 43 Gallons of Whiskey case, for example, Congress continued to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes and within Indian territory after the treaty went into effect. The peculiar status of Indian tribes was defined by Chief Justice Marshall in 1831 in the case of Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 5 Peters 17, as that of "domestic dependent nations." The recognized authority, Samuel Crandall, notes in his study on "Treaties, Their Making and Enforcement," that:

> From the first, our negotiations with Indian tribes have been quite separate from those with foreign states. (p. 93).

There is some doubt, therefore, whether treaties with Indian tribes are even applicable to the constitutional issue at hand, which involves a treaty with a foreign government. The Indian Appropriations Act of 1871, cited by the committee, fully shows, in fact, that the power of the President to negotiate treaties with the Indian tribes was based on the consent of Congress; for in that act , Congress declared that after March 3, 1871:

> No Indian nation or tribe within the territory of the United States should be acknowledged or recognized as an independent nation, tribe or power with whom the United States might contract by treaty. (Crandall, p. 94).

In effect, Congress nullified the power of the President to make treaties with Indian tribes. It would seem to follow, therefore, if Congress has the power to prohibit the President from making treaties with Indian tribes, that the President never enjoyed the power of making a self-executing treaty with Indian tribes in the first place, as such power would be inconsistent with the act of 1871.

In any event, these considerations need not detain us here, for the crucial point, as I earlier noted in the 43 Gallons case, is that "the acquisition of territory has been the moving cause of all Indian treaties" (93 US 188, 196–197). The underlying purpose of these treaties was the acquisition and purchase of Indian lands, so they could be resold to white settlers and converted to individual titles. The State Department, the Attorney-General, and now the Foreign Relations Committee, all rely heavily on these Indian treaties to support the theory that the President may dispose of property by a self-executing treaty. But if these Indian treaties involve the acquisition of territory rather than the cession of public lands, I fail to see how they even apply to the question we are considering.

In Holden v. Joy, 17 Wall. (84 U.S.) 211 (1872), for example, the Court heard a challenge to a treaty with the Cherokee nation which transferred to it land belonging to the United States. The Court said:

> . . . it is insisted that the President and the Senate, in concluding such a treaty, could not lawfully covenant that a patent should be issued to convey lands which belonged to the United States without the consent of Congress, which cannot be admitted. On the contrary, there are many authorities where it is held that a treaty may convey to a grantee a good title to such lands without an act of Congress conferring it, and that Congress has no constitutional power to settle or interfere with rights under treaties, except in cases purely political. Id. at 247.

Moving along to the next sentence of the report, we learn, according to the committee, that in the case of Holden v. Joy, 17 Wallace (84 U.S.) 211 (1872),

> The Court heard a challenge to a treaty with the Cherokee nation which transferred to it land belonging to the United States.

The committee then cites the following passage from that decision:

> It is insisted that the President and the Senate, in concluding such a treaty, could not lawfully covenant that a patent should be issued to convey lands which belonged to the United States without the consent of Congress, which cannot be admitted. On the contrary, there are many authorities where it is held that a treaty may convey to a grantee a good title to such lands without an act of Congress conferring it, and that Congress has no constitutional power to settle or interfere with rights under treaties, except in cases purely political."

Do these remarks support the proposition that the President may make a self-executing treaty ceding territory and property to a foreign government? First, it is agreed by all parties who testified before Congress, including the Attorney General of the United States, that the passage in question is mere dictum—that is, an opinion of a judge which does not embody the determination of the court, and was made without argument or full consideration of the point (Bouvier's Law Dictionary, I. 863). As the Supreme Court stated in Carroll v. Carroll, 16 Howard 287 (1853), the Court "has never held itself bound by any part of an opinion which was not needful to the ascertainment of the question between the parties."

Second, the case of Holden against Joy actually conflicts with the theory offered by the Foreign Relations Committee. The facts of the case are as follows: Prior to the year 1817, the Cherokee Indians resided east of the Mississippi, largely in Georgia. By treaties of 1817 and 1819, the tribe was divided into two bodies, one of which remained in Georgia, the other on the Arkansas and White Rivers. Anxious to move the entire tribe west of the Mississippi, the United States made treaties with the western Cherokees in 1828 and 1833, by which the United States agreed to "possess" them, as well as the eastern Cherokees, of 7 million acres of land west of the Arkansas River. In 1830, in the period between the two treaties, Congress passed a law entitled "An act to provide for an exchange of lands with the Indians residing in any of the States or territories, and for their removal west of the Mississippi River."

The first and second sections of the act authorized the President to exchange certain lands west of the Mississippi with any tribe residing in Georgia, or any other State or territory. The third section of the act stated that:

Such lands shall revert to the United States if the Indians become extinct or abandon them.

The purpose of the treaties and the act of Congress, obviously, was not to cede territory but to bring about an exchange by inducing the Indians, as the Court put it:

To surrender their lands and possessions to the United States, and emigrate and settle in the territory provided for them. (17 Wallace 237).

But the treaties, though formally accepted, were not successful, and in 1835, while the act of 1830 was still in force, the United States entered into a third treaty with the Cherokees, for the purpose, once again, of reuniting the eastern and western tribes.

The third treaty confirmed the two earlier agreements. The treaty stipulated that, in exchange for $5 million, the Cherokees would cede all of their lands east of the Mississippi to the United States. But the Cherokees were dissatisfied with the terms of the two earlier treaties, because they did not contain a sufficient quantity of land, so the new treaty of 1835 provided that the sum of $5 million would be reduced by $500,000 in exchange for 800,000 acres of more land known as the Cherokee neutral lands. Congress subsequently appropriated these funds.

In 1866, the United States and the Cherokee Nation entered into a fourth treaty. Under article 17 of that treaty, the Cherokees ceded back to the United States the neutral lands, which the Cherokees had purchased under the treaty of 1835, for an agreed sum of money. A supplemental treaty, modifying conflicting contracts made by the Secretary of Interior and the American Emigrant Company for the sale of the neutral lands, was concluded in 1868. Acts of Congress were subsequently passed recognizing the treaty ceding back the lands to the United States, and the supplemental treaty as valid, and making appropriations to carry these agreements into effect. The Supreme Court was subsequently called upon to resolve conflicts in land titles resulting from these treaties and statutes.

From this brief review of the facts in the case of Holden against Joy, it is abundantly clear that these treaties did not involve a cession of U.S. territory, but an exchange and purchase of Indian lands. It is equally certain that all of these exchanges and agreements were based on the consent of Congress, and that none of the treaties were self-executing. Moreover, Holden against Joy involves treaties with Indian tribes and is inapplicable to the constitutional question of treaties ceding public lands to a foreign state. Accordingly, Holden against Joy is not a precedent supporting the position of the Foreign Relations Commitee, but a precedent which is directly contrary to the committee's position.

In the third paragraph of the report, the Foreign Relations Committee turns to the case of Jones v. Meehan, 175 U.S. 1 (1899) for help. In that case, observes the Committee, the court said that:

"[t]he title to the strip of land in controversy" had been "granted by the United States to the elder Chief Moose Dung by the treaty itself."

Continuing, the committee also deems relevant the court's statement that—

It is well-settled that a good title to parts of the lands of an Indian tribe my be granted to individuals by a treaty between the United States and the tribe, without any act of Congress, or any patent from the executive authority of the United States.

It is certainly appropriate that the Foreign Relations Committee relies upon a case in which Chief Moose Dung is a central figure, and I would even agree that Chief Moose Dung is probably a lingering omnipresence in the full Report. But it is no less true that the case of Jones against Meehan is quite irrelevant. In fact, this case does not even involve a cession of public lands to a foreign government, but an acquisition of Indian lands resulting from a treaty between the United States and the Chippewa Indians in 1863.

Under the terms of the treaty, the Chippewas ceded a large tract of land in Minnesota to the United States for an agreed sum of money. Part of the land ceded was reserved for use by chiefs of the tribe, including Chief Moose Dung. Article 9 of the treaty stipulated that:

There shall be set apart from the tract hereby ceded [by the Chippewas] a reservation of 640 acres near the mouth of the Thief River for the chief Moose Dung.

The chief's eldest son claimed title to all 640 acres, and the court was called upon to determine whether the chief's property descended to all of his children or to his eldest son only.

(Mr. NUNN assumed the chair.)

Mr. HATCH. The court's ruling in the case was based essentially on an opinion of Attorney General Roger Taney regarding a similar treaty in 1832 between the United States and the Pottawatomie Indians. Taney had explained:

These reservations are excepted out of the grant made by the tribe (to the United States) and did not therefore pass with it; consequently, the title remains as it was before the treaty, that is to say lands reserved are still under the original Indian title. (Jones v. Meehan, 175 U.S. 1, 12 (1899)).

In other words, the land in question, meaning the 640 acres set aside for the chief, was never ceded by the Chippewas.

Thus it can be seen that the portion of the opinion quoted out of context by the Foreign Relations Committee, refers not to a treaty involving a cession of American territory, but to a treaty whereby the property interests of an individual were protected under an acquisition and purchase of Indian lands by the United States. The task of assuring the chief that he would have good title to those 640 acres that were never ceded to the United States in the first place would obviously require no act of Congress because these 640 acres were neither acquired by the United States nor ceded to the United States. They simply remained in the hands of the chief under the original Indian title to the lands.

Citing a number of earlier cases on this point, the court concluded that:

The clear result of this series of decisions is that when the United States, in a treaty with an Indian tribe, and as part of the consideration for the cession by the tribe of a tract of country to the United States, makes a reservation to a chief or other member of the tribe of a specified number of sections of land, whether already identified, or to be surveyed and located in the future, the treaty itself converts the reserved sections into individual property. 175 U.S. 21.

Moreover, the purchase of the Chippewa lands under this treaty was carried out in accordance with statutes of Congress governing the acquisition of Indian lands. The passage from the opinion quoted by the Foreign Relations Committee follows immediately after the court's reference to one of those statutes.

This brings us to the next paragraph of the Foreign Relations Committee report, which not surprisingly, is both misleading and irrelevant. Here is what the report states:

It may be worth pointing out that in a number of cases, occasionally cited for the purpose of showing that the disposal power is unlimited, the Court discussed the scope of the disposal power in the context of federal power versus states rights; no treaties were involved. (p. 67).

In response to this acute observation by the committee, it may also be worth pointing out that none of the so-called judicial precedents cited by the committee even involves the disposal of public lands or property, let alone such a disposal under a treaty. Geofroy against Riggs presented the question whether a citizen of France could take land in the District of Columbia from a citizen of the United States, in contravention of a local law but in accordance with a treaty for reciprocal rights of inheritance. Asakura against Seattle deals with a city ordinance restricting licenses to U.S. citizens in the operation of pawnshops. U.S. against 43 Gallons of Whiskey and Jones against Meehan, aside from the fact they concern Indian treaties rather than treaties with foreign states, both deal with the acquisition and purchase of Indian lands and not with a cession of American territory and property.

The remaining precedent cited by the committee, Holden against Joy, did not involve a cession of public lands to a foreign government, but, as we have already seen, an exchange and purchase of Indian lands with the consent of Congress. The entire structure of the Foreign Relations Committee's argument from the standpoint of judicial precedent therefore hangs on the lonely dictum of Holden against Joy, a dictum which has no legal force and, when read in the context of the decision, is contrary to the court's holding. In this regard, it may even be doubted whether the statement rises to the dignity of a dictum.

In the last paragraph of the report on the judicial precedents, we come to the committee's final conclusion: "While additional cases are cited on each side of the question," says the report:

> The Committee sees little merit in attempting to weigh dicta against dicta. The short of it is that the Court has never struck down a treaty for disposing of governmental property. (p. 67).

Thus in the final analysis the committee admits that its entire case concerning judicial precedents rests on dicta. More precisely, it rests on a single dictum, and even that is questionable. What we are actually weighing, therefore, is not dicta against dicta, but a spurious dictum against 200 years of legislative and judicial history which demonstrates, time and time again, that the President does not have the power to dispose of American territory and property by a self-executing treaty.

The reply to the committee's smug assertion that its reading of these precedents is sound because "the court has never struck down a treaty for disposing of governmental property" is fairly obvious: the court has never had occasion to do so because the President has never made a self-executing treaty ceding American territory and property to a foreign state. The committee might just as well argue that the President can make any treaty that he pleases because the Supreme Court has never declared a treaty unconstitutional. The audacity of the committee, it would seem, is exceeded only by its lack of understanding. The entire section of the committee's report on judicial precedents, like the previous sections on the constitutional text and the Framers intent, is clearly based on false, misleading, and irrelevant assertions that throw considerable doubt on the committee's bizarre interpretation of the Constitution.

The fourth and final pillar of the Foreign Relations Committee report concerns the issue of prior treaty practices. The committee contends that there are a number of earlier treaties with Indian tribes and foreign nations which "are couched in self-executing terms and transfer territory or property belonging to the United States to other nations or (in the case of Indian treaties) to specific individuals without prior congressional act authorizing such transfer." (p. 68). This statement by the committee is, however, patently false. As a Congressional Research Service study shows, not one of the 11 treaties generously supplied by the State Department and cited authoritatively by the committee clearly stands as a precedent for a self-executing treaty disposing of property.

1. An example of a treaty with an Indian tribe providing for the transfer to the tribe of title to lands belonging to the United States without prior Congressional authorization is the treaty with the Cherokee Nation of December 29, 1835.

2. An example of a treaty with an Indian tribe conveying land to an Indian individual without act of Congress is the treaty with the Chippewa Indians of October 2, 1863.

INDIAN TREATIES

The first two treaties are treaties with Indian tribes which have already been discussed in connection with Holden against Joy and Jones against Meehan. It is not necessary, therefore, to consider them in detail again, or elaborate upon the many unique features of Indian treaties which distinguish them from treaties with foreign states.

The first of these is the Cherokee Treaty of December 29, 1835. It is, as we have seen, a treaty for the purchase and exchange of land rather than disposal. What is more, it was not a self-executing treaty. Article III of the treaty provided that lands were exchanged "according to the provisions of the act of May 28, 1830." That act authorized the President to exchange public lands west of the Mississippi for certain Indian lands lying to the east.

In Holden against Joy, 37 years after the treaty was signed, the Supreme Court ruled that the treaty could not have been negotiated under the act of 1830. "Doubtless the intent and purpose were the same," said the court, "but the treaty, though concluded to promote the same object as the act of Congress, adopts very different instrumentalities," 17 Wallace 211, 240 (1872). The court's ruling, notes the Congressional Research Service, "does not detract from the clear reliance placed by Andrew Jackson on the act for authority to conclude this particular treaty. The executive branch inserted reference to the act of 1830 in the treaty. Since President Jackson attempted to effect the treaty pursuant to congressional authorization, it does not appear that the ruling of Holden against Joy demonstrates any executive practice disposing of territory or property without act of Congress. Holden against Joy shows that Presidential reliance on legislative authorization was later ruled unfounded."

The second Indian treaty cited by the committee is the Chippewa Treaty of 1863, which we discussed earlier in connection with the case of Jones against Meehan and 640 acres of land belonging to an Indian Chief named Moose Dung. As previously noted, this was not a treaty involving a cession of American territory, but a treaty whereby the property interests of an individual were protected under an acquisition and purchase of Indian lands by the United States. In addition, the treaty was made in accordance with statutes of Congress governing the acquisition of Indian lands. In its analysis of this treaty, the American Law Division of the Congressional Research Service concludes that the reservation in the treaty of 640 acres for Chief Moose Dung, giving him title to part of the Indian lands, "was at most a clearing of title and . . . no disposition of territory or property was effected."

In sum, neither one of the Indian treaties relied upon by the Foreign Relations Committee involved a cession of American territory. Both involved purchases of Indian lands that were approved by Congress.

TREATIES WITH FOREIGN NATIONS

I. THE SPANISH TREATY OF 1819

The first treaty with a foreign nation cited by the committee is the Spanish Treaty of 1819. But it is clear from an examination of the transaction that it fails to support the theory that the President may dispose of public lands by a self-executing treaty.

In the first place, the treaty with Spain was made with the consent of Congress. On March 3, 1819, Congress enacted legislation to execute the treaty (3 statutes-at-large 523). Similar legislation was later reenacted in 1821 (3 statutes-at-large 637).

In the second place, the Spanish treaty did not even involve a cession of American territory but at best the settlement of a boundary dispute.

In boundary dispute treaties, there is always the question whether the territory involved in the adjustment is actually American territory. According to leading scholars, the settlement of a disputed boundary is not a cession of territory. Samuel Crandall states that:

> A treaty for the determination of a disputed line operates not as a treaty of cession, but of recognition. (Treaties, Their Making and Enforcement, p. 48.)

Another noted authority, W. Willoughby, explains that treaties settling boundary disputes "can scarcely be considered as instances of the alienation of portions of its own territory, for the fact that the treaties were assented to by the United States is in itself evidence that it was conceded that the claim that the areas in question belonged to the United States was unfounded." (The Constitutional Law of the United States, I, pp. 507–508).

In a letter to the Governor of Massachusetts in 1838, Mr. Justice Story of the Supreme Court observed, in connection with the northeastern boundary dispute between the British and the United States, that:

> In a case of contested boundary, there is no pretense to say that an ascertainment of the true boundary involves the question of cession. (Story, Life and Letters, II, 289).

Thus, the Spanish Treaty of 1819 can hardly be cited as a precedent for the exercise of executive power that is now claimed under this Panama Canal Treaty. It was made under the auspices of congressional approval and was not a cession of American territory.

II AND III. THE TREATIES WITH GREAT BRITAIN OF 1842 AND 1846

The second and third treaties offered by the committee concerned conflicting land claims between the United States and Great Britain on the boundary between Maine and Canada and in the Oregon territory. No cession of territory or property occurred under either treaty.

In the Webster-Ashburton Treaty of 1842, both Britain and the United States made concessions on claims to some 12,000 square miles of land on the boundary between Maine and New Brunswick. In the treaty of 1846, where the United States claimed all the land extending to 54°40′ and the British laid claim to land down to the 42d parallel, a compromise was reached on a 49 degree boundary.

Both of these treaties obviously involve boundary disputes rather than cessions of U.S. territory, and thus fail to support the committee's assumption that the President may dispose of public lands by a self-executing treaty.

IV, V, AND VI. THE MEXICAN BOUNDARY TREATIES

Continuing to rely on the State Department, the Foreign Relations Committee also suggests that the Mexican treaties of 1933, 1963, and 1970, involving boundary adjustments necessitated by changes in the course of the Rio Grande River, are examples of self-executing treaties for the transfer of American property.

Upon closer examination, however, we find that not only did Congress appropriate the funds to acquire title to the lands conveyed, but that the land transferred under these treaties was not even Federal property. Article VII of the 1933 treaty stated that the lands which would pass from one nation to the other "shall be acquired in full ownership by the Government in whose territory said lands are at the present time." Likewise, the 1963 Chamizal Treaty dealt with non-Federal lands, and Congress provided statutory authorization for the acquisition of lands to be transferred to Mexico under the American-Mexican Boundary Convention Act of 1964 (Public Law 88–300). With regard to the 1970 treaty, the first article of that treaty provided that:

> Once this treaty has come into force and the necessary legislation has been enacted for carrying it out.

Both Governments would determine the necessity for "the acquisition, in conformity with its laws, of the lands to be transferred to the other * * *" in 1972, Congress enacted the American-Mexican Boundary Treaty Act (Public Law 92–549), which authorized the acquisition of "all lands or interests in lands required for transfer to Mexico as provided in the treaty."

In short, these Mexican boundary treaties, as the Congressional Research Service of the Library of Congress correctly concludes, "did not dispose of Federal property, and/or the disposal came about only pursuant to the aforementioned pieces of legislation."

Accordingly, "they do not appear to support the concurrent nature of the disposal power," as advocated by the administration.

VII. THE HONDURAS TREATY OF 1971

In 1971, the United States and Honduras entered into a treaty for the purpose of resolving conflicting claims over the Swan Islands in the Caribbean. The Foreign Relations Committee described these islands as "rock keys," with "no intrinsic value to the United States." The largest of the two islands, noted the committee, "is only 2 miles long and one-half mile wide. The only U.S. interest in these islands is the operation and maintenance of a meteorological observation and telecommunications facility and an air navigation beacon. The islands are populated by approximately six Americans who operate the facility and a dozen Honduran nationals and British subjects who work for the U.S. facilities or raise cattle."

The American claim to the islands was based on the Guano Act of 1856; the Honduran claim antedated the American claim by several centuries. The treaty recognized the sovereignty of Honduras over the islands, and the Honduran Government in turn recognized that the United States would continue to use the land and retain title to the property and improvements on the land necessary for the operation of the facility. All property not retained for the operation of the facility was transferred.

Whether this treaty constitutes a valid precedent for the transfer of the Panama Canal Zone and property by a self-executing treaty is open to doubt. First, it involves two minute islands of no significance to the United States. Even so, the United States retained title to much, if not most, of the property. Second, the treaty has all the characteristics of a boundary dispute in that both parties to the treaty laid claim to the islands. It may therefore be doubted whether this treaty constituted a cession of public lands clearly belonging to the United States. Third, Congress expressed little interest in the disposition of the Swan Islands. As Senator Mansfield remarked when the agreements were submitted to the Senate for consideration:

> It is my understanding that these treaties were reported on unanimously by the Committee on Foreign Relations. I know of no opposition to any of them. [Cong. Record, 20041 (June 7, 1972)].

Congress silence, in other words, may have indicated tacit consent to the transfers of disputed parcels of insignificant property.

That is not the case here. We are not silent here. We are raising the issue because it involves billions of dollars in American property.

VIII. THE JAPANESE TREATY OF 1972

In 1972, the United States and Japan entered into an agreement concerning the Ryukyu Islands and the Daito Islands.

Under article 1 of the agreement, the United States relinquished in favor of Japan all rights and interests it enjoyed under article III of the 1951 Treaty of Peace with Japan. By that article, the United States had received the right to exercise "all and any powers of administration, legislation, and jurisdiction over the territory and inhabitants of these islands, including their territorial waters." Did the transfer of these interests back to Japan under the 1972 treaty involve a cession of American territory within the meaning of article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution?

The answer is no. A House Armed Services Committee report on a bill dealing with economic development in the Ryukyus recognized that the Ryukyus were not U.S. territory and that American statutory law was generally inapplicable in the Ryukyus Islands. The committee stated that the United States possessed only de facto sovereignty, and that after the Peace Treaty of 1951, Japan possessed a residual sovereignty—meaning, said the committee:

> That the only right which Japan retained was the right to expect that the United States will not transfer the Ryukyus, including Okinawa, to any third party. (Report, p. 6).

In other words, there is reason to believe that the United States did not have territory to cede. In article 2 of the 1951 treaty, Japan renounced all right, title and claim to various pieces of territory. But there was no similar renunciation as regards Ryukyu and Daito Islands discussed in article 3 of the peace treaty. By implication, therefore, the Japanese retained their "right, title and claim" to the Ryukyus.

Three Federal courts also reached the conclusion that the United States never received sovereignty over this territory. In U.S. v. Ushi Shiroma, 123 F. Supp. 145, 149 (1954), a Federal District Court quoted approvingly a letter written by the Legal Adviser of the State Department which stated that "sovereignty over the Ryukyu Islands remains in Japan * * *" See also Burna v. U.S., 142 F. Supp. 623 (1956); affirmad 240 F. 2d 720 (4th Cir., 1957). As in boundary disputes, then, there is some question whether the territory transferred actually belonged to the United States.

It should be noted, however, that the 1972 agreement did involve the transfer of Federal property to the Japanese. But whether this conveyance was accomplished without the consent of Congress is open to doubt. As the American Law Division of the Library of Congress has observed, "It can be argued that Congress assumed that the Executive acted pursuant to powers contained in the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 or the Federal Surplus Property Act of 1949," or the Japan-United States Friendship Act of 1975, which "contains language * * * that may be argued to be congressional ratification of the executive action."

IX. PANAMA TREATY OF 1955

This brings us finally to the last treaty cited by the State Department and the Foreign Relations Committee, the 1955 treaty with Panama. This treaty provided for the transfer of real property to the Republic of Panama. By the terms of the treaty, the transfer of some property was to be based on the treaty alone, while the transfer of other property was dependent on congressional authorization. A representative of the State Department informed members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, however, that legislation would be needed to implement the transfer of all the territory mentioned in the treaty. (Hearings Before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on the Panama Treaty, 84th Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 60–61).

Articles VI and VII of the treaty, alleged by the committee not to require implementing legislation, simply amended the boundary convention of 1914 between the United States and Panama. The transfers under these articles, in other words, were not cessions of the entire Canal Zone, but boundary adjustments.

Astutely ignored by the committee is any reference to article V of the treaty which, as we have previously noted, repeatedly uses the phrase "subject to the enactment of authorizing legislation by the Congress" in connection with a major property transfer from the United States to Panama.

In sum, the 1955 treaty with Panama strongly supports the established principle that the President may not dispose of U.S. territory and property without the consent of Congress.

Of the 11 treaties cited by the Foreign Relations Committee to show that prior treaty practice supports the President's right to dispose of public lands without the consent of Congress, two are Indian treaties involving the purchase and exchange of territory rather than a cession. Neither treaty was self-executing. Six are treaties to resolve boundary disputes rather than the disposal of U.S. territory, and most of these were unquestionably authorized by Congress. The Honduran treaty concerned disputed property of little or no consequence, and the Japanese treaty dealt with the transfer of captured territory which the United States admitted it did not own. This leaves the treaty with Panama in 1955, which specifically called for implementing legislation under article V, and recognized, according to the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs when he testified before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, that implementing legislation would be required for the article VI and article VII boundary adjustments.

In light of these facts, the committee's insistence that these 11 treaties "are couched in self-executing terms and transfer territory or property belonging to the United States to other nations or * * * to specific individuals without prior congressional act authorizing such transfer" must be regarded as another excursion by the committee into the world of fantasy.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, this completes my analysis of the so-called precedents afforded by the Foreign Relations Committee. It is abundantly clear from this review of the committee's report that there is no foundation for the claim that the President has the right to transfer an American territory by a self-executing treaty. To be sure, the whole case for the committee's grotesque interpretation of the Constitution rests on a lonely dictum, extracted out of context from Holden against Joy—a decision which actually conflicts with the committee's peculiar theory—and on two treaties, one involving disputed islands in the Caribbean of no significance, the other captured islands in the Pacific. That, and nothing more, is all the committee has to offer.

The Committee finds that the constitutional text, the intent of the Framers, opinions of the Supreme Court, and historical precedent all suggest that the Panama Canal Treaty can validly transfer to Panama property belonging to the United States without a need for implementing legislation. This conclusion is in full accord with the opinion of the Attorney General that "[t]erritory or property belonging to the United States may be disposed of by action of the President and the Senate under the treaty clause."—Op. Atty. Gen.—(1977); see hearings, part 1, pp. 199–203.

And, there is considerable doubt whether these two treaties clearly stand for the proposition mantained by the committee. Both treaties did involve transfers of property, but whether these transfers were made without the approval of Congress is uncertain. The property transfers contained in the Honduran and Japanese treaties, if they demonstrate anything, show that transfers without the express consent of Congress are a rare exception in both law and diplomacy. If powers, said the Supreme Court, are "granted, they are not lost by being allowed to lie dormant any more than nonexistent powers can be prescripted by an unchallenged exercise." (U.S. v. Morton Salt Co., 338 US 632, 647 (1950).) The failure of the House of Representatives to insist upon implementing legislation regarding the transfer of a small, trivial piece of real estate on two rock islands—tiny islands over which we did not have undisputed ownership—and the transfer of property captured from the Japanese, over which we did not have sovereign ownership, can hardly support the committee's bold assertion "that the constitutional text, the intent of the Framers opinions of the Supreme Court, and historical precedent all suggest that the Panama Canal Treaty can validly transfer to Panama property belonging to the United States without a need for implementing legislation." (P. 69).

As we have already observed, nearly all of the precedents cited by the committee to support this preposterous claim are actually in direct conflict with the very theory that the committee is attempting to read into the Constitution. Not one of the judicial precedents cited by the committee even involves a cession of American territory, let alone a cession under a self-executing treaty. The committee fails to cite a single decision of any Federal court which would even lend respectability to the notion that the text of the Constitution and the location of the disposal-of-property clause authorize the President and Senate to override the express power of Congress. The committee offers no evidence to support its assertion that the Framers of the Constitution favored the idea that the President should be free to ignore the House of Representatives in disposing of American territory and property. Bearing in mind that treaty practices do not even enjoy the same stature in law as judicial precedents, most of the treaties cited by the committee are either clearly inapplicable or supportive of the principle that Congress must approve cessions of territory and property belonging to the United States. This is not to mention the countless precedents ignored by the committee which indicate that a treaty ceding territory is not even self-executing in the first place.

Mr. President, we can understand and excuse an honest mistake or, for that matter, a major error in a committee report. In the rush of business, it is too much to expect each committee report on legislation under consideration to be accurate in every detail. But when I see a pattern of grievous errors permeating an entire report in such a way that every sentence and paragraph is either false, misleading, or irrelevant, my suspicions are aroused.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that he would be better advised not to accuse the committee or its staff of dishonesty, as the next couple of paragraphs seem to suggest.

The Senator is entitled to his own opinion with respect to the constitutionality of this treaty. I, and other Senators supporting the treaty, believe the treaty constitutional and will present arguments to that effect. The Senate can then make its decision. But I think it goes beyond the propriety and the custom of the Senate for the Senator to make such a charge against the basic integrity of the committee or of its staff. I would ask him to show the judgment to withhold that charge.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I appreciate the kind of remarks of the distinguished Senator from Idaho.

All I am saying is my suspicions are very much aroused. I am delighted to follow the Senator's advice with regard to that. But I think many suspicions are going to be aroused as a result of what I consider to be serious problems with the five-page cursory analysis by the Committee on Foreign Relations of what happens to be one of the most important constitutional issues in our country's history.

I would not suggest that any Senator would participate in anything which would contribute to a false, misleading, erroneous, or irrelevant series of statements. I do not personally believe that. I do not think that any Senator should be blamed for that. But we Senators many times rely upon the work of the staffs, and in this case there are so many things that are wrong with that report that I cannot help but raise them and raise them forcefully here.

I might say that throughout the debate on these treaties, the proponents have repeatedly echoed the wild and extravagant claims of the State Department, and have hid behind the assurances of the State Department without questioning their accuracy. Against their better judgment and military sense, certain members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff have been persuaded to support these treaties. And why? Because the State Department assured them that this was the proper course to take. Time and again members of the Foreign Relations Committee—with the notable exception of my colleague from Michigan (Senator GRIFFIN) have stood on this floor and assured us that this fact or that fact is true because the State Department says its true. The committee report is, indeed, little more than a carbon copy of the phoney theories paraded by the State Department to support a dangerous and unprecedented exercise of Executive power.

Past experience would seem to suggest, Mr. President, that Senators ought to be on their guard when State Department representatives come to the Senate seeking more power for their chief. The two greatest tragedies in recent American history are the war in Vietnam and Watergate. And it is no secret that the State Department and the Justice Department, which are misrepresenting the Constitution in connection with the Panama Canal Treaty, played a key role in bringing them about.

Are memories so short that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee has already forgotten the so-called 125 incidents that were cited not so long ago by the State Department to support the President's encroachment on Congress war powers? in 1966, when American troops were being sent into Vietnam by the thousands, the Legal Adviser to the State Department proclaimed—and these are his exact words, Mr. President, that—

> Since the Constitution was adopted there have been 125 instances in which the President has ordered the armed forces to take action or maintain positions abroad without obtaining prior congressional authorization, starting with the "undeclared war" with France (1799–1800). (Office of the Legal Advisor, U.S. Department of State, "The Legality of the United States Participation in the Defense of Vietnam," reprinted in 75 Yale Law Journal, 1085, 1101).

Under careful examination by constitutional scholars, however, these 125 incidents or precedents offered by the State Department, proved to be feeble, indeed. The "vast majority" of such cases, said the distinguished constitutional authority, Edward S. Corwin—> involved fights with pirates, landings of small naval contingents on barbarous or semi-barbarous coasts (to protect American citizens), the dispatch of small bodies of troops to chase bandits or cattle rustlers across the Mexican border." ("The President's Power," in D. Haight and L. Johnston, eds., The President's Role and Power, p. 361).

And almost all these minor episodes, added Henry Steele Commager, represented the "use of Presidential force against small, backward and distraught peoples." (Quoted in Raoul Berger, "Executive Privilege," p. 77). "The incidents," concluded Raoul Berger, in his classic study on executive privilege, were—> far from "precedents" for sending our troops into battle, engaging upward of 500,000 men. At best, the "125 incidents" constitute bootstraps precedents which add up to a claim that the President may alter the constitutional distribution of powers by his own practices and reallocate to himself powers exclusively confided in Congress, (p. 88).

The Foreign Relations Committee ultimately came to the view that the Nation had been misled. "Congress," acknowledged the committee in 1972—just 6 years ago—"bears a heavy responsibility for its passive acquiescence in the unwarranted expansion of Presidential power." (S. Rept. No. 606, 92d Cong. 2d sess., p. 18 (1972).)

In like measure did the Justice Department labor to expand the powers of the President through the misrepresentation of so-called precedents. In 1957, as Senators will recall, Deputy Attorney General William P. Rogers assembled a mountain of precedents in a memorandum to the Senate justifying the right of the President "to withhold requested information from Congress." (Memorandums of the Attorney General, Senate Judiciary Committee, 85th Cong. 2d sess. (1958) p. vii). The Rogers memo subsequently became a bible for the executive branch, and its so-called precedents were repeated to Congress in 1971 by Mr. Rogers, who was then Secretary of State. By 1973, President, Nixon had "invoked executive privilege some eight or more times, including his much-criticized refusal to reveal the taped White House conversations with his aides." (Berger, p. 253). All of this was done in the name of "established precedent" which, under the scrutiny of Raoul Berger and the Federal courts, came crashing down with the fall and resignation of the President.

Mr. President, the precedents cited by the Foreign Relations Committee in connection with the Panama Canal Treaty have no greater merit than the precedents that were cited earlier by the State Department and the Attorney General to justify the President's encroachment on Congress war powers or the false claims of executive privilege. The Government of the United States is now contemplating the transfer of one of the world's most important, vital waterways to a tiny country in Central America that is controlled by an unfriendly dictatorship, the outcome of which is very uncertain in terms of our security and national interests. Such a momentous decision cannot and should not be made without the consent of Congress and the American people. Our Constitution provides for congressional participation, as Henry Steele Commager once declared, "in the great decisions that spell life and death to the Nation." (Berger, p. 344).

The American people know this and the Members of the House of Representatives know it. At this very moment, there is pending in the House of Representatives a resolution, House Concurrent Resolution No. 345, supported by 235 Democrat and Republican Congressmen—more than a majority—which declares that the House must be given a voice in the decision to surrender this marvel of American genius and engineering to this petty tyrant named Torrijos.

If Senators ignore this resolution, and continue to insist that they have the sole right and prerogative to make this momentous decision, on their own, and to do what 100 men think is in our best interest, without seeking a national consensus, then I fear that the U.S. Senate is courting another disaster. "If there is one lesson we have learned from this involvement in Vietnam," Secretary of State Rogers told the Senate in 1971, "it is that we need congressional support and we need public support." (Fulbright hearings, p. 511, as quoted in Berger, p. 345). And I say to the Members of the Senate we need congressional support and public support for the transfer of this great canal. We have already had enough Vietnams and enough Watergates.

Mr. President, I urge the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. METZENBAUM). The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HELMS. I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, a recent editorial in the Winston-Salem Journal is right on target concerning the Torrijos drug connection.

In response to statements that the U.S. Senate, in its consideration of the Panama Canal treaties, is not dealing—

> With General Torrijos . . . we are dealing with the Republic of Panama, and I know of no charge against it—sentiments expressed in this Chamber after the closed session of the Senate—the Journal editorialist wisely points out that the Republic of Panama is Torrijos, and has been since the general took power in 1969 and instituted a semi-dictatorial regime.

Mr. President, the editorial of the Winston-Salem Journal is right on target.

There can be no doubt in the mind of any reasonable person that the conduct of the dictator of Panama is a legitimate subject of consideration in the Senate's deliberations on the Panama Canal treaties.

Unfortunately, the public was unable to share in the Senate's deliberations on the drug charges. I opposed the closed session of the Senate. The public's business should be conducted in public as much as reasonably possible. The serious allegations against General Torrijos and members of his family and government deserved a full public airing. The people have a right to know, and were denied that right. Little wonder that the Congress continues to be held in low esteem by the public is all major opinion surveys.

But, be that as it may, again, the Winston-Salem Journal was right on target with its editorial. The Journal editorialist wrote:

> By sticking to secret sessions, the Senate also managed to keep the American people from making an informed judgment on Torrijos' alleged narcotics dealings. That would be understandable if the Senators were shown nothing but trash. The public record, however, tends to undercut that possibility.

The Journal then proceeds to list a wealth of information in the existing public record corroborating allegations of drug dealings at the highest levels of the Panamanian Government..

This is the same Government, Mr. President, that we are asked to trust with the security and welfare of one of the most important waterways in the world. Should not the American people have the full facts about that Government and its top officials?

The Journal dealt only with the public record:

> One can only speculate what the private record contains. But this much is clear: Given the public record alone, the American people deserve more than the curt dismissals of the significance of the two days of closed-door Senate sessions.

The Journal continues, right on target once more.

Mr. President, this is a valuable and instructive editorial. I wonder how many other newspapers, whose duty it is to get at the truth, share the same concerns expressed by the Journal. My guess would be that the number is large. Unfortunately, that number does not seem to include either the Washington Post or the New York Times, whose editorial policy seems to have unduly influenced the judgment of its news writers.

More important than the newspaper's right to know is the people's right to know. This the Journal fully understands. The Journal says:

Perhaps nothing not already known appeared during the sessions. Perhaps the accusations against Torrijos, even if they could be proved, should not affect the passage of the Panama Canal treaties. But the American public has the right to know as much as possible about those accusations. . . . And the American public has the right to decide what weight to put on those accusations in determining whether to approve or disapprove the canal treaties.

Mr. President, I commend this editorial to my colleagues. Soundly reasoned and properly qualified, it raises serious questions about the propriety of keeping the public uninformed about the serious allegations raised against General Torrijos, members of his family, and his government.

I recall that when allegations of impropriety and possible illegal conduct were raised against high officials of our own Government, including, eventually, our own President, the Senate spent thousands of hours and who knows how much money to get to the bottom of the allegations. Do we not deserve to do at least the same—on a proper scale—for the Torrijos government to whom it is proposed that we give away one of our great national assets?

Mr. President, so that my colleagues may have the benefit of this excellent editorial, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Winston-Salem Journal, Feb. 24, 1978]

THE PUBLIC RECORD

The Senate has completed two days of closed-door sessions dealing with the possible involvement of Panamanian strongman Omar Torrijos in the international drug trade. Whatever was discussed in secret did not seem to impress many senators or change any votes in the battle to ratify the Panama Canal treaties. "There is no evidence," said Majority Leader Robert Byrd, "that would stand up in any United States court of law linking Gen. Torrijos to any illegal narcotics operation of any kind." Said Minority Leader Howard Baker, "We are not dealing with Gen. Torrijos. . . . We are dealing with the Republic of Panama, and I know of no charges against it."

But the Republic of Panama is Torrijos, and has been since the general took power in 1969 and instituted a semi-dictatorial regime. And the Panama Canal treaties are opposed by many Americans partly because of Torrijos and his form of government. The Senate met behind closed doors to prevent the compromising of classified documents. But by sticking to secret sessions, the Senate also managed to keep the American people from making an informed judgment on Torrijos' alleged narcotics involvement. That would be understandable, if the senators were shown nothing but trash. The public record, however, tends to undercut that possibility. Consider what is known outside the Senate's chambers:

According to a 1973 draft report of a House subcommittee, "Panama has become the conduit through which passes enormous quantities of dope—an estimated one-year period—used by U.S. addicts. This means that at one point in time, roughly 20,000 American drug addicts were getting their daily supply by this route."

According to the same House report, the international transit chief at Tocumen Airport in Panama, Joaquin Him Gonzales, was arrested in the Canal Zone by U.S. narcotics agents on Feb. 6, 1971. Gonzales was brought to the United States and tried on charges of conspiring to ship heroin worth more than $1 million to Dallas. Said the House report: "Gonzales was allegedly a Torrijos protege and this relationship was made clear when the Panamanian government mobilized all its resources . . . for the offender to be returned to Panama."

The House report also mentioned "the arrest of Manuel Rojas Sucre, the nephew of Panama's Vice President Arturo Sucre, at Kennedy International Airport on Dec. 3, 1972, with cocaine, liquid hashish, and a diplomatic passport (his mother is Panama's counsel general in Montreal). . . ."

A 1972 Senate subcommittee report noted "the seizure of 180 pounds of heroin on July 8, 1971, when Rafael A. Richard, Jr., son of the Panamanian ambassador to Taiwan, was arrested at JFK Airport in New York." Richard subsequently drew a prison sentence of three and a half years.

According to a CBS News report aired last year, Drug Enforcement Agency files describe Col. Manuel Noriega, head of the Panamanian national guard, as being a bag man for Torrijos and "allegedly in charge of setting up bank accounts and laundering narcotics money."

In 1971, Torrijos' brother, Moises, then Panamanian ambassador to Argentina, was secretly indicted by a federal grand jury for his alleged involvement in the attempted smuggling of 154 pounds of heroin into the United States through Kennedy Airport.

A Senate Intelligence Committee report, issued just the other day, said that "some sources have provided intelligence which we view as reliable and which we believe suggests that Gen. Torrijos knew about narcotics trafficking by government officials and did not take sufficient action to stop his brother's activities."

That is the public record. One can only speculate what the private record shown to the Senate contains. But this much is clear: Given the public record alone, the American people deserve more than curt dismissals of the significance of two days of closed-door Senate sessions. Perhaps nothing not already known appeared during the sessions. Perhaps the accusations against Torrijos (even if they could be proved, should not affect the passage of the Panama Canal treaties. But the American public has the right to know as much as possible about those accusations, consonant with the requirements of confidentiality. And what weight to put on those accusations in determining whether to approve or disapprove the canal treaties.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HELMS. Yes, gladly.

Mr. SCHMITT. Will the Senator yield just for a question? I know the Senator spent a good deal of time in his home State during this last recess, as did, I presume, the Senator from Utah and other Senators.

I noticed in the last day or two another Harris poll that suggests that the country is evenly split now on the question of the Panama Canal Treaties.

Did the Senator notice any diminution in the opinions of his constituents during this last recess?

Mr. HELMS. Quite to the contrary, I would say to the distinguished Senator from New Mexico. The intensity of the opposition to the treaties was more pronounced than ever, and I was sad to note that the degree of public confidence in the Senate has been further diminished as a result of the approval of the Neutrality Treaty. Great concern was expressed everywhere I went.

I went into 10 or 12 counties in my State, and it seemed unanimous that the people simply do not want the remaining treaty to be approved. My message to them was I hope that the people of other States were communicating to their Senators their sentiments about the treaties during the Easter recess.

But to answer the Senator's question, I have seen no reduction in the opposition to the treaties. Quite to the contrary, I think it is more intense. Only 3 weeks ago the prestigious Opinion Research Corp. of Princeton, N.J., took a nationwide poll and found 72 percent opposed to giving up ownership and control of the canal.

Mr. SCHMITT. Well, of course, I can only state over the last 10 days for the State of New Mexico. I think I can in fact state, because my travels were quite extensive, particularly throughout the northwestern and northeastern portions of the State and Albuquerque, which is a major population center of the State, that I frankly could see absolutely no change in the very strong personally expressed opposition to the transfer of the Panama Canal under the conditions of the treaties.

Everyone has a different idea about how we might get out of the mess that we now have gotten ourselves into, but nevertheless there is a great deal of discomfort and disenchantment with this particular mode of change.

That, of course, corresponds with our mail. I think it wise for Senators to realize that a great deal of our mail on any issue is negative. The people who write letters to us tend to write letters because they are opposed to something; and unfortunately there are a lot of things to be opposed to these days. I think most Americans basically are positive in their outlook on things, but when they are positive and feeling good about something, they tend not to let us know about it.

In the case of the Panama treaties, however, I think that at least in New Mexico it is clear that the personally expressed opposition to the treaties roughly coincides with the written expressed opposition to the treaties. Now, I am talking about personal letters, not necessarily the form letters and form cards that come in, but the personal letters that people send.

I think that before the Senate accepts at face value the indications of another Harris poll which suggests an equalization of opposition and those in favor of the treaties, Senators at least should assess their own constituencies and see if that is in fact what they see at home.

I certainly did not see that in New Mexico. I see very little change, other than a great deal of disappointment that the Senate did ratify the Neutrality Treaty and a great deal of hope that either in the process of debate on the Panama Canal Treaty or in the process of debate on implementing legislation, this decision, will, one way or another, be reversed.

I commend the Senator for his activities, and thank him for answering my question.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator from New Mexico. I might state that many people in North Carolina expressed surprise at the way these debates have been covered by the major news media. Sometimes we sit in the Senate, and there may be an assumption by some Senators that all wisdom resides here, when as a matter of plain fact it does not. But the instinctive reaction of the people of my State, notwithstanding the one-sided news coverage, has been very interesting.

North Carolinians are concerned about a number of things, not merely the giveaway of the canal nor the defense aspect, but the economic aspects of it. North Carolinians are aware that a great deal of the agricultural products which North Carolina exports go through the canal. Then there are the shipments of oil, the Alaskan oil; they understood about that. So I was struck by the obvious fact that the people of my State have been able to gain correct impressions, despite the fact that the major media of my State, indeed of the Nation, are almost unanimously in favor of the treaties.

I have talked with the people of North Carolina, and I suspect that, like the people of New Mexico, they are hard to fool. And that speaks well for them.

Mr. SCHMITT. They certainly seem to be hard to fool, at least in this Senator's judgment.

One issue that has been more and more talked about in New Mexico, and I am not exactly sure why, because it has not been talked about much on the floor of the Senate, is whether the transportation mechanism of the Panama Canal across the isthmus is going to be obsolete at some time in the future.

It is hard for anyone who has grown up in our school systems, at least school systems with a course or two in geography, to understand how a passageway between oceans now separated by a continent or two can become obsolete. World commerce would seem to require an economical passageway across the backbone of those continents. I frankly have trouble explaining that to them, because I, for one, cannot see how anyone could claim that world commerce would prefer to go around the tip of South America or try to find a northwest passage, rather than have an economically viable, assured, nondiscriminatory route across Central America.

I think we are going to find, no matter what happens to these treaties, that in the very near future the issue will be joined again, because it is a fact of major importance to world commerce that there be access across the canal area, the Central American area, and that is not going to decrease, it is going to increase, because world commerce is on the increase. I believe in the future we are going to find much more inventive, much larger, much more economically viable techniques by which to cross that isthmus. I think it is only a matter of time, as I have said, before we discover that, not only here in the Senate but maybe in the hemisphere as a whole.

Mr. HELMS. I think the able Senator is unquestionably correct. This is another point that I am sure his citizens in New Mexico, as well as certainly mine in North Carolina, realize.

I might say to the Senator that last year, I think the date was June 30, if I remember correctly, I visited with President Carter. We spent about 40 minutes talking about the proposals to give away the Panama Canal. Of course, that is the way I characterized it; he characterized it somewhat differently.

But I went to the White House to offer to the President an alternative proposed by a number of us in the Senate who oppose the treaty. I delivered to the President a letter signed by four former Chiefs of Naval Operations, one of whom is a former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, in which the relinquishing of the ownership and control of the Panama Canal was described by those four distinguished Navy leaders as being perilous to the survival of the United States.

I was designated by my colleagues to inform the President that if he would abandon the idea of the giving away of the Panama Canal, a number of us in the Senate would support him wholeheartedly in a major program to modernize the locks of the Panama Canal, take a new look at compensation and other aspects of the present relationship that may or may not be inequitable.

The President evidenced a great deal of interest in the proposal. But later he talked with Mr. Bunker and Mr. Linowitz, and that was the end of that.

But I yet believe, I would say to the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, that if the President had followed that advice, we would not only have avoided this confrontation in the Senate which has been an embarrassment to some of the Senators who were pressured into voting for the Neutrality Treaty. We would now be well on our way to a very acceptable relationship with the people of Panama. I emphasize the words "people of Panama," because these treaties do not propose to turn over this canal to the people of Panama.

The proponents of these treaties propose to turn it over to the Torrijos regime.

I thank the Senator for his comments. We will just proceed with our discussions and hope that, as Senator Ervin often said, the light of wisdom will flow down from the heavens. Perhaps two or three Senators will change their votes and we can put an end to this debate—and then go back to the drawing board and see what is fair and equitable to the people of the United States and to the people of Panama.

Mr. SCHMITT. If the light of that wisdom is the wisdom of the people, then I think the light is already before us.

Even if one would assume that half the people of the country now favored passage of these treaties, one would have to look at the way the question was phrased in a survey such as the Harris survey. But even if they do, that is still a very large number of people who feel we are doing the wrong thing. Any time we get into a situation where a larger number of people in this country, even a large majority, feel that we are making the wrong move, then I think it is time for the Congress to take cognizance of that. We did not do that, to our detriment, in recent history. To again not do that is something that I think represents a very serious oversight on the part of the Congress. I hope, and, as a matter of fact, I will always be optimistic, that the Congress will rectify any mistakes it makes in that regard.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the able Senator. Let me say that I greatly admire his leadership in this matter. The people of New Mexico have every reason to be proud of him.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I commend the distinguished Senater from Utah for the fine presentation he has made today. He has developed a quality of leadership in this discussion which has been quite impressive to the people in my State. I heard many compliments about the Senator from Utah last week when I was traveling around North Carolina.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the distinguished Senator from North Carolina for his kind comments. Likewise, I have heard fine comments from across the country concerning the fight the Senator from North Carolina has been making. I personally have a high professional regard for the Senator from North Carolina as a Senator, and one who has made a fine contribution to this country.

Mr. HELMS. I appreciate the comments of the Senator from Utah.

Also, I might say that the junior Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN) is very highly regarded by the people of North Carolina, and would be easily elected to the Senate from my State if he chose to run there. I hope he does not choose to run there this year, of course.

I again commend the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, with whom I have just had a most useful and most interesting discussion.

Mr. President, I think that it would be useful at this point to discuss in detail the nature of U.S. property rights in the Canal Zone. It seems to be fashionable in certain circles to deny that our rights in the Canal Zone constitute ownership. Some distinguished Members of this body, for example, have openly denied—even ridiculed—the notion that the property in the Canal Zone is held by the United States as a possession. The State Department has gone so far as to assert that the Republic of Panama retains "residual ownership" of the Canal Zone, a proposition that goes directly counter to Panama's renunciation of certain claims in the 1903 treaty.

In fact, there is such a general confusion about the nature of our rights in the zone that terms such as "title," "property," "possession," "territory," and "sovereignty" have been used as though they were virtually interchangeable. Of course, they all have specific meanings, and it is important to distinguish among them. It is especially important during consideration of the powers of Congress under article IV, section 3 of the U.S. Constitution, that we have a clear idea of the distinctions. The Constitution says that—

> The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

If we are going to know what power Congress has in this regard, obviously we must know precisely what "territory or other property belonging to the United States" constitutes.

Let us look at some of these terms:

First. Property belonging to the United States obviously includes all forms of U.S. Government property, both movable property and real property. Movable property speaks for itself; there are examples of such movable U.S. Government property all around us. The Panama Canal Treaty, in article XIII, speaks only of the transfer of "real property, including nonremovable improvements thereon." By implication, therefore, movable property is not transferred by the treaty, except for certain tools and equipment relating to the ports of Balboa and Cristobal and which are specified in an inventory in annex B to the Agreement in Implementation of Article III of the Panama Canal Treaty. It appears, therefore, that the transfer of the movable property listed in annex B, as well as any other movable property, falls under the provisions of article IV, section 3 of the Constitution, and must be specifically authorized by the Congress. The President is not authorized to dispose of this property by an executive agreement which does not come either before the Senate or the House.

Real property, on the other hand, is property to which the United States bears title. As I intended to go into more detail about the U.S. titles in the Canal Zone, I shall pass over that point now, except to indicate that the question of title is the one thing upon which the U.S. Supreme Court has pronounced definitively. There are those who maintain that the U.S. Supreme Court decisions can be ignored because they have no bearing in international law. Some have even referred to such decisions as unilateral decisions not accepted by Panama. But Panama, by the Treaty of 1903, is prohibited from the exercise of any sovereign rights, power, or authority in the zone, and that prohibition remains until the treaty is abrogated. The exercise of supreme judicial power is a power that only the United States can exercise in the zone.

Moreover, the issue at hand is not whether Panama has accepted the decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court, but whether the President, the Secretary of State, the treaty negotiators, and the Members of the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives have accepted those decisions. All such officers of the United States are sworn to uphold the U.S. Constitution—and that means the Constitution as interpreted by the Supreme Court. We are discussing an internal question, Mr. President, the question of the application of article IV, section 3 to the decisions of this body and of the House. Whether Panama accepts the interpretations of the U.S. Supreme Court is totally irrelevant; what is relevant is the responsibility of this body.

Second. A possession of the United States is property which the United States holds outside of the 50 States and the District of Columbia. The United States need not hold sovereignty over a "possession" for U.S. law to have effect within its boundaries. In the much-quoted Vermilya-Brown case, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the Fair Labor Standards Act applied to the construction of a U.S. military base in Bermuda, even though the United States did not have sovereignty. The Court ruled that the base was a U.S. "possession," drawing its analogy from the Canal Zone, which the Court also deemed a "possession." Although the Court's statements about the Canal Zone were mere dicta, and not a ruling, the dissent by Justice Jackson did not take issue with the 5 to 4 majority's description of the Canal Zone as a "possession." Instead, he argued that our authority in the Canal Zone went far beyond that in Bermuda. He said:

> The Isthmian Canal Convention ceded the Canal Zone to the United States . . . To such an extent, indeed are we sovereign in the Canal Zone that Panama has been granted special commercial rights only by express and formal concession, and this Court has reviewed the history of the acquisition and concluded that the title of the United States is complete and perfect.

Third. Territory of the United States is of two kinds: incorporated and unincorporated. The distinction does not help us very much because the Canal Zone appears to be the last unincorporated territory of the United States. The distinction is said to have been based upon the notion of whether or not Congress had decided to make the territory a permanent part of the United States. The lack of such a decision on the part of Congress does not imply that such territory could not become a permanent part of the United States; it merely indicates that the decision to incorporate was never made. The Philippines, for example, was unincorporated territory of the United States. It was always our intention to give the Philippines independence.

The Canal Zone is unincorporated territory of the United States. This was the holding in the 1971 Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals case of United States against Husband R., a decision which was allowed to stand by the Supreme Court. The Court said:

> The Canal Zone is an unincorporated territory of the United States. Laws applicable in the Canal Zone are enacted by Congress—there is no local legislature.

The last sentence just quoted in the Court's opinion is a statement of the obvious. The U.S. Congress is the legislature for the Canal Zone. Its relationship to the Canal Zone is not the same as its relationship with the 50 States; whereas Federal law applies only to the Federal interest in the Nation as a whole, in a territory without a legislature there is no other interest except a Federal interest.

The Court's opinion said further:

> Congress has complete and plenary authority to legislate for an unincorporated territory such as the Canal Zone, pursuant to Article IV, Paragraph 3, Clause 2 of the Constitution, empowering it "to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the territory or other Property belonging to the United States."

In short, Congress has continuously legislated for the Canal Zone under article IV, section 3 under its authority to "dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." Just as a State legislature takes into consideration the local problems and conditions in making State laws, so too, Congress takes into consideration the special conditions relating to the Canal Zone.

Congress established the Canal Zone Code, for example, and set up the U.S. District Court at Balboa under article IV. Whereas most Federal courts are set up under article III, the Balboa court is an article IV court—sometimes called a territorial court. Federal laws apply to the Canal Zone, although often special exception is made to suit local conditions. For some purposes of law, the Canal Zone is treated as an integral part of the United States; for other purposes of law, it is not. The point is that it is up to Congress to make this decision. Congress has the authority and power to treat it either way, depending upon the purpose Congress has in mind.

It is highly erroneous to draw the conclusion that the Canal Zone is not territory of the United States just because Congress has placed it in a special category for certain purposes. The fact that Congress has the option of treating it one way or the other is proof that the Canal Zone is territory of the United States, for Congress can make any rules and regulations it chooses under article IV, section 3.

Thus, some have argued from the Supreme Court's decision in the case of Luckenbach Steamship Co. against United States that the Canal Zone is foreign territory. But what the Court decided in Luckenbach was that Congress had, for certain purposes, namely, the importation and control of merchandise, determined that the ports of the Canal Zone be treated as foreign ports. At issue was whether the Luckenbach Steamship Co. should receive compensation for the transportation of mails at a domestic rate, or at the higher foreign rate. The dispute was an internal dispute between the Post Office, which contracted with Luckenbach at the higher rate, and the General Accounting Office, which would only allow payment at the lower rate. The issue was which agency was interpreting the laws of Congress correctly.

The Supreme Court pointed out that Congress treated the Canal Zone differently for different purposes, and that for the purposes of importation, Canal Zone ports should be treated as foreign ports. The Court did not question the right of Congress to treat it one way or the other; it only sought to answer the question of how the determination of Congress was to be applied. Of course, when one looks at the circumstances of the Canal Zone, it is clear that the decision of Congress was based upon commonsense. The ports of the Canal Zone are 3,000 miles from the United States, and it would be difficult to control importation and immigration without treating it as a foreign port. Moreover, from the point of view of the Post Office, mails to the Canal Zone were a unique case, and it would have been difficult to get proper service from private steamship lines unless the compensation was at the higher foreign rate.

The Luckenbach case, therefore, does not prove that the Canal Zone is not territory of the United States, but shows instead that Congress did treat the Canal Zone as a territory of the United States, acting under article IV, section 3.

A similar set of circumstances surrounds the issue of citizenship. Some of my distinguished colleagues have attempted to argue on this floor that the Canal Zone was not U.S. territory because those born there are not automatically U.S. citizens. This argument involved the false presumption that ciitzenship is an accident of geography at the time of birth. The plain fact is that citizenship is conferred through a complicated set of laws laid down by Congress, laws that frequently undergo change and revision. Even the terms citizen and national are not synonymous. In certain circumstances a person can be a national of the United States, owing allegiance to the United States, but not a ciitzen of the United States. Even our treatment of the citizenship of those born in the Canal Zone has varied from time to time depending upon our laws.

In 1907, the U.S. Attorney General ruled that citizens of Panama who were residents of the Canal Zone at the time of the treaty owed allegiance to the United States and were entitled to passports. The Attorney General said:

> In my opinion the sovereignty over the Canal Zone is not an open or doubtful question . . . The treaty gives the substance of sovereignty, and instead of containing a mere declaration transferring the sovereignty, descends to the particulars "all the rights, power, and authority" in the former sovereign.
> The rights so transferred are to be enjoyed . . . "in perpetuity" and no exception is made of any persons or things in the Zone.
> I am unable to perceive that this language is obscure or ambiguous or that we are warranted in resorting to any construction of it except by the first rule of construction—that plain and sensible words should be taken to mean what they say . . .
> According to international law, with which American practice in framing treaties and dealing with inhabitants of such territory has been consistent, it is well settled that in cases of acquisition of inhabited territory of the inhabitants, unless there is something in the treaty or act of cession providing otherwise.

At the present time, Mr. President, the Canal Zone is clearly not foreign territory for the purposes of determining citizenship. Congress has placed the Canal Zone in a special category, different from the category for those born in foreign countries. Today, inhabitants of the Canal Zone claim U.S. citizenship under a special statute dealing with the Canal Zone, 8 U.S.C. 1403, and receive certificates of citizenship under 8 U.S.C. 1452. Under the definitions of our law (8 U.S.C. 1101), "the term 'United States' as used in section 1452 of this title includes the Canal Zone."

The reason that Congress can treat citizenship in this way is that Congress has the power to make all needful rules and regulations for U.S. territory. In other words, we are talking about U.S. territory, article IV territory. And Congress not only makes needful rules and regulations for such territory; it also has the power to dispose of it. By Congress, Mr. President, is meant both the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Thus we see that the Canal Zone is property of the United States, a possession of the United States, and territory of the United States. Under all three categories, the Canal Zone falls within congressional authority of article IV, section 3. That is the only issue we have here at stake today. If the House of Representatives is to act, it must act under article IV, section 3. If the Canal Zone is either a property, a possession, or a territory of the United States, then the House of Representatives is obliged to act. But the Canal Zone is all of those—so the House of Representatives must act if our constitutional processes are to be preserved. Now let me turn to the issue of sovereignty.

Fourth. Sovereignty is an issue totally separate and apart from the issue of whether the House of Representatives must act on the disposal of the Canal Zone. The Senator from North Carolina believes that sovereignty is a very important issue, essential to our ability to operate and defend the canal. Indeed, it is my judgment that the principal defect in the present treaties presented for ratification is that they give up the rights of the United States to exercise sovereign powers in the Canal Zone. It is, in fact, an irremediable defect in these treaties.

The problem is that there is no settled definition of sovereignty. Theorists have composed definitions that are satisfactory to theorists; but they are definitions that have never been tested. For, in the long run, sovereignty is an attribute of power. It is the supreme power or dominion over a defined territory. In other words, whoever has the power to prevent someone else from seizing power has sovereignty.

There have been attempts to divide the notion of sovereignty into de jure and de facto sovereignty. There is no question that we have de facto sovereignty over the Canal Zone. De facto means a situation where, as a practical matter, certain circumstances obtain. But as a practical matter, we do exercise all the rights, power, and authority of a sovereign power in the Canal Zone. The Treaty of 1903 gives us that authority. At the same time, it forbids Panama from exercising any attributes of sovereignty whatsoever. So if Panama does not and cannot exercise any sovereignty over the Canal Zone, whereas the United States can and does exercise all the rights of sovereignty, then the question is plain. Only the United States, as a practical matter, exercises sovereignty in the zone.

But is there such a thing as de jure sovereignty? Once again, it is plain that the sovereignty which the United States exercises in the zone is de jure. The United States exercises sovereignty pursuant to the concessions of the 1903 treaty. The 1903 treaty is a legal document, recognized by all nations under international law. So the sovereignty which we exercise in the Canal Zone is also de jure.

It is difficult to escape the fact that sovereignty is not an abstract right that exists apart from any practical situation. It is absolute power exercised over a specific territory. By that definition, we do have sovereignty in the Canal Zone. No one, not even Panama, has the right to challenge anything that we choose to do in the zone. Sovereignty is legitimate power in operation. It does not exist apart from the power to enforce it. A small nation has sovereignty as well as a large nation, but only so long as a strong nation is willing to back up the claims of the smaller in the face of aggression.

Sovereignty is an abstraction developed in the 18th and 19th centuries to help rationalize the claims of power. It is a useful concept, but one that has never really been put to test in international legal forums. For, in the long run, the only enforcer of sovereignty is power. Sovereignty is supreme power; and, in the history of man, war has been the ultimate arbiter of sovereignty.

But did Panama retain any elements of sovereignty in the treaty of 1903? Does Panama have any residuum, any shade of title to claim supreme power? That is a question that has never been resolved. Some of my distinguished colleagues have said that we do not have sovereignty because Panama retains titular sovereignty; or that we are obliged to give the Canal Zone to Panama if we decide to give it up. Of course, that position depends on fallacious reasoning. It is a circular argument. The question to be decided is precisely the question of whether Panama retains any interest in the zone. If Panama does retain an interest, then we would be obliged to turn it over if we decide to give it up. Unfortunately, the treaty is silent on the matter.

As a matter of fact, the treaty of 1903 consistently treats the Canal Zone as a cession. The original draft spoke of a lease; but all references to the word "lease" were removed, and the word "grant" substituted in some form over 20 times. In Spanish, the equivalent word used is conceder, which has the same meaning as concede in English. What was involved were concessions of both land and sovereign rights, the latter described by Philippe Bunau-Varilla as "a grant of sovereignty en bloc."

It is that grant of sovereignty which enables the United States to defend the canal as we please, without interfering with Panama's sovereignty. The concept of a grant of sovereignty was a brilliant solution to the problem of conflicting jurisdictions. There is no way that two nations can exercise sovereignty in the same territory without one infringing on the other—either by a practical incursion of power, or by political and economic interference. At the beginning the 1903 treaty also imposed upon the United States the responsibility for the maintenance of Panama's independence from third-nation attacks, and for the maintenance of internal order and sanitation.

This responsibility, of course, was an infringement on Panama's sovereignty and was bound to create frictions, even though it was a practical necessity in the beginning. So at Panama's request, the United States continuously withdrew from operating in Panama's territory, even though we had the obligation to do so by treaty. By 1955, the United States had withdrawn completely from Panama's affairs and from Panama's territory.

Thus, the Canal Zone is not an interference with Panama's sovereignty; it is a device whereby we can avoid interfering in Panama's territorial integrity or internal affairs. It is precisely the loss of this device in the treaties before the Senate today that creates a situation balanced upon a logical impossibility, a contradiction of predicates. That is why the sovereignty issue is important.

But it is not directly relevant to the issue of participation of the House of Representatives in article IV, section 3 authority. That depends upon the disposition of property—property which would still be property of the United States even if we should give up our right to exercise sovereign powers in the zone. The only relation of sovereignty to ownership is that sovereignty ultimately protects the owner from expropriations. Therefore, when the sovereign and the owner are identical, expropriation is impossible.

Nevertheless, sovereignty and ownership are two different things, and the Senate must not get them confused. Indeed, property, possession, and territory are three different concepts also, but they all come under the purview of article IV, section 3. All three of them can exist without the owner also having sovereignty. It is the question of ownership that is at stake in article IV, section 3, not sovereignty.

Let us turn, therefore, from the general concepts to the specific. Let us examine the rights of ownership which the United States enjoys in the Canal Zone. Since these rights spring from different sources, each must be examined in turn to understand the nature of those rights.

II. THE STATUS OF U.S. LANDS GRANTED BY PANAMA

It is commonly believed that most of the land in the Canal Zone was conveyed to the United States by the treaty of 1903. But, as I hope to point out to the distinguished Members of this body, the preponderance of the land—at least two-thirds—was not conveyed by treaty; it was purchased from private owners. The importance of this fact bears directly upon our discussion of the constitutional obligations of article IV, section 3, of the U.S. Constitution.

No matter what conclusion one comes to with regard to the lands obtained directly from the Republic of Panama by the United States, those lands are the smallest portion of the Canal Zone. Thus, it can be amply demonstrated that the vast proportion of the property consists of lands held by the United States in fee simple. In short, the vast proportion is indisputably property of the United States; only a small portion suffers from varying interpretations of title.

Mr. President, this Senator from North Carolina does not pretend to be a legal expert, but he has consulted legal experts who assure him that this remaining one-third of the area, consisting of areas that were formerly public lands of the Republic of Panama, was conveyed to the United States as a cession of land, a "grant" in the words of the 1903 treaty. According to these experts, the use of the word "grant," the exclusive rights of "occupation, use, and control," and the term of the grant "in perpetuity" all combine to create a total cession of property. And although the Senator from North Carolina has argued that property ownership and sovereignty are two distinct issues, the grant of property in this case is made even more secure by the prohibition on the exercise of sovereignty by Panama in perpetuity, which effectively guarantees our titles in perpetuity. Whatever the nature of cession, Panama does not have the power to contest that cession or to reverse it.

In any case, the extent of the holdings purchased in fee simple from private owners thoroughly demolishes the notion that the Canal Zone is "rented" or "leased." The $10 million in gold paid under article XIV of the 1903 treaty "as the price or compensation" can only be attributed to the cession of a minor portion of the lands involved. The "annual payment" of $250,000 in gold coin (now $519,000) is not characterized in the treaty. But we know from the history of the aborted Hay-Herran Treaty with Colombia, that the figure of $250,000 originated in the annual payment to Colombia for the railroad concession, and was not related to payments for land. However, in article XXII, Panama gave up any reversionary claims to the railroad concession or lands. Most likely the retention of the $250,000 annuity was intended as a gesture of good will. Even today, the remainder of the present $2.3 million annuity is paid from State Department appropriations as part of the cost of conducting international relations, and is not paid by the Panama Canal Company.

Plainly, the Canal Zone cannot be considered as rented or leased from the Republic of Panama because only a portion of the land came from Panama in the first place. For our present purposes, we need not debate further the status of the portion of the land acquired directly from the Republic of Panama. We can set aside those tracts as not being vital to the article IV, section 3 issue. For if we can show that if even some of the property is indisputably property of the United States, then the House of Representatives must be involved in what we do here. And I intend to show that most of the land was obtained from private owners in fee simple. Thus, even those who do not agree that the lands obtained from Panama are held by perfect title must perforce agree that the great majority of the lands are property of the United States, held in fee simple.

Mr. President, I must ask the Senate to bear with me while I discuss this matter in some detail. It is a matter of such overwhelming importance that the record must be clear.

III. THE SOURCES OF U.S. LAND RIGHTS

Mr. President, what are the general sources of U.S. rights in land in the Canal Zone?

Article II of the 1903 treaty "grants the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation and control of a zone of land and land under water" 10 miles wide across the Isthmus of Panama for canal purposes, and further grants to the United States any other lands in Panama "which my be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation and protection of the canal."

Article III grants to the United States "all the rights, power and authority within the zone * * * which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power or authority."

Article VI safeguards "the titles or rights of private land holders or owners of private property in the said zone" or other lands or waters granted to the United States under the treaty; it further provides that if there is conflict between private rights and those granted to the United States by the treaty, "the rights of the United States shall be superior" and provides for payment by the United States of all damages to owners of private lands or private property, as determined by a joint commission appointed by the Governments of the two countries.

In article VIII, the Republic of Panama grants to the United States all its rights in the New Panama Canal Company and the Panama Railroad Company, and authorizes the New Panama Canal Company to sell all its "rights, privileges, properties and concessions as well as the Panama Railroad" to the United States; but certain public lands included in the said concessions, but not located within the zone were, however, to revert to Panama.

Two other articles add to the breadth and finality of the grants to the United States. In article XXII Panama expressly renounces "all right, claim, and title to participation in the earnings of the canal and railroad." In that 1906 treaty Panama further renounces, confirms, and grants to the United States, now and hereafter, "all of the rights and property formerly conceded to or made over to the new Panama Canal Company, together with all rights, title and interest which it now has or may hereafter have, in and to the lands, canal, works, property and rights held by the said companies under said concessions or otherwise, and acquired or to be acquired by the United States from or through the New Panama Canal Company."

The same article contains a very important paragraph:

> The aforesaid rights and property shall be and are free and released from any present or reversionary interest or claims of Panama and the title of the United States thereto upon consummation of the contemplated purchase by the United States from the New Panama Canal Company, shall be absolute, so far as concerns the Republic of Panama, excepting always the rights of the Republic specifically assured under this treaty.

Article XXIV binds Panama even more firmly into the perpetuity of the cession:

No change either in the Government of the laws and treaties of the Republic of Panama shall, without the consent of the United States, affect any right of the United States under the present convention, or under any treaty stipulation between the two countries that now exists or may hereafter exist touching the subject matter of this convention.

If the Republic of Panama shall hereafter enter as a constituent into any other Government or into any union or confederation, the rights of the United States under this convention shall not be in any respect lessened or impaired.

Mr. President, these provisions of the 1903 treaty became effective on February 26, 1904, and by its terms the United States immediately acquired perpetual "use, occupation and control" of all vacant public lands in the Canal Zone. The remainder of the zone remained for the time being in private hands, although it was subject to expropriation by the United States if needed for canal purposes.

Part of the private holdings were lands the New Panama Canal Company and its subsidiary, the Panama Railroad Company, acquired by purchase from private interests or, in the case of the Railroad Company, cession from Colombia. The United States paid the New Panama Canal Company $40 million for all its rights and properties in Panama, including its controlling stock interest in the Panama Railroad Company, and took possession of the properties of both enterprises located in Panama on May 4, 1904. (In 1905 the United States bought up all the remaining shares of the Railroad Company's stock.) By this purchase, of course, the United States acquired some of the private lands within the zone.

The first annual report of the Governor of the Canal Zone, dated November 1, 1904, gave the area of the Canal Zone at "about 448 square miles," broken down by ownership as follows:

New Canal Company 52.11 sq. miles, Panama Railroad Company 68.12 sq. miles, private owners 139.23 sq. miles, United States (by treaty) 188.91 sq. miles, for a total of 448.37 sq. miles.

It was noted that the Panama Railroad Company also owned 12.87 square miles of land outside the Canal Zone. The Governor's report, interestingly enough, also reveals that from the earliest days lands of the French canal company, the railroad company, and public lands ceded by Panama were all considered "available for the location of the canal," and that some of the boundary lines of canal and lands were indefinite and the subject of controversy where such lands abutted in private property.

Between 1904 and the end of 1912, the United States acquired approximately 2,364 hectares of private land in the zone for construction and other canal purposes. During this period the excavation of the canal was virtually completed, massive fills were laid down to form Gatun Dam, and the waters of the Chagres River began to accumulate in Gatun Lake, and, in the process, to flood lands outside the zone which then, of necessity, had to be included within the zone. In May 1912, the United States requested and Panama agreed to give up about 70 square miles of land in the bed of Lake Gatun and up to the 100-foot line above sea level on its shores.

Also during this period, a provisional agreement was made with Panama as to the boundaries of the zone, which also defined the limits of Colon and Panama, put Cristobal and Balboa and their harbors in the zone. The center line of the canal was fixed, and, based thereon, surveys were made and the exact boundaries of the zone marked by monuments. Due to these accomplishments, and early efforts of the Isthmian Canal Commission at land management, more accurate information as to the extent of U.S. land holdings in the zone was accumulated.

In October 1911, during hearings of a Senate committee on the bill which became the Panama Canal Act, the General Counsel of the Isthmian Canal Commission, Frank Feuille, gave a summary of U.S. land holdings in the Canal Zone. These figures differed somewhat from the earlier accounting.

	Square miles
Acquired from New Canal Company	101.0
Panama railroad property	103.7
Recognized private holdings	82.7
United States by treaty	148.3
Total	435.7

It should be noted, of course, that the final boundaries had not yet been set, that construction was in progress, and that the very concept of the canal had changed from a sea-level canal to a lock canal, requiring more land than had originally been anticipated. Although the treaty granted "land and land under water," no distinction was made in the above accounting.

In 1912, the Panama Canal Act was passed, section 3 of which authorized the President "to declare by Executive order that all the land and land under water within the limits of the Canal Zone is necessary for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, or protection of the Panama Canal, and to extinguish, by agreement when advisable, all claims and titles of adverse claimants and occupants." Such an order was duly issued: Executive Order 1225, December 5, 1912 and carried out by a joint commission, with two members appointed by the United States and two by Panama, appointed on March 1, 1913, under authority of articles VI and XV of the 1903 treaty to settle all claims arising out of "depopulation" of the zone. The effect of this order and its implementation by the joint commission was to take all the remaining private holdings in the zone for the United States.

In later years, other tracts were obtained by eminent domain enlarging the zone, as additional lands were needed for canal purposes. These included land for Madden Dam and Madden Lake.

However, all expropriations ceased after the United States in article II of the general treaty of friendship and cooperation of 1936 renounced its expropriation authority. The same article provided for agreement between the two countires on any necessary land acquisitions. There have been minor adjustments, but no significant changes since that time.

In addition, it should be noted that some usable land was created by filling marshy areas and extending shore lines with materials excavated from the canal bed, a continuous process over the years. However, such operations make no difference as to land rights, as the sites were also acquired in the same manner as other tracts in the zone.

The 1976 annual report of the Panama Canal Company gives an analysis of the land and water areas of the Canal Zone, broken down according to use. The present use bears no relationship to the original acquisition rights. The disproportionately high use by the Army is misleading; probably less than a third of the land reserved for the Army is actually used, except for occasional training exercises. The Army's role is mainly custodial, to prevent uses which would have a damaging environmental impact. The protection of the jungle canopy and vegetation on the mountains is essential to the operations of the canal, since adequate rainfall and the prevention of erosion are among the highest priorities. The jungle cover, for example, is believed to be responsible for the fact that the zone receives 20 percent more rainfall for lockage purposes in the dry season. In the 1964 annual report, the Army and Air Force usage figures were 107.62 square miles and 10.75 square miles, respectively; another category of remaining usable land—largely mountain or jungle—contained 187.56 square miles. The 1976 figures are as follows:

Area of the Canal Zone

	Square miles
Land area of the Canal Zone	372.32
Water area of the Canal Zone	*274.97
Total area	647.29
LAND AREAS
Air Force reservations and licenses	49.19
Army reservations and licenses	264.17
Federal Aviation Administration	0.66
Naval reservations and licenses	10.15
Total	324.17
Canal Zone townsites and areas outside of townsites in active use	16.59
Miscellaneous assigned land areas:
Barro Colorado Island	5.71
Madden Forest Preserve	5.38
Agricultural leases and garden plots	0.83
Total	11.92
Swamps	15.14
Remaining usable land	4.50

IV. THE NATURE OF TITLES CONVEYED FROM PRIVATE OWNERS

Mr. President, when we consider the acquisition of U.S. title to the lands in the Canal Zone, we must go back to 1850, when U.S. interests began construction of the Panama Railroad. At that time the great bulk of the land was vacant public land, with title resting in the sovereign, New Grenada, as the country was then called. Homesteading and other forms of land settlement, such as colonization of large tracts, were encouraged; over the years an appreciable amount of land was occupied and some form of title was acquired by the occupants. Those who complied fully with the land settlement laws were granted "dominion" of fee simple title in a comparatively short time.

Others who did not comply with such laws were nevertheless able to build up "custom-made" titles, or titles by prescription. Colombian law provided that title by prescription could be acquired in either 10 or 30 years, the shorter term apparently being sufficient when adverse possession was accompanied by color of title and good faith. In still other cases, the occupants of land could claim no more than squatters' rights.

When the Isthmian Canal Commission surveyed the land title situation in 1910, the same relative conditions prevailed. In testimony before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the General Counsel for the Commission declared:

The private titles in the Canal Zone, with a few exceptions—not over half a dozen exceptions—I am not including the French Canal Company, or the United States or the Panama Railroad Company, when I say private titles—the private titles, with about a half dozen exceptions, are custom-made titles. They are based upon long occupancy and transfer from one man to another by descent. Practically there are no grants from the Government to these private holders that we have seen. If any grants were issued in any case, it has been so long ago that there is no record of them, but these holdings have been acquiesced in by everybody. The authorities have been paid taxes on these lands and in other ways they have recognized the titles by implication. The French Canal Company made large purchases from these people years ago, and so had the Panama Railroad Company, and so has the United States. The joint commissions we have had in here have recognized these titles in one way or another. The treaty protects landowners and landholders, and the joint commissions have held that if the people were not landowners they were at least landholders, because there had been a tacit recognition of their holdings by the community in general, and therefore, we should not disturb that status.

When one considers the remoteness and the primitiveness of the jungle and mountain terrain, it is not surprising that perfect records and exact standards of legal practice are not to be found. Yet it is clear—very clear—that the private titles were regarded as sound both by the Colombian and Panamanian Governments at the time of the 1903 treaty.

Mr. President, let us turn now to the rights in land acquired by the United States from the Panama Railroad Company.

The Railroad Company's 1850 concession provided in effect that the Company should have the use or "usufruct" of all lands on the continental part of the Isthmus of Panama required for railroad purposes. The usufruct of those lands then owned by the Republic of New Grenada passed to the Company by terms of the concession; but any privately owned lands needed by the railroad and which could not be obtained by purchase had to be expropriated for the Company by the government in accordance with law. The usufructuary grants were valid for the term of the concession, which was to run for 99 years from August 16, 1867.

The Company was, in addition, granted full title to 150,000 acres of vacant public land by the Colombian Government in 1866. Also, the Company purchased from private owners the fee title to substantial areas of land in the Isthmus of Panama which later became part of the Canal Zone.

Thus, clearly, the Panama Railroad Company obtained two kinds of significant rights in land: The usufruct of public lands terminable on the expiration of the concession on August 16, 1966, and fee titles, some by grant from Colombia, and some by purchase from private owners. With the Panamanian revolution, the treaty of 1903, and the purchase of the Panama Railroad Company by the United States, these two kinds of land rights merged into fee holdings. That process must now be traced.

As pointed out before, the only lands conveyed by the action of the treaty itself were the public lands of Panama. In article II, the property rights of private landowners and landholders were expressly reserved. This latter category embraced all the real property rights, including the usufructuary rights, under their respective concessions, of the Panama Railroad Company and the New Panama Canal Company, both of which, of course, were private entities.

At the time when the 1903 treaty came into force—the date being February 26, 1904—the United States had not yet acquired the concessions and other assets of the New Panama Canal Company. However, the treaty anticipated this event; in article VIII, Panama granted to the United States "all rights which it now has or may hereafter acquire to the property of the New Panama Canal Company and the Panama Railroad Company" and authorized the New Panama Canal Company, to "sell and transfer to the United States its rights, privileges, properties, and concessions," including the Panama Railroad Company.

It is important to understand that the Republic of Panama expressly renounced any claim it might have on these concessions; as originally consummated with Colombia, the rights were for a limited time and reversionary; under the 1903 treaty, they were perpetual, with no reversionary interest whatsoever. Thus the idea that Panama has some residual ownership, as claimed by the Department of State recently is totally fallacious; in fact it is absurd.

The exact text of article XXII is important:

The Republic of Panama renounces and grants to the United States the participation to which it might be entitled in the future earnings of the Canal under Article XV of the concessionary contract with Lucien N. B. Wyse now owned by the New Panama Canal Company and any and all other rights or claims of a pecuniary nature arising under or relating to said concession, or arising under or relating to the concessions to the Panama Railroad Company or any extension or modification thereof; and it likewise renounces, confirms and grants to the United States, now and hereafter, all the rights and property reserved in the said concessions granted to or held by the above mentioned party and companies, and all right, title, and interest which it now has or may hereafter have, in and to the lands, canal, works, property and rights held by the said companies under said concessions or otherwise, and acquired or to be acquired by the United States from or through the New Panama Canal Company, including any property and rights which might or may in the future either by lapse of time, forfeiture or otherwise, revert to the Republic of Panama under any contracts or concessions, with said Wyse, the Universal Panama Canal Company, the Panama Railroad Company and the New Panama Canal Company.

Then it goes on, and this is important:

The aforesaid rights and property shall be and are free and released from any present or reversionary interest in or claims of Panama and the title of the United States thereto upon consummation of the contemplated purchase by the United States from the New Panama Canal Company, shall be absolute. . . .

So where do the proponents get off making a claim that we do not own this property?

The impact of a close reading of this article of the 1903 Treaty is startling when in the light of the negotiations and the treaties which are now before us. It shows clearly that Panama renounced any claim to future earnings of the canal, the very issue which is supposed to be one of the key issues leading to negotiation. But second, it shows that our title to the lands and concessions held by the French Canal Company and the Panama Railroad is "absolute".

Thus, if our title is absolute, which obviously it is, there can be no doubt in anyone's mind that such holdings are "property of the United States," and must be disposed of only in accordance with article IV, section 3 of the U.S. Constitution.

These provisions vested in the United States all the reversionary rights of the Republic of Panama in and to lands held by the Panama Railroad Company under its concession in the Canal Zone. Another way of looking at it is that the United States was substituted for Panama as the reversioner under the concessionary contracts held by the Railroad Company, and thus in effect became the proprietor of the lands concerned, effective February 26, 1904.

The United States purchased the assets of the New Panama Canal Company for $40 million on May 4, 1904. This included 68,888 of the 70,000 shares of the Panama Railroad Company stock; the remaining 1,112 shares were acquired by the United States in 1905. At this point, as far as the interests of the United States and Panama were concerned, there was a merger of the usufructuary and reversionary interests in the railroad concession land. Technically, however, the usufructuary rights of the Railroad Company remained unchanged, for they were the property of the Company. The Company remained a New York corporation, and thus a legal entity capable of owning property, even though its stock was wholly owned by the United States and for many purposes it was to be considered an agency of the United States. In 1945, however, the Government Corporation Control Act was passed, which prohibited the continued existence, after June 30, 1948, of any wholly owned Government corporation created by by or under the laws of any State.

Accordingly, the New York corporation was dissolved. In June 1948, title 2 of the Canal Zone Code was amended, setting up a Federal corporation known as the Panama Railroad Company, and directing it to take over the assets of the New York company. Section 251 of the Canal Zone Code provided that—

Effective upon the transfer of such assets and the assumption of such liabilities, there are hereby released and transferred to the corporation all the right, title, and interest, in and to such assets, which the United States now has or may hereafter acquire by virtue of the Convention of November 18, 1903, between the United States and the Republic of Panama; and specifically, there are hereby released to the corporation any and all reversionary rights of the United States in the lands of the corporation located in the cities of Panama and Colon, Republic of Panama.

As a result, after some 44 years there was a true merger of the usufructuary rights of the Railroad Company under its concession and the reversionary rights of the United States acquired by treaty from Panama. Although lands in the cities of Panama and Colon were mentioned specifically, the general language of transfer worked the same result as to the concessionary lands in the Canal Zone. Accordingly, as of July 1, 1948, the Panama Railroad Company became the proprietor of all lands in the zone, lands which it had formerly held as a usufructuary grant from the United States. In 1950, the Panama Canal Reorganization Act merged the Panama Canal Company and the Panama Railroad into one government corporation, combining their assets.

In 1943 and 1956, most of the railroad lands held in the cities of Panama and Colon were transferred to Panama, each passed under article IV, section 3. Within the zone, however, the Panama Railroad Company did not alienate any of the right of way land to which it acquired fee title in 1948, as I have already described. However, as a result of the 1906 act directing the construction of a lock canal, instead of a sea-level canal, it was necessary to relocate the right of way around the proposed Gatun Lake. About 80 percent of the line was relocated, with work completed in May 1912.

Most of the original right of way was abandoned and covered by the waters of Gatun Lake. Some of the abandoned right of way was owned in fee by the railroad, some was held only with usufructuary rights. The extent and description of the tracts abandoned is not known, as there was no practical need to distinguish between the rights of the Railroad and the reversionary rights of the United States. By the same token, no precise account can be given of the land upon which the new sections of the railroad were relocated.

The relocation of the line took place entirely within the zone. In 1912, the proprietors of land within the zone were the United States, the Panama Railroad Company, and various private persons and entities. The new right of way ran generally to the east of the old, on higher ground, and in the northern half of the zone clearly crossed land granted to the Railroad Company in fee under terms of the 1850 concession, as well as vacant land which had already been granted to the United States by the 1903 treaty. It is possible that the new tracks crossed land which the United States had already acquired in fee by purchase from the New Panama Canal Company or from local private owners. It is almost certain that the new tracks crossed lands in the zone which were still privately owned, making it necessary for the United States to acquire title to such lands by negotiated purchase under terms of articles VI and XV of the 1903 treaty. After 1912, when the zone was "depopulated," all private ownership of land terminated.

It is also important to point out that when the United States took possession of the Railroad Company, it acquired substantial areas of the zone held in fee, areas not necessarily used strictly for right of way. Some of these fee areas had been purchased from private owners through the medium of expropriation by the Colombian Government in accordance with the terms of the 1850 concession; for such tracts, the Company was obliged to pay "just indemnification" to the owners. But in 1866, Colombia also made a grant in fee of 150,000 acres, surveyed and plotted on what became known as the Harrison-Arosemena map. Six lots, comprising some 35,000 acres, were laid out along the railroad right of way, with the Company and the Colombian Government taking alternate lots, three apiece. The remainder of the grant to the Company, a single piece of land of about 115,000 acres lay to the east of and contiguous to the six lots.

The Canal Zone boundary lines were to be laid out with reference to the center line of the proposed canal, not with regard to the location of the railroad right of way or the land plotted on the Harrison-Arosemena map. As it happened, it appeared that about 100,000 acres of the Railroad Company's fee land would fall outside the Canal Zone—an important point because the 1903 Treaty provided that lands outside the Canal Zone would revert to Panama.

However, with the determination in 1906 that a lock canal would be constructed, the provisional boundaries of the Zone had to be enlarged by some 70 square miles to encompass the flooding of Lake Gatun. Most of this additional area was included in the 100,000 acres of fee land that originally appeared to be slated for reversion to Panama. Thus much of the land under Lake Gatun was held in fee.

The final boundaries of the Canal Zone were not fixed until the signing of the 1914 Boundary Convention on September 2, about 2 weeks after the canal opened for operations. The exchange of ratifications took place on February 11, 1915, a date which is probably the best date for the fixing of the U.S. titles.

Thus, the 15,000-acre portion of the large tract which fell within the provisional zone, as well as that portion of the 100,000 acres that was incorporated in the Zone when it was enlarged to include Gatun Lake remained a fee holding of the Railroad Company, and thus of the United States, along with three—lots 1, 4, and 6—of the six lots plotted on the Harrison-Arosemena map, also held in fee. The remaining three lots—about 17,000 acres—were public lands of Panama granted in accordance with article II.

In summary, therefore, the land rights which came to the United States through the Panama Railroad Company may be described as follows:

(a) None of the usufructuary rights granted by Colombia for railroad purposes remain as usufructuary grants; the usufructuary rights passed to the United States in 1903 and were converted into fee holdings in 1948.

(b) In addition to these fee holdings, the Panama Canal Company is the owner in fee of thousands of acres of land and land under water in the Zone, acquired by the Panama Railroad Company through grant from Colombia, and by direct purchase, or possibly expropriation by Colombia on behalf of the Railroad Company.

Finally, Mr. President, the last group of land rights that must be examined are the rights acquired directly from the so-called New Panama Canal Company—so-called because it was the successor to the first French company, which had gone bankrupt. These rights were acquired by purchase included in the $40 million price both for the assets of the canal company and its subsidiary, the Railroad Company.

The rights of the canal company, of course, did not extend as far back as the rights of the railroad company. The primary source of the rights in land of the New Panama Canal Company was the so-called Wyse concession of 1878.

Lucien Napoleon-Bonaparte Wyse was a lieutenant in the French Navy associated with a company of French private citizens which, in 1876, began active exploration of the American isthmus to determine the best route for a canal. In the course of two visits to the isthmus, Wyse became convinced that the Panama route was the best.

He therefore went to Bogota and on behalf of his company negotiated a contract with the Colombian Government for construction of a canal across the isthmus and "between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans." This agreement was signed by General Salgar, the Foreign Minister of Colombia, and Wyse, and therefore is sometimes called the Salgar-Wyse contract.

As indicated earlier, the concession granted the exclusive privilege of constructing the proposed canal and of operating it for a period of 99 years from the day on which the canal "shall be—opened to the use of the public." Three years were allowed for surveys, 2 for organization of the company, and 12 for construction, with the possibility of an extension of 6 years. All public lands required were to be "ceded gratis," such lands to revert to Colombia at the termination of the concession. There was "also granted for the use of the canal a belt of land 200 meters wide on each side of its banks," subject to the right of owners of land "on its banks" to have free access to the canal, its parts, and any roads constructed for canal purposes. Provision was made for expropriation of private property required for the canal, with suitable indemnities.

In 1881, as French interest in an Isthmian Canal mounted, the concession was purchased for 10 million francs by a new company called the Universal Interoceanic Canal Co., headed by Ferdinand de Lesseps. It was this concern, later called the "Old Panama Canal Company," which undertook the French effort to construct a canal across the Isthmus of Panama.

The canal route selected by the Old Company crossed the right-of-way of the Panama Railroad Company. This posed serious problems, because the railroad's concession gave it the right to bar use of its right-of-way for canal purposes. The canal company solved the dilemma by purchasing over 90 percent of the outstanding stock of the Railroad Company. In this way, the Old Company acquired effective ownership of the Railroad Company's rights in land.

As I have already pointed out, the usufruct granted to the Old Company for canal purposes covered all public lands required for the canal and necessary facilities—ports, wharves, warehouses, and so forth—and "a belt of land 200 meters wide on each side of its banks." The New Panama Canal Company succeeded to these rights. By the terms of articles VIII and XXII, as I have already discussed, the United States was substituted for Panama as the reversioner under the Salgar-Wyse concession. Incident to its purchase of the assets of the New Panama Canal Company on May 4, 1904, the United States acquired the usufructuary rights granted by the canal concession. Thus at this point, May 4, 1904, there was a merger of usufructuary and reversionary interests, and the United States acquired full ownership in fee of the "usufructuary" lands of the New Panama Canal Company; that is, the lands granted for canal purposes and the "belt of land 200 meters wide on each side of its banks."

These lands were never specifically located by the United States, since the need to do so was superseded by the terms of the 1903 treaty. Presumably much of it is covered by Gatun Lake. However, it again amounts to thousands of acres that the United States holds in fee simple, and the metes and bounds could be located by reference to old title records and surveys.

A provision similar to that in the railroad concession was included in the Salgar-Wyse contract for expropriation of privately owned lands by the Government on behalf of the canal company. According to Senate hearings held in 1911, the Old Company acquired a fee title to and a proprietary interest in the privately owned lands expropriated under this authority.

The records are not clear as to the extent to which the Old Company exercised this right, but it is clear that it was exercised. These titles in fee, of course, also devolved upon the United States.

In summary, the United States acquired from the New Panama Canal Company—excluding its subsidiary, the Panama Railroad Company—by terms of the 1903 treaty and purchase in accordance with the treaty, a substantial amount of land in fee in the Canal Zone. As I already pointed out, the first annual report of the Governor of the Canal Zone gave a figure of 52.11 square miles of "New Canal Company" land, whereas the figure in 1911 was given as 101.00 square miles of land from the French company. Both figures are exclusive of Railroad Company land. The discrepancy may result from a failure to include land under water. In any case, the Governor's figures were admittedly provisional, and were "computed by scale on the map"; they were not the results of a survey.

Nevertheless, the issue is not the exact amount of land held in fee, but the positively established fact that a large proportion, the majority proportion, indeed, of the Canal Zone was not included in the grant of public lands from Panama. Even those who may have doubts about the status of the lands conveyed from Panama should have no problem recognizing that most of the land in the Canal Zone is land held in fee simple, and is property of the United States.

V. OPINION OF THE U.S. SUPREME COURT ON U.S. TITLE IN THE ZONE

Mr. President, I have gone on at some length to explain in the Record the sources and nature of United States land titles in the Canal Zone; but I have not yet referred to the central, indeed, the only case wherein the U.S. Supreme Court deals specifically with the question of U.S. title in the zone. Even though this case is frequently cited, I think that it bears reexamination in the light of the exhaustive history that I have reviewed today. I refer of course to Wilson against Shaw.

Although this decision was handed down in 1907, it shows an astonishing grasp of the realities in the zone, and is amply sustained by the detailed facts I have already cited. Nor has it in any way been modified or reversed.

The question of title was central to the action in the case. The appellant, a citizen of Illinois, claiming that he was a taxpayer to the U.S. Government, sought to restrain the Secretary of the Treasury from using public money to pay for the purchase of land, borrowing money, or otherwise issuing bonds or making payments under the Spooner Act of 1902, the act that authorized the acquisition of the Canal Zone. He complained that the zone was not acquired from Colombia, as the act required, and that its boundaries were inexact; he further asserted that Congress has no authority under the commerce clause to operate commercial canals and railroads.

The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice Brewer, brushed all of these arguments aside. Among the points raised were:

(1) Panama has seceded from the Republic of Colombia and established a new republic which has been recognized by other nations. This new republic has by treaty granted to the United States rights territorial and otherwise.

(2) The title to what may be called the Isthmian or Canal Zone, which at the date of the act was in the Republic of Colombia, passed by an act of secession to the newly formed Republic of Panama. The latter was recognized as a nation by the President. A treaty with it, ceding the Canal Zone, was duly ratified.

Clearly, Mr. President, we see that the dicta of the Court recognized that the Canal Zone was "ceded" to the United States.

(3) Another contention, in support of which plaintiff has presented a voluminous argument, is that the United States has no power to engage in the work of digging this canal. His first proposition is that the Canal Zone is no part of the territory of the United States, and that, therefore, the Government is powerless to do anything of the kind therein.

Mr. President, in response to this argument, Justice Brewer quotes the well-known articles II and III of the 1903 treaty,

(4) It is hypercritical to contend that the title of the United States is imperfect, and that the territory described does not belong to this Nation, because of the omission of some of the technical terms used in ordinary conveyances of real estate.

Mr. President, it is central to Mr. Justice Brewer's argument that our title, the U.S. title, is perfect; in short, that the "territory described" does indeed "belong to this Nation."

(5) Further, it is said that the boundaries of the zone are not described in the treaty; but the description is sufficient for identification, and it has been practically identified by the concurrent action of the two nations alone interested in the matter. The fact that there may possibly be in the future some dispute as to the exact boundary on either side is immaterial. Such disputes not infrequently attend conveyances of real estate or cessions of territory. Alaska was ceded to us forty years ago, but the boundary between it and the English possessions east was not settled until within the last two or three years. Yet no one ever doubted the title of this republic to Alaska.

Mr. President, in this quotation, Justice Brewer once more makes it clear that the zone involved "conveyances of real estate or cessions of territory." That is exactly what I have been talking about, Mr. President. I have attempted to demonstrate that the Canal Zone does indeed consist of "conveyances of real estate" in fee simple, and "cessions of territory."

Furthermore, Mr. President, it is striking that the Supreme Court compares our acquisition of the zone to our acquisition of Alaska. Many proponents of the treaty have ridiculed the idea that the acquisition of the Canal Zone can be compared to our acquisition of Alaska; yet it is not the opponents of the treaty who first made that comparison. It was none other than the U.S. Supreme Court itself that made the comparison of the Canal Zone to Alaska.

(6) Again, plaintiff contends that the Government has no power to engage anywhere in the work of constructing a railroad or canal. The decisions of this court are adverse to this contention. In California v. Pacific Railroad Company, it was said: "... But since in consequence of the expansion of the country, the multiplication of its products and the invention of railroads and locomotion by steam, land transportation has so vastly increased, a sounder consideration of the subject has prevailed and led to the conclusion that Congress has plenary power over the whole subject. Of course, the authority of Congress over the Territories of the United States and its power to grant franchises exercisable therein, are, and ever have been, undoubted. But the wider power was very freely exercised, and much to the general satisfaction, in the creation of the vast system of railroads connecting the East with the Pacific, traversing States as well as Territories, and employing the agency of state as well as Federal corporations."

Mr. President, this quotation shows that Mr. Justice Brewer, in invoking the powers of the commerce clause, caused the Canal Zone to be considered within the power of Congress to act within territories of the United States. Indeed, Mr. President, the Justice draws that specific conclusion himself:

(7) These authorities recognize the power of Congress to construct interstate highways. A fortiori, Congress would have like power within the territories and outside of state lines, for there the legislative power of Congress is limited only by the provisions of the Constitution, and cannot conflict with the reserved power of the States.

Mr. President, that is the point; that is the very heart of the argument that the Senate confronts today. The Congress has always acted under article IV, section 3 of the Constitution with regard to the Canal Zone. The Congress has always considered the Canal Zone as U.S. property and territory. And the Supreme Court of the United States has clearly agreed. The evidence of history, the evidence of legal authority, and the evidence of constitutional theory all combined to argue that only Congress—Congress, Mr. President, both Houses—must ask in the disposition of U.S. territory and property.

The Senate cannot escape its duty, Mr. President; whatever each of us may think about the merits of the treaty, there can be no dissent about our responsibility to allow the House of Representatives to act on the disposal of property. Our duty is clear, and we cannot escape it.

VISIT TO THE SENATE BY MEMBERS OF THE BRITISH PARLIAMENT

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HELMS. I am glad to yield to the able Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, today, we have been honored by the presence in the Senate and the Capitol of a group of visiting members of the British Parliament, who are participating with some of the Members of the Senate in an all-day discussion of issues of mutual interest to our two countries. Members of the British delegation will be meeting with Members of the House of Representatives on tomorrow. This is an association that we have maintained over the years. We had an excellent discussion today, participated in by a good many Members of the Senate, including Senator Javits, who, I see, is on his feet.

I ask unanimous consent that the Senate recess briefly, subject to call by the Chair, to give us an opportunity to meet with the members of the delegation. Before we do that, I yield briefly to Senator JAVITS.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I have only had a brief opportunity to meet with our British colleagues, but I welcome them on behalf of the minority, as I know that the leader and other Senators on the Republican side would wish me to do.

I have attended one of these meetings in Bermuda. I consider them very enlightening and very important. While it would be improper to speak about our relations with Britain, as compared with other nations in the world, in terms of any special relationship or any such patronizing idea, it is fair to say that we share a heritage, in culture and literature and history in the institutions of freedom, which is so illustrious and so noble that it is a special pleasure to welcome our colleagues from the British Isles.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEAHY). The Chair, in his capacity as Senator from Vermont, had the pleasure of being with the British parliamentarians this morning and this afternoon.

[Applause.]

RECESS

There being no objection, the Senate, at 4:20 p.m. recessed until 4:25 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. LEAHY).

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 3 minutes as in legislative session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 73—SUBMISSION OF A CONCURRENT RESOLUTION REGARDING IMPOSITION OF IMPORT FEES ON CRUDE OIL

Mr. DOLE (for himself, Mr. HATHAWAY, Mr. BROOKE, Mr. DURKIN, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. ROTH, Mr. McCLURE, and Mr. CHAFEE) submitted the following concurrent resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

S. CON. RES. 73

Whereas, the President of the United States has the power to impose a fee on imported oil,

Whereas, the fee, if imposed, would not significantly reduce our imports of crude oil,

Whereas, then import fees would raise $12 billion a year in revenue for the Federal Government.

Whereas, without reducing imports, an import fee on crude oil will result in new inflationary pressure on the economy of the United States,

Whereas, such a fee on oil would create severe regional impacts in areas where no substitute fuel is available,

Whereas, such a fee would present a clear signal to the OPEC cartel that the United States is prepared to pay an even higher price than the price for imported crude oil: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, by the Senate (House of Representatives, concurring) that it is the sense of the Congress of the United States that an import fee on imported oil should not be imposed by the President of the United States as a way to reduce imports of crude oil.

THE PROPOSED TARIFF ON IMPORTED OIL

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am submitting today a concurrent resolution that it is the sense of the Congress that the President should not impose oil import fees as a method to reduce oil imports.

I am joined by my distinguished colleagues, Senators BROOKE, HATHAWAY, DURKIN, MOYNIHAN, ROTH, McCLURE, and CHAFEE.

I understand there is a similar initiative taking place on the House side, being led there by the distinguished Member of the House, W. R. ARCHER.

Mr. President, there are a lot of rumors and a lot of reports about what the administration may do, and one is that the administration was considering imposing a $5 per barrel fee on imported oil. It appears that over the past week the administration has discussed the idea with several groups. It now seems likely that the President might actually impose such an import fee in order to pressure Congress on the crude oil equalization tax.

It seems to me, as one who has had an interest in this matter for many months that it is the wrong way to go. I thought at the time last October, when the idea was first floated by Secretary Schlesinger, it was a mistake. It was somewhat akin to efforts to, in effect, blackmail us on the Senate Finance Committee to accept the equalization tax.

IMPACTS UNKNOWN LAST OCTOBER

Mr. President, I have been interested in this concept since last October when the idea was first mentioned by Secretary Schlesinger. At that time it was thought to be just a get-tough tactic. It was, nevertheless, somewhat akin to blackmail and I acted to prevent such a hasty move by the administration. Back in October, it was obvious that there had been no credible analysis of the effects of an oil import fee. The administration did not know whether a $5 fee on import oil would result in decreased imports. Furthermore, the Department of Energy had no idea what the impact would be on the economy. The proposal was a knee-jerk reaction. It was an idea born of frustration, because the Finance Committee was in the process of dismantling the administration's energy tax program.

So an amendment was offered by the Senator from Kansas and others. We proposed an amendment to the energy tax bill which would prevent the President from imposing the import fees. The amendment was adopted by the Senate Finance Committee and was retained in the bill passed by the Senate. The amendment is now pending before the energy tax conference and I have every reason to believe, should there be an energy tax bill, that it will be enacted into law.

IMPACTS UNKNOWN LAST WEEK

When the idea for an import fee resurfaced last week, I contacted the Department of Energy to get the most recent analysis of the proposal. However, I was told the Department of Energy has not done any analysis. Upon further investigation, I learned that the management of the Department of Energy has never requested any such analysis from the economists and information specialists in their own agency on what it might do. My inquiry—that they look into the effects of the fee—was the first request that they had ever received. This means that during the entire 6-month period, while the Dole amendment was pending, the administration never bothered to prepare the factual basis to support the imposition of an oil import fee.

As of last week, the positive effect of an oil import fee was still unsubstantiated. The only new wrinkle was that the administration was preparing to cut a deal, to trade off a half-baked idea for a terrible idea. They now wanted to bargain away this import fee to get the crude oil equalization tax.

Mr. President, I will vote for any measure that will help solve this Nation's energy problem. On the other hand, I still refuse to be blackmailed. The crude oil equalization tax is one of the worst ideas that has ever been presented to the Congress.

I remind my colleagues that the Senate has already expressed its feelings about this tax. The full Senate rejected the tax package passed by the House by a vote of 74 to 14.

It seems to me that I can understand the pressures on the administration. But it seems to me we ought to realize what we are doing when we talk about that fee. We will subsidize imports, we will raise the price of oil, and we will also heat up inflation.

EFFECTS OF THE IMPORT FEE

Because the Department of Energy had not even looked into the effects of the import fee, I had my staff calculate the effects of the proposed fee, using some of the same information that is available in the Department of Energy.

Today, I am finally in a position to give my colleagues information that they cannot get from the Department of Energy. I now know the effects of the oil fees.

First of all, my colleagues should realize that even with the proposed fee, we will continue to subsidize imports. Let me remind you that all crude oil prices are now averaged together, so there is no way that an import fee can selectively make foreign oil less attractive. If foreign oil were subjected to a $5 fee, then the price of all crude purchased by refiners would go up about $2 per barrel. As long as we continue to subsidize imports, we can only expect that the fraction of imported oil will continue to rise.

Next we must ask how effective the higher price would be in decreasing our total imports of petroleum. The analysis shows two things. First, the decrease in imports will be insignificant. Second, the cost of that decrease will be astronomical.

Using numbers that are found in the Department of Energy's own models, we have calculated that the proposed fee will decrease imports by only 0.2 to 0.3 million barrels out of a total of 6.5 million barrels that we import each day.

To achieve that reduction in imports, the American people will pay $33 million each day. That comes out to $12 billion a year in extra revenues. At this point, it is fair to ask what the real effect of the fee would be. Is it meant to decrease imports or is it to create a significant new source of revenue?

We were able to determine that it will cost between $100 and $150 a barrel to save a barrel of oil. That is hardly, as we look at it, the way to proceed when we talk about the energy problem we have.

IMPORT FEE IS NOT COST-EFFECTIVE

The President has said that conservation is the cornerstone of his energy policy because it costs less to save a barrel of oil than to buy one.

Mr. President, using the numbers we have derived over the last week, we can now determine what it would cost to decrease imports using the proposed import fee. It turns out that this scheme costs between $100 and $150 per barrel to decrease imports. The import fee is very simply a bad idea.

How bad an idea is it? Well, compared to the crude oil equalization tax it is about two to three times as bad. Using figures derived by the joint tax committee, and substantiated by the administration, the COET would have cost us about $47 to save a barrel of oil.

Let me remind you again that we are talking about paying this much to save oil that only costs about $14 a barrel. Clearly, if we pursue either of these schemes, it costs a lot more to save a barrel of oil than to buy one.

THE IDEA WILL BACKFIRE

In addition, Mr. President, the proposed import fee on crude oil will have an effect that has not been widely considered. It will provide a situation where we will lose if it works and we will lose if it does not work.

The administration has spent the last year negotiating with the Shah of Iran and with the Saudis to convince them that it would be disastrous if the international price of oil were raised. At the last meeting of OPEC, these two countries worked hard to hold the line on prices. They succeeded, and the administration deserves credit for averting, or delaying, an increase in the OPEC price.

But now this same administration is proposing to do exactly what it begged OPEC not to do—raise the price of imported oil.

Try to put yourself in the position of an oil minister who sees the United States paying $5 a barrel more than he is getting for his own oil. The oil minister could logically ask why the U.S. Treasury is getting an extra $12 billion a year when he could just raise his price by $5, and transfer that money to his own treasury.

Do we really want to show OPEC that the American system is capable of getting along with a price hike of $5 a barrel?

A TAX BILL, NOT AN ENERGY BILL

Mr. President, the idea of an import fee is worse than the crude oil equalization tax. It is worse than the industrial users tax. It is the worst idea the administration has yet come up with under the banner of conservation.

If we are interested in finding out why the credibility of Government is slipping in this country we only have to realize how easy it is to see double purposes in nearly everything being proposed in the energy area. It is easy for the American people to ask: Are they really interested in solving the energy problem, or are they using the energy crisis as a means to impose more taxes and put more revenues into the Federal coffer?

If we look at the House-passed tax bill, we have a crude oil equalization tax that would collect $39 billion over its life. The users tax would collect another $25 billion. And now the American people are faced with a proposal that could collect $12 billion a year for as long as the President chooses to keep it in effect.

And in every case, the effect on our imports is negligible. It is needed fair to say that these are tax measures, not energy measures.

Moreover, if the major effect of these proposals is to increase prices, then they are almost purely inflationary measures. Chase econometrics predicts that the fee would raise the inflation rate by 1.5 percentage points. A new source of inflation and a new source of Government revenue are not what we need to solve our energy crisis.

ONLY HALF A SOLUTION

The problem with using taxes and fees to affect demand is that these mechanisms address only half the solution. Any economics book will tell you that demand goes down as prices go up. But the economics book will also tell you that higher prices serve to increase supplies. Yet, all these proposals by the administration are designed to provide absolutely no incentive to increase supplies while the prices go up. They accomplish this feat by holding the price down for the producers while raising the price for the consumers. I have yet to understand why the administration has consistently avoided any incentives for increasing production in this country.

It is true that at the present time this country has no comprehensive energy policy. The Carter administration has half an energy policy. They want to decrease demand in order to cut down imports, and that is where their policy stops. However, this leaves it up to the Congress to provide the other half of a comprehensive energy policy. Increased supplies are also a way to cut imports.

SOLUTIONS MUST BE ECONOMICALLY SOUND

Both conservation and increased supplies are important for a comprehensive energy policy. But we must take care to accomplish both conservation and increased supplies in a way that is economically sound. An import fee is ridiculous if it costs $150 to save a barrel of oil. It is entirely possible to save energy and save money at the same time. Reducing waste should result in lower costs for everybody. This is the kind of conservation that is based on sound economic principles.

The same is true of increasing supplies. It is counterproductive to offer the world price for newly discovered oil if it means we have to reduce the price of already discovered oil. It is ridiculous to subsidize syncrude that might cost $30 a barrel when we will not give a producer $15 a barrel of regular crude. It is even worse to subsidize the creation of a syncrude industry when we will not lease land on which a producer might find billions of barrels of regular crude.

There must be some underlying logic to how we go about increasing supplies. When the administration finally realizes the need for increased supplies, I sincerely hope that their methods for obtaining those supplies will be based on sound economic principles.

FACTS LEAD TO ONE CONCLUSION

Mr. President, I hope my colleagues will look at the facts that I have provided for them. If they do, I think they cannot help but come to the same conclusion as I have reached. The facts show that the proposed import fee has no place in a rational and economically sound energy policy.

Finally, I am still greatly disturbed that the administration did not even bother to find out whether or not the idea of an import fee made any sense. It leads one to wonder just what has been going on over at the Department of Energy for the last 6 months.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield back my time.

Mr. McGOVERN addressed the Chair.

S. 2819—SURFACE TRANSPORTATION ACT OF 1978

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference, the Surface Transportation Act of 1978. Beginning in the early 1800's our Nation pioneered and constructed several complex transportation networks. We have developed major air and water thoroughfares and have put men on the Moon. The successful completion of these systems have cost billions of dollars, while repairs and improvements have cost billions more. Some of these expenditures have been necessary investments to insure an efficient system. However, while spending heavily we have planned too little with regard to our surface transportation networks. Many times, expenditures have been made in a crisis atmosphere without careful planning to resolve basic issues. The result is a vast system in varying stages of decline and disrepair, instead of an energy efficient surface transportation system for passengers and freight.

We can no longer afford a policy of extravagance in the new age of high-cost energy. We cannot allow the continued decline of our potentially most energy efficient modes of transportation. Unfortunately, our vast network of railroads and intercity buses, both highly efficient transportation modes are in serious trouble. Several major railroads have filed bankruptcy and poor track conditions and rolling stock shortages are prevalent throughout the system. The bus industry is facing economic conditions not unlike those experienced by the bankrupt railroads in the Northeast.

A comprehensive surface transportation program has become essential to address the disastrous condition of our railroads and the declining nature of our intercity buses while providing numerous employment opportunities to the millions of our Nation's unemployed. The traditional approach for providing assistance to troubled transportation systems has been through Federal subsidies developed in reaction to a specific crisis. However, mere subsidies cannot resolve our domestic transportation problems and the related energy and unemployment issues. In and of themselves, subsidies may actually encourage inefficiency as they provide no incentives for internal improvements. While this bill proposes increased Federal assistance, a sizeable portion of the aid will take the form of long-term loans coordinated with extensive planning and management efforts in order to tailor assistance to the specific needs of individual carriers.

RAILROADS

Commercial domestic transportation modes have received a variety of Federal assistance since the inception of our Nation. Without such assistance, some of these modes would not have survived. Recently, as Federal capital and operating assistance for urban mass transportation has increased the appropriate direction of future assistance has become the subject of considerable debate. Past investments must be reviewed as our national transportation requirements and objectives change over time. The need to consume energy through energy efficient transportation is a challenge to revitalize rail transportation, potentially our most efficient means of freight transport.

Federal aid programs for railroads have long generated substantial controversies. Opponents of new Government participation in the rail industry must be reminded of the heavy Federal investments which allowed initial rail development. Under the 19th century policy of stimulating internal growth by virtually giving away portions of the public domain, railroads received sizable amounts of land. While land grants were made to other transportation modes, the railroads amassed the major accumulations of land under this policy.

Essentially, in the early 1800's, railroads were perceived as an important economic stimulus to the advancing settlement and development of the Nation. Several States initiated programs to develop State railroads by publicly financing the construction of lines. Eventually, the Federal Government was persuaded to assume the major role in rail financing and construction when several State and private attempts resulted in bankruptcy and abandonment. At that time, the Federal Government owned approximately three-fourths of the total land area in the continental United States.

Although the concept of granting land directly to the railroad companies was a subject of controversy during the mid–1800's, Congress began granting large parcels of land to States to be used for internal developments at the States' discretion. While some States used the proceeds from the sale of lands for bridge development, canals, and swamp drainage programs, the majority used all or a sizable portion of their 500,000-acre allotments to aid railroad development in their States. Through this process, States received a total of 7,806,555 acres. During the mid 1800's, Congress began moving toward granting land specifically to and railroad development. The Illinois Central Grant, approved in 1805, was the first such grant approved; it established a pattern for grants awarded during the next two decades. Such grants provided that for every 6 miles of railroad constructed, the Government granted 6 square miles of additional land on either side of the road bed. The program contained three major objectives: (a) to provide a free right of way for the construction of railroads; (b) to provide construction money through the proceeds of the sale of additional lands; and (c) to provide railroads with needed credit for the financing of future developments.

By the late 1860's railroad development in the East and Middle Atlantic States had advanced considerably. The Federal Government was receiving substantial pressure to develop a transcontinental railroad. As no Western States existed through which grants could be made and the territories were too unorganized to facilitate such a process, the Government initiated the procedure of awarding grants directly to the railroad companies to foster development of the western railroads. During the following two decades, until 1880, the railroads amassed more than 130 million acres of land. The Chicago Northwestern and the Burlington Northern which operate track in my State of South Dakota collectively received over 47 million acres of this land. However, by 1880, public sentiments had risen against the railroad monopoly and vast land acquisitions and the direct grant process was halted. Land awarded to railways by States and the Federal Government is now valued at nearly half a billion dollars. By 1940, there were about 17,500 miles of Federal land grant railroad in this country. Concurrent with the land grant programs, Congress also granted land separately for rail right of ways. Eminent domain claims were authorized in legislation passed in 1852 and 1875.

At the end of the 19th century, railroads had become the chief method of long distance travel for both freight and passengers. In 1887, the Interstate Commerce Commission was established to set rail rates and monitor the practices of the industry. During the 20th century, Federal aid to railroads shifted from land grants and rights of way to lending programs, loan guarantees, and subsidy programs. The impact of Federal takeover of the railroads during World War I has been a subject of much dispute. Critics believe that Government operation of railways prevented rate increases which would have alleviated the financial dilemma of the rail industry at that time. However, many assert that the financial problems of the industry were prevalent before the takeover occurred and that financial programs were eased at this time through a series of loan programs.

During the 1920's and the 1930's, the industry suffered from the depression and growing competition of trucks and barges. Congress reacted to the severe financial plight of the railroads by developing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation which made sizable loans to 98 railroads. Defaults on principal and interest by a number of rail companies cost the Government $23 million before this effort ended in 1952. Trying to resolve further ongoing financial problems of the industry, the Transportation Act of 1958 was developed authorizing over $500 million in federally guaranteed loans before the end of this program in 1963.

During the 1960's, our nation experienced a changing economy; one that did not bode well for the railroads. Overall rail operating ratio fluctuated markedly throughout the decade. With both interest and rentals rising steeply in the latter half of the 1960's railroad earnings declined. Cash flow declined as dividends exceeded net income and consumed more than 40 percent of the cash flow by 1970. The consolidated impact of these and other factors was to reduce the net working capital of the class I railroads by more than $500 million between 1965 and 1970. Concurrently, in 1970, the Penn Central, the largest railroad in the Northeast went bankrupt partly due to irresponsible management. Despite attempted reorganization, operating deficits during receivership were so large that the Federal district court threatened liquidation if Government support was not forthcoming. Consequently, in 1973, the Regional Rail Reorganization Act established a Government agency, the Consolidated Rail Corporation (ConRail), to consolidate and operate the bankrupt Northeast railroads. Although the legislation intended that ConRail be operated for profit, it has not been profitable and will most likely require additional federal transfusions to maintain current operations.

Reacting to the continued deterioration of the national rail system, Congress, in 1976, passed the Railroad Revitalization and Regulatory Reform Act (4–R Act. This legislation was designed to lend money to railroads to provide for the rebuilding of track and acquire new rolling stock. As the financial problems of the Eastern railroads spread to the Midwest, several weakened members of the industry looked to the 4–R Act for major assistance. Curiously, railroads in the most difficulty have received little or nothing while healthier lines have received substantial sums. Consequently, those lines in the worst financial condition have either declared bankruptcy, as the Milwaukee has recently done, or have remained on a financal precipice in anticipation of possible mergers. While a new wave of mergers of parallel railroads was once expected in the Midwest as a possible solution, this is no longer the case. The existing mergers are not bringing about the savings they theoretically should and several lines are in such financial disaster, that they are no longer considered likely merger candidates.

It seems clear that recent Federal rail legislation, although well intentioned was developed in haste to avert crippling emergency situations. As a result, we have developed patchwork fragmented programs benefiting a few rail carriers while exacerbating the financial plight of others.

Nationally, we have continued to experience further deterioration of track beds resulting in dramatically increased derailments. In 1977, the Nation experienced 7,934 derailments. The railroads are receiving less and less of a rate of return while freight rates have increased 14 percent over the past 18 months. We are continuing to see increasing numbers of line abandonments as well as the worst rolling stock shortage in the history of the industry. In South Dakota, 30 percent of all railroad mileage ever constructed has already been approved for abandonment. In addition, approximately 50 percent of all existing rail miles are potentially subject to abandonment within just a few years. South Dakota and several other grain States have experienced the brunt of rail cars shortage as substantial grain shipments have been delayed by more than 2 months. The practice of deferred maintenance has dealt an extreme blow to South Dakota and other States.

This extensive practice has resulted in mile after mile of light rail with rotted ties and wooden structures weakened by age, resulting in increased derailments, greatly reduced speeds and irregular service. In fact, South Dakota has experienced derailments when the cars were standing still. It has become more than obvious that the present framework of rail legislation and assistance will not resolve the rail dilemma. However, action must be taken now to halt the increasing line abandonments. In many rural States including South Dakota, a considerable portion of the rail traffic has shifted to the highways. This increasing shift causes great concern in these areas where highways were not designed to accommodate heavy truck traffic. The shift of traffic in South Dakota is projected to increase costly highway maintenance programs and eventually necessitate the reconstruction of many routes. Projections in South Dakota indicate that the cost of rebuilding a mile of rail bed is substantially less than rebuilding a mile of highway.

The search for appropriate Federal responses to the rail dilemma must encompass such elements as a changing economy and public needs and the concerns of rail labor and management. Such responses must be flexible and long term avoiding the hasty patchwork pattern of the past that has served only to postpone the collapse of our rail system in a series of emergency actions. My bill addresses several specific problems facing the rail industry and users today with a built-in flexibility to tailor assistance to individual needs.

As mentioned earlier, rolling stock shortages present a critical problem to the industry and its users. The industry's past history and unreliability to produce cars when needed and to make scheduled shipments prevents many potential users from taking advantage of this transportation mode. This bill establishes a regional reserve system of rolling stock. Based on regions' need for seasonal, specialized or high volume loads, reserves of rolling stock shall be established to be leased to operating rail carriers. However, increased supplies of rolling stock alone will not resolve the traditional problems of obtaining cars for many kinds of shipments. Efficient utilization of the stock is a closely related problem; an adequate number of cars will not increase reliability if the carrier cannot effect timely turnarounds on shipments. Therefore, in conjunction with the regional reserve system, a computerized car identification plan is proposed to monitor the location, use and respective load factors of the rolling stock in the regional reserve system. Additionally, an incentive program will be developed to benefit those carriers which utilize the system in an efficient manner.

In addition to the regional reserve program, regional repair yards shall be established to conduct normal maintenance and repair work on the reserve rolling stock and, time and labor permitting, to do contract work on private carrier stock.

These programs should provide considerable assistance to the railroads in achieving the credibility and reliability necessary to increase existing markets and expand into new markets, while providing an energy efficient means of transportation. For example, rail carriers have encountered considerable difficulty competing with other transportation for the shipment of manufactured goods. While rail transportation of such goods would be considerably more efficient than other transportation modes, a large portion of the industry's problem in entering the market has been their lack of the expensive trailer on flat cars used for such shipments, while increasing delays in existing shipments due to car availability and repair problems have reduced the carriers' reliability. Consequently, while rail shipments of manufactured goods is potentially the most energy efficient means of transportation, the manufacturers continue to give the bulk of their business to more reliable modes.

A more critical dilemma addressed by this bill is the deterioration of railway beds and the subsequent abandonment of rail operations. While the creation of rolling stock reserves and regional repair yards would theoretically improve car utilization, efficiency and service, such improvements would be impossible without sound trackbeds. The present condition of thousands of miles of track warrant greatly reduced speeds and cause thousands of derailments annually.

Rebuilding and upgrading of our existing railroads must be the centerpiece of any attempt to revitalize the rail system.

Presently, existing legislation authorizes various public and private entities to take over certain lines that have been approved for abandonment. This proposal essentially establishes a pre-abandonment mechanism, whereby States having lines which carriers may seek to abandon may elect to take over such lines. The argument here is that by waiting for actual abandonment before rescuing a given line, trackbed and service has deteriorated to such an extent that rail users will have taken their business elsewhere, disrupting local and regional economies. This mechanism will allow States to conduct feasibility studies to determine the critical nature of certain lines. Based on the feasibility study, the State may apply for a long term 2-percent loan to cover 90 percent of the cost of upgrading the line. The State shall then assume ownership of the line, upgrade it and lease the line back to the operating rail carriers on a per ton mile traveled basis. Revenues generated by the leasing program shall be used to pay for all normal line maintenace, subsidize a portion of the States' leasing program with all excess revenues to pay back the loan.

INTERCITY BUSES

The intercity bus industry has experienced a serious decline in recent years similar to that experienced by the railroads. The causes of this decline exist in several underlying social, economic, and politcal trends in our economy over which the bus industry has little or no control. His unemployment and increasing rates of inflation have had a particularly adverse impact on individuals who make up the great bulk of the bus travel market. Over 60 percent of all bus passengers have annual family incomes of less than $10,000. With the deterioration of the inner city in large urban areas, existing bus stations are becoming obsolete. The industry's efforts to move these facilities to more favorable locations or to renovate them have been hampered in recent years because of inadequate profits and cash flow. During 1976, regular intercity route service provided transportation to 230 million persons compared with 330 million in 1966, representing a decline of 30 percent.

With the economic trends of the past several years, and its contribution to the decline of the bus industry, it has become apparent that the industry can no longer provide many essential services in rural areas without some comprehensive assistance. Disruption of this essential service could result in a major economic dislocation in thousands of small communities as well as for the bus industry. Currently, these buses are the only form of intercity transportation available in over 14,000 communities in this country. Reduced service has already occurred in many of these communities as the industry attempts to consolidate some services in order to reduce deficits. The profitable charter and package freight businesses are simply not large enough to offset the adverse effects of a declining volume on regular route service. Concurrently, profits are dropping on longer haul, higher density routes, typically subject to competition from subsidized modes, and they are no longer sufficient to offset or subsidize losses on the less dense rural routes.

Over the past several years, national surface transportation policy has become tilted in favor of rail passenger service. It is especially unfair that the Federal Government should extensively subsidize this service and expect privately owned bus carriers to compete on routes where parallel service is provided. Decreasing profits on bus routes where competing modes are subsidized is an important factor in the decline of industry earnings. In 1966, the industry had an operating ratio of 86.1 and earned $103 million before taxes. In 1976, the industry earned only $52 million before taxes with an operation ratio of 95.8.

The declining trend, which has gained speed within the last years, is leading to disaster. If it continues, as many project it will, the industry could sustain widespread losses. Many of the smaller carriers providing a major portion of the essential rural and small communities service could become bankrupt similar in nature to the bankruptcies experienced by some of the smaller railroads several years ago. When this occurs, many communities and rural areas will face serious service reductions if not total elimination of service. Several regional and intrastate carriers have already declared bankruptcy, leaving communities with no intercity transportation services. Intercity bus service in South Dakota has recently faced some degree of service reduction. Over the last few years, South Dakota has experienced decreasing frequency of service on some major routes; and in the last 3 years, two intrastate carriers have gone out of business leaving several portions of the State with no intercity transportation.

The millions of people to be affected by widespread service disruptions are those who in most cases must rely solely on the common carrier for intercity travel. Those people are typically those least able to utilize any alternative service.

This bill directly addresses the serious and immediate nature of this dilemma in an attempt to offset an impending disaster. Equally important, this bill will provide for a highly energy efficient transportation mode and by improving service, generate additional passengers who historically have traveled by other means. Of all modes of surface transportation, intercity buses have the highest passenger miles per gallon ratio, currently averaging 116 miles per gallon compared with 55.5 passenger miles per gallon for AMTRAK and 20 passenger miles for air travel.

In order that programs necessary to the continuance of small communities and rural bus service be developed and carried out in an effective manner, I am proposing the establishment of a Federal bus administration. While a variety of offices have been created to resolve issues related to railroads, highways, and other transportation modes, this mode has been sorely neglected in this respect. Currently, there exists no single office established whose overall responsibility is to deal with the issues surrounding intercity bus transportation. Considering the efficiency of this mode and vast numbers of passengers carried annually, I believe this office will be a necessary vehicle to develop bus policy and oversee changes and improvements throughout the industry. The responsibilities of the bus administration shall be funded by a new motor carrier bus trust fund. Direct appropriations of $125 million annually shall be transferred into the bus trust fund from the general revenues. Fifty million dollars shall be directed toward an assistance program for Federal aid for the construction and renovation of bus terminals. Local and State governments, upon indicating a need for such terminals may make application for Federal grants for 80 percent of the total cost with local, State, or private entities participating in the remaining cost of the program.

Federal assistance has become especially crucial in the area of rural bus transportation service. This bill shall authorize States, subject to the approval of the Secretary of Transportation, to enter into contracts to provide common carrier feeder route service. A total of $70 million from the bus trust fund shall be allocated for the development of State bus plans. State plans shall be developed in consultation with local governments and the motor bus carriers serving the State and shall include proposals for streamlining primary carrier service and developing feeder bus routes to serve the primary system. Upon approval of the plan, States may enter negotiations to designate operators for feeder routes, giving carriers holding service authority on existing routes the initial option to provide service. Upon negotiation of the feeder routes, operators and rates, the Secretary shall authorize a contract allowing operators a long-term 2-percent loan to cover the cost of equipment and initial operations or the option of entering into a lease agreement for necessary equipment. All equipment and operations of feeder routes shall be subject to minimum standard requirements established by the Bus Administration.

Additionally, feeder route operators shall provide substantially reduced fares for those passengers who are handicapped and over the age of 65. Feeder route operators may, in addition to their scheduled service, undertake charter operations within the limits of their route authority. The development of feeder route authority and service shall protect the needs of small communities and rural areas from anticipated service disruptions and eliminations by the bus industry while allowing full size carriers to streamline their routes thereby reducing travel time and increasing efficiency.

A total of $5 million annually shall be allocated for the administration of the Federal Bus Administration. One of the primary initial responsibilities of the Administration shall be to develop a national motor bus carrier policy and route plan in conjunction with the streamlining of class 1 carrier service as developed in the State plans. The Administration shall oversee the development of the feeder routes and the integration of the streamlined class 1 carrier service among the States.

EMPLOYMENT

In 1933, the Civilian Conservation Corps was established as a novel Government approach to deal with massive youth unemployment. Essentially, this program, part of Roosevelt's New Deal, trained and provided jobs for more than 2.5 million youths. The New Deal, indeed, embraced a wide range of public works and public service programs that created jobs for millions of the Nation's unemployed. Since that time, the Federal Government has developed several national programs and policies in response to the recurring unemployment dilemma. In 1973, Congress passed the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act (CETA) in response to the severe economic strain caused by climbing rates of inflation and unemployment. Portions of this act have been amended several times as our changing economy dictates employment fluctuations and altered forms of assistance; new amendments to the act are now pending in Congress. Additionally, Congress is consiering a revised Humphrey-Hawkins bill, a major legislative effort to affirm the right of all Americans able, willing, and seeking, to full opportunities for useful, paid employment with primary emphasis upon expansion of private employment.

In keeping with the intent of previous employment legislation and the objectives of the Humphrey-Hawkins bill, the legislation I propose today calls for railroad revitalization, terminal construction and other job creating efforts incorporating the goals of full employment. The jobs generated by this National Surface Transportation Act could be eligible for financial assistance to promote employment in areas that qualify under the current or amended regulations. Under CETA's public service employment programs, eligible unemployed individuals would be provided with entry level jobs, related training and services designed to enable those persons to move into the private sector.

The Secretary would make financial assistance available through the public service employment program, with prime sponsors to carry out all or a substantial portion of an employment or training program for eligible unemployed persons within areas served by this act. Additionally, the opportunity shall be provided for the private and public sectors to work together to provide jobs and training for the unemployed and economically disadvantaged. Prime sponsors shall carry out private sector initiatives which will include on-the-job training, vocation and skills training and related activities.

Including the jobs to be filled with the passage of this surface transportation program, the established employment program would be strengthened and supplemented with an infusion of important and necessary work.

CONCLUSIONS

With rising fuel costs and potential shortages of petroleum we must realize we can no longer afford the extravagance of some of our transportation policies. Current policies reflect the needs and expectations of the past generations, while recent legislation addresses only a few emergency situations and has not served the needs of our surface transportation networks. Traditional Federal efforts to deal with transportation issues through regulation, financial assistance or otherwise, have placed little emphasis on the industry as a transporter. Considerable assistance has been given to railroads in particular without any meaningful examination of the likely impact on service and efficiency. While this bill does not attempt to resolve all transportation issues, it does provide for a comprehensive program, providing a series of specific yet flexible measures impacting directly on service and efficiency.

Perhaps most importantly, is the overall effect of this bill will have on our domestic economy. By improving our transportation network, we are opening up new markets and expanding our economy. In improving this network, we have taken a major step toward energy efficiency, reduced our reliance on imported petroleum products, and thereby reducing the trade deficit. While we revive our rail and bus system to provide efficient and reliable service, we have also created a large number of diverse job opportunities for the unemployed. We have the resources and technology to create the world's finest transportation system—a system commensurate with the needs of a prosperous economy and a strong nation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Surface Transportation Act of 1978 be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2819

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Surface Transportation Act of 1978".

TITLE I—RAIL TRANSPORTATION

RAIL ROLLING STOCK IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM

SEC. 101 (a) Within 180 days of the date of enactment of this Act the Secretary of Transportation (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Secretary") shall prepare a national survey of the existing rolling stock of all common carriers by railroad providing transportation for property in the United States (hereinafter in this section referred to as "carriers by railroad"). The survey shall include the amounts, kinds and condition of the rolling stock used and needed by such carriers. The Secretary shall also prepare an analysis of the kinds and amounts of rolling stock necessary to increase and expand shipments by such carriers. The Secretary shall consult with rail carriers and rail users in the analysis of additional rolling stock needs and make the preliminary results of such survey and analysis available to such carriers, major rail shippers and appropriate state agencies for review and comment before preparing the final study.

(b) Based upon the results of such survey, the Secretary shall create regional reserves of railroad rolling stock necessary to such carriers for seasonal, specialized or high volume operations which in and of themselves do not justify the purchase of equipment. The Secretary shall also take into consideration and make provisions for the kinds and amounts of rolling stock needed to expand or increase existing rail operations.

(c) The Secretary shall also establish, in conjunction with the reserve of rolling stock, regional rolling stock repair yards to provide timely repairs to all equipment in such reserve and time and labor permitting, provide necessary repairs for private carriers on a contract basis. In determining the location of regional repair yards, the Secretary shall take into consideration the renovation of existing abandoned marshaling and repair yards.

(d) The Secretary shall lease rolling stock from such regional reserves to participating carriers at amounts determined by the Secretary in accordance with this section to reimburse the United States for the cost of such stock. Any such carrier wishing to participate in such leasing program shall file with the Secretary records of its previous year's administration showing for each line efficiency in equipment utilization, handling and turnaround times, reliability of delivery times and other pertinent information requested by the Secretary. The Secretary shall develop efficiency ratings in each such areas in order to determine the carrier's average efficiency on each of its lines.

(e) Rolling stock from such reserve which becomes damaged while under lease shall be repaired at either the operator's own repair facilities or at a facility determined by the Secretary. The responsible carrier shall pay for all repair costs. The Secretary shall bear all normal maintenance costs.

(f) After a carrier becomes a participant in the leasing program under this section, the Secretary shall, each six months thereafter, update the average efficiency ratings of such carrier for each of its lines utilizing rolling stock from the program. If such ratings have increased for any line, the carrier shall be eligible for a reduction, based upon the amount of such increase, in leasing rates for rolling stock to be utilized on such line. If such ratings have decreased, the carrier shall be assessed penalty charges on future leases of rolling stock for that line. If such ratings remain the same there shall be no change in such rates for such line.

(g) In conjunction with such regional rolling stock reserves, the Secretary shall establish a computerized car identification plan to monitor the location, use and respective load factors of the rolling stock in the regional reserve rolling stock program. Such computer system shall be designed in such a manner as to benefit the participating rail carriers and the Secretary in their scheduling efforts and thus, maximize equipment utilization.

(h) The regional reserves of rolling stock and the computerized car identification program shall become operational no later than April 1, 1980.

REHABILITATION OF RAIL LINES PREABANDONMENT MECHANISM

SEC. 102. (a) The Secretary shall, upon application, make a grant to any State which has in such State one or more rail lines which has been abandoned, or proposed for abandonment, or classified as category 1 lines by the Interstate Commerce Commission which may be subject to abandonment within three years pursuant to Section 1a of the Interstate Commerce Act for the purpose of assisting such State in making a study in the case of each such line—

(1) whether it is crucial to intra or interstate shipments within such State;

(2) the cost of operating, including upgrading and proper maintenance, such line; and

(3) whether the State should, under the program pursuant to this section, provide for the continued operation of such line.

The amount of such grant shall be determined by the Secretary on the basis of—

(A) the total number of miles of track used by common carriers by rail in such State;

(B) the number of tons of property per mile moved over such track;

(C) the total number of miles of track to be studied; and

(D) the number of tons per mile moved over such track to be studied.

No such grant shall exceed 80 per centum of the cost of the study.

(b) Any study pursuant to this section shall be completed within ninety days of the receipt of the grant therefor and the results thereof shall be submitted to the Secretary within such period, including the estimated cost of upgrading each line and projections for line maintenance.

(c) The Secretary shall either approve the results of such study within thirty days of receipt or shall request additional or revised information and estimates until he approves the results.

(d) Upon approval of any such study with respect to a railroad line and application from such State the Secretary is authorized to make a loan to such State in the amount of ninety per centum of the cost of upgrading such railroad line, including necessary real and other property and equipment to operate such line. Any such loan shall bear interest at a rate of two per centum per annum and shall be repaid in a period not exceeding 40 years.

(e) Upon approval of such loan the Secretary shall provide such assistance to such State as may be necessary to acquire such railroad line in accordance with law, including condemnation.

(f) Any such loan shall be subject to the following conditions:

(1) such State shall be responsible for upgrading, operating and maintaining such railroad, which may be carried out directly by such State or by contract with a carrier by railroad;

(2) upgrading of the line must begin within 120 days of receipt of the loan or any part thereof;

(3) any contract to lease the line to a carrier by railroad shall provide for payment on a per-ton-mile traveled basis, and lease revenue estimates shall be filed with the Secretary on a quarterly basis, and the carrier shall file quarterly estimates of tons-per-mile traveled with the appropriate State agency and make lease payments to the appropriate State agency annually, by January fifteenth, of each year;

(4) any increase in leasing rates must be approved by the Secretary;

(5) any and all net revenue generated from the operation of such line shall be used to pay for normal line maintenance and to pay for eighty percent of the State's administrative costs, with any and all excess of such revenues to be used to pay back such loan;

(6) if the use of such lines warrants further line improvements, expansion or construction, such State may apply to the Secretary for an additional loan for such purpose and such loan may be granted under the same procedure as for the initial loan;

(7) payments on the loan shall be made annually not later than April 1; and

(8) revenues remaining after such payments must be used for improving rail services in such State.

(g) (1) In the event of one State certifying a railroad line as crucial for the purposes of this section, but the economics of operating the line depending on an adjoining State certifying the section of that line within its boundaries as crucial, the Secretary shall act as a mediator and work with both States for concurrence for the purposes of this section.

(2) In the event that one State indicates that it is necessary to upgrade a higher priority line first, the Secretary may request the operating carrier by railroad to continue its operations on that line for not to exceed eighteen months, but such request shall not be binding upon such carrier in any way.

(h) The Interstate Commerce Commission shall for the purposes of this section furnish to each State transportation system diagrams and amendments thereto filed with the Commission for any line of railroad in such State pursuant to section 1a(5) of the Interstate Commerce Act.

FEDERAL RAILROAD ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 103. The Secretary shall carry out his funtions pursuant to this title through the Federal Railroad Administration.

REGULATIONS

SEC. 104. The Secretary is authorized to establish such regulations as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this title.

APPROPRIATIONS FROM THE RAILROAD REHABILITATION AND IMPROVEMENT FUND

SEC. 105. (a) Amounts necessary to carry out the provisions of this title shall be appropriated from the Railroad Rehabilitation and Improvement Fund established pursuant to section 502 of the Railroad Revitalization and Regulatory Reform Act of 1976.

(b) Amounts paid to the Secretary pursuant to the provisions of this Act shall be deposited in such Fund.

(c) The purposes of such Fund as stated in such section 502 are expanded to include the purposes of this title.

TITLE II—BUS TRANSPORTATION

FEDERAL BUS ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 201. (a) There is established in the Department of Transportation a Federal Bus Administration. Such Administration shall be headed by an Administrator who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and shall be compensated at the amount provided for the Administrator of the Federal Highway Administration.

(b) The Secretary shall exercise his functions under this title, and any other functions he may have relating to common carriers of passengers by motor vehicle, through the Federal Bus Administration.

STATE BUS PLANS

SEC. 202. (a) The Secretary, upon application from a State, shall make a grant to such State, to cover 90 per centum of the cost of developing a State Bus Plan. The amount of any such grant shall not exceed $100,000. The amount of such grant shall be determined by the Secretary on the basis of a ratio of the following:

(1) number of certificated carriers authorized to provide service within the state;

(2) number of currently operated route miles; and

(3) the total population of the state.

(b) Such plan shall—

(1) determine primary efficient service routes throughout the State for common carriers of passengers by motor vehicle utilizing highways on the National System of Interstate and Defense Highways and the Federal-aid primary system:

(2) determine, to serve such primary routes, efficient feeder routes which are designed to provide pickup and delivery service for passengers to and from smaller communities and to provide central pickup and delivery points along the primary routes and which are not more than 75 miles long;

(3) determine minimum service requirements for such feeder routes;

(4) determine additional terminals and shelters, or renovation of existing terminals and shelters, necessary to serve such routes;

(5) be prepared in consultation with active common carriers, local governments and agencies thereof; and

(6) be submitted to the Secretary not later than 180 days after receiving the initial grant under this section.

IMPROVEMENT OF STATE BUS SYSTEM

SEC. 203. (a) Not later than 60 days after approving a State plan meeting the requirements of section 202 the State shall begin negotiations to enter into contracts to provide common carrier motor vehicle passenger service on the feeder routes in such plan. Any such contract shall—

(1) be offered first to private carriers holding active and dormant service authority on such feeder routes and where no such authority exists;

(2) be awarded to the lowest bidder determined by the State as being fit, willing and able of providing satisfactory service;

(3) be for automatically renewable terms and the State to have the authority to terminate service if contract conditions are not fulfilled;

(4) include the provision of a long term low interest loan with the interest at the rate of 2 per centum per annum to cover the cost of necessary vehicles, other equipment and initial operations or the option to participate in an equipment leasing program developed by the Secretary;

(5) provide that the State establish all fares and other charges and such fares shall include a 40 per centum discount to individuals who are 65 years of age or older or who are handicapped;

(6) provide for initiating service not later than 6 months after receiving the initial payment under such loan;

(7) provide for repayment of such loan to begin one year after the initiation of service under a schedule determined by the Secretary to be reasonable for the purposes of this section;

(8) provide for the use of fuel efficient vehicles meeting the requirements of the Secretary;

(9) authorize the carrier to provide local charter service within the area of its feeder routes;

(10) in the establishment of feeder route rates, assure such operators a reasonable rate of return;

(11) authorize, under separate application to the state, the extension or other route revision when such extensions or revisions do not impinge on another active route authority, subject to the separate final approval of the Secretary.

(b) The Secretary shall provide to the Interstate Commerce Commission a copy of each state plan approved under Section 202 and the Commission shall take such action as may be possible under law to change service patterns over primary routes in such state in accordance with such plan.

(c) The Secretary must provide final approval to all state contracts for feeder route service. Authorization for federal loans and assistance for the development of such systems shall be made only after approval by the Secretary.

ESTABLISHMENT OF MOTOR BUS TRUST FUND

SEC. 204 (a) There is hereby established in the Treasury of the United States a trust fund to be known as the Motor Bus Trust Fund (hereinafter in this title called the "trust fund"). The trust fund shall consist of such amounts as may be appropriated or credited to the trust fund as provided by this title.

(b) Effective after September 30, 1978, there shall be directly transferred from general revenues $125,000,000 annually.

(c) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated from the general fund of the Treasury to the trust fund such additional sums as may be required to make the expenditures authorized in this title. Such sums shall be repayable advances unless otherwise provided.

(d) It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to hold the trust fund, and (after consultation with the Secretary) to report to the Congress not later than the 1st day of March of each year, beginning with the calendar year 1979, on the financial condition and the results of the operations of the trust fund during the preceding fiscal year and on its expected condition and operations during the current and next ensuing fiscal year. Such report shall be printed as a House document of the session of the Congress to which the report is made.

(e) It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to invest such portion of the trust fund as is not, in his judgment, required to meet current withdrawals. Such investments may be made only in interest-bearing obligations of the United States or in obligations guaranteed as to both principal and interest by the United States. For such purpose such obligations may be acquired (1) on original issue at market price, or (2) by purchase of outstanding obligations at the market price. The purposes for which obligations of the United States may be issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, are hereby extended to authorize the issuance at par of special obligations exclusively to the trust fund. Such special obligations shall bear interest at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration the current average yield during the month preceding the date of such issue, on marketable interest-bearing obligations of the United States of comparable maturities then forming a part of the public debt rounded to the nearest one-eighth of 1 per centum. Such special obligations shall be issued only if the Secretary of the Treasury determines that the purchase of other interest-bearing obligations of the United States, or of obligations guaranteed as to both principal and interest by the United States on original issue or at the market price, is not in the public interest. Advances to the trust fund pursuant to subsection (c) shall not be invested.

(f) Any obligation acquired by the trust fund (except special obligations issued exclusively to the trust fund) may be sold by the Secretary of the Treasury at the market price, and such special obligations may be redeemed at par plus accrued interest.

(g) The interest on, and the proceeds from the sale or redemption of, any obligations held in the trust fund shall be credited to and form a part of the trust fund.

(h) Advances made pursuant to subsection (c) shall be repaid with interest to the general fund of the Treasury when the Secretary of the Treasury determines that monies are available in the trust fund for such purposes. Interest shall be at rates computed in the same manner as provided for advances to the Highway Trust Fund.

(i) Amounts in the trust fund shall be available as provided in appropriation Acts, for making expenditures to carry out the provisions of this title. Amounts received by the Secretary pursuant to this title shall be credited to the trust fund.

BUS TERMINAL CONSTRUCTION AND RENOVATION PROGRAM

SEC. 205. (a) The Secretary, upon application from a State or local government, or other public body, shall provide grants for not to exceed 80 per centum of the cost of planning and renovating or constructing terminals to include waiting stations for common carriers of passengers by motor vehicle.

(b) In order to receive any such grant the applicant must show to the satisfaction of the Secretary that—

(1) the applicant has consulted extensively with the common carriers to serve such terminal for the purposes of such terminal conforming to the carriers' needs;

(2) the terminal location is within close proximity or easy access to other local or regional transportation modes to facilitate intermodal connections, but this requirement shall not apply to applications concerning terminals along feeder routes;

(3) the terminal will be constructed or renovated to meet energy efficiency standards established by the Secretary; and

(4) the terminal will be constructed or renovated to meet all other applicable requirements for terminal construction including regulations concerning considerations for the elderly and the handicapped.

POLICY AND NATIONAL PLAN

SEC. 206. (a) Within 180 days of the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall establish a program to develop a national policy plan for intercity motor bus carriers and establish a program to develop a national route plan in conjunction with state bus plans and the streamlining of primary class 1 carrier routes. Such plan shall be developed in consultation with States and affected motor bus carriers.

REGULATIONS

SEC. 207. The Secretary is authorized to establish such regulations as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this title.

TITLE III—TRANSPORTATION PUBLIC SERVICE EMPLOYMENT

SEC. 301. It is the purpose of this title to provide, through surface transportation employment, supplemental job training and employment opportunities for economically disadvantaged persons, unemployed or underemployed persons. This training and these employment opportunities should be carried out by agreement of the Secretary of Transportation with the Secretary of Labor as a coordinated addition to the existing public service jobs programs. It is a further purpose to encourage the inclusion, in all Federal programs such as the national Surface Transportation Act of 1978, of providing job opportunities, provisions for both public service and also for private for-profit assistance in promoting and operating employment and employment training programs.

SEC. 302. In order to foster and promote employment opportunities in areas of significant unemployment, the Secretary of Transportation is authorized to consult and enter into agreement with the Secretary of Labor (hereinafter in this title referred to as the "Secretary") to develop policies, procedures and programs to carry out provisions of this Act in order to provide employment opportunities for Americans aged sixteen years and older in the civilian labor force able, willing and seeking to work but who despite serious efforts to obtain employment remain unemployed.

SEC. 303. In order to carry out the provisions of this Act, the Secretary under subsections 204d, 205–211, of the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act of 1973 and Title VI of the Comprehensive employment and Training Act of 1973, is authorized to enter into agreements with public service employment agencies. Such agreements shall include a plan for the inclusion of employment opportunities resulting from this Act within all other public service employment programs, or those private for-profit initiatives designated under subsection 304(d).

SEC. 304.(a) The Secretary shall provide public service jobs for construction and renovation of bus terminals, upgrading and rehabilitation rail-lines, maintaining and repairing Federal rolling stock held in regional reserves, construction of new repair yards, rehabilitation of existing repair yards, and maintaining and repairing upgraded rail beds.

(b) In order to carry out the provisions of this Act subsections 204d, 205–211, of the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act of 1973, to the extent not inconsistent with this title, shall apply to those policies, procedures and programs.

(c) Manpower Services provided under this Act shall include but not be limited to those listed in Title I, sec. 101.(1)–(12), of the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act of 1973.

(d) In order to involve private sector participation in the employment projects generated by this Act, the Secretary is authorized to enter into agreements with business and industry for job training and employment. Such agreements should be made only after cooperative councils of labor, large and small business, and industry representatives have developed programs that will place economically disadvantaged unemployed citizens into jobs with private for-profit employers.

SEC. 305. Agreements under section 303 shall include provisions for the payment of costs after determination by the Secretary that such project in the agreement—

(A) will provide employment only for eligible individuals, except for necessary technical, administrative and supervisory personnel, but such personnel shall, to the fullest extent possible, be recruited from among eligible individuals;

(B) will provide employment for eligible individuals whose opportunities for other suitable public or private paid employment are poor;

(C) (i) will result in an increase in employment opportunities over those opportunities which would otherwise be available, (ii) will not result in the displacement of currently employed workers (including partial displacement, such as a reduction in the hours of nonovertime work or wages or employment benefits), and (iii) will not impair existing contracts or result in the substitution of Federal funds for other funds in connection with work that would otherwise be performed;

(D) will not employ or continue to employ any eligible individual to perform work the same or substantially the same as that performed by any other person who is on layoff;

(E) will utilize methods of recruitment and selection (including listing of job vacancies with the employment agency operated by any State or political subdivision thereof) which will assure that the maximum number of eligible individuals will have an opportunity to participate in the project.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 306. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, sums appropriated to carry out this title of the Surface Transportation Act of 1978 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, must be used for employment service assistance projects provided for in Section 304(a).

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

The Senate continued with the consideration of the treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I do not propose to speak at any length on this subject, which has occupied the Senate for most of the afternoon. Tomorrow will be time enough to specifically rebut the various arguments made by the proponents of the pending amendment.

The purpose of that amendment, of course, is to require that the House of Representatives pass on any transfer of property by the United States to the Government of Panama, as contemplated by the present treaty. However, to set the general guidelines for tomorrow's debate, I want to make it clear at the outset that no one favoring the treaties, to my knowledge, denies that the United States has title to property in the Panama Canal Zone.

I listened with some curiosity to the extended brief presented by the distinguished Senator from North Carolina concerning the origins of the United States legal title to property in the Canal Zone. He took an hour and a half pressing an open door. Of course, the United States acquired legal title to property lying within the boundaries of the Canal Zone.

Originally, the effort to develop a pathway between the seas was undertaken by private enterprise. An American company first constructed a railroad across the isthmus; later, as Senators know, a French company attempted to construct the first canal across the isthmus. When the Government of the United States decided to take up that enterprise in 1902 and 1903, we had to acquire the legal titles and rights of the various private enterprises that had endeavored to build the canal. This was done partly through acquiring such rights as the French companies still possessed. Although the original company had gone bankrupt, its holdings were in the hands of a trustee in bankruptcy. As I recall, the U.S. Government paid $40 million to the French trustee to acquire its holdings, including the machinery, the construction works, the sheds, the wharves, and all the other facilities associated with the French work.

It also was necessary for the United States to acquire the rights of the company then operating the Panama railroad along with other private holdings, and the use of unoccupied land which was owned by the Panamanian Government.

So, from all these sources, the United States obtained legal title to lands within the Canal Zone. In fact, we actually initiated there an experiment in socialism. We acquired and extinguished the rights of the various private enterprises in the zone and established governmental ownership in their place. Since that time, life within the zone, including the businesses that have been permitted to operate there, has been under the ownership, direction, and control of the Government of the United States.

So it has been an experiment in pure socialism, if you will, and I would be the last to deny that the U.S. Government possesses legal title to land within the Canal Zone and the improvements thereon. It need not consume an hour and a half of the Senate's time to establish a point that I did not believe to be contested in this debate.

With respect to the matter of sovereignty, other questions are involved, but I never have laid great stress upon them. It is true that under the 1903 treaty, the United States acquired all the attributes of sovereignty in the Canal Zone. Sovereignty, of course, is distinct from ownership, and defined as jurisdictional powers exercised by a government over land, however owned. In the Canal Zone, we had a case of land owned by the Government of the United States, acquired from various private companies. While under the terms of the 1903 treaty we did not expressly obtain from Panama sovereign power over the zone, and we never have formally claimed sovereign power over the zone, still, we did obtain all the normal attributes of sovereignty. The 1903 treaty contains the phrase "as if sovereign."

So, Mr. President, for all intents and purposes, the United States, in addition to possessing the title to land and improvements within the Canal Zone, has exercised there, as a practical matter, all the powers normally reserved to a sovereign government.

These are all the facts of life with which we are dealing. Far from denying them, we affirm them. It is the exercise of this de facto sovereign authority within the Canal Zone that created the friction between the United States and Panama lying at the base of the resentment Panamanians have felt toward us. The zone bisects their country and any Panamanian who enters the zone is subject to American law, to American police, to American arrest, to trial by American courts, and to imprisonment in our own penitentiaries, including those located in the United States itself.

This is the principal reason why the people of Panama have grown increasingly upset at what they regard as an unfair transgression upon their national rights and national dignity.

It was this heated, passionate, nationalistic feeling of the Panamanians that led to the tragic riots in 1964 in which both Panamanians and Americans lost their lives. These were the riots that led the President of the United States, Lyndon Johnson, to conclude that a new arrangement between the United States and Panama respecting both the Canal Zone and the operation of the canal itself was needed. Three succeeding American Presidents, agreeing with President Johnson, pursued the negotiations leading to these treaties.

So let the debate tomorrow at least proceed from the premise that the U.S. Government acquired ownership of land and improvements within the Canal Zone and that, although it may never have formally acquired or claimed sovereignty over the zone, it possessed powers which in fact are normally exercised only by a sovereign government.

Those are the underlying facts which led to a recognition that a new arrangement between the United States and Panama was necessary if good relations between the two countries were to be preserved and the canal operated as a peaceful, neutral passageway between the seas.

The whole objective of these treaties is to bring about a fair arrangement, acceptable to both governments, that will permit the canal to function peacefully in a climate of friendship and cooperation, with the full understanding and support of both the government and the people of Panama.

As I listened today to the speeches read by the Senators from Utah and North Carolina I thought to myself that this argument can never be settled by lawyers briefs citing the legal pedigrees on which we claim our right to govern the Panama Canal Zone. Legal briefs look backwards. They are based upon the arrangements made in 1903 or later, and the acts of Congress that implemented those arrangements. They are based upon the prior claims of the private companies, both French and American, and the treaties that those companies held with previous governments, both Panamanian and Colombian; they relate to an entirely different era, to a world that existed 75 years ago when it was possible for a great power like the United States to simply acquire what it wanted from a small country and enforce its will because it had the physical power to do so.

The circumstances surrounding the 1903 treaty have been brought out in detail in the course of this debate and are a chapter in themselves of how different the world was in 1903. Then we could negotiate a treaty with a Frenchman in Washington and sign it even before the Panamanian delegation arrived here, and we could do it under circumstances that presented them with a choice of either confirming the treaty upon their arrival or returning to their own country to face a firing squad, unless they were given American military protection. It is a story out of a different world, the world of the past. It is a story of a time in which a half-dozen metropolitan powers in Western Europe and North America controlled most of the globe. It was a world, it was a time, when the people of Africa and Asia and much of Latin America were subjected to foreign colonial rule.

But that world of 1903 is not the world of 1978. No, Mr. President, we live in a better world now, a world in which the empires have all disappeared, and in their place there are 100 or more new independent governments.

The colonies that still remained in the world when the 1903 treaty was consummated are now independent governments. Africa has been retaken by the Africans; Asia has been recovered by the Asians. The Panama Canal Zone is virtually the only piece of foreign territory that the United States of America still holds against the wishes of the people of the country the territory is in.

I know there are those who look back nostalgically upon the days of the great white fleet and Teddy Roosevelt's big stick policy. I suppose there are many who wish that the world was still subject to the colonial control of half a dozen imperial powers carrying the white man's burden to Africa and to Asia, ruling by gunboats and the thin red line of troops glorified by the poems of Rudyard Kipling.

But that day is gone. It can never be recovered. The world has passed beyond that stage, and it is useless for us to discuss the validity of our legal pedigrees.

That is not the issue. The issue is whether the United States of America, the first government to be established by a colonial people rebelling against the assertion of authority by a foreign throne, is now going to adhere to its own principles as it undertakes to deal with a tiny Latin American republic.

The treaties before us are an affirmation of our own principles which, to my mind, Mr. President, is of much greater consequence than the color of title by which we lay claim to land and improvements within the Panama Canal Zone.

Now, earlier this afternoon the distinguished Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH) read an 89-page address in which he questioned whether it is lawful to transfer title of American-owned property without the participation of the House of Representatives.

Tomorrow we shall respond to his arguments and show that the United States can dispose of property through the exercise of the treaty power. And we will cite the precedents and constitutional authorities which overwhelmingly support that position.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I would be happy to yield to the very distinguished and able Senator from Maryland (Mr. SARBANES).

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, with reference to the remarks that were made earlier in the day, I want to underscore the importance of the comments the able and distinguished Senator from Idaho has just made in terms of again turning the attention of this body, as we come back from the recess to consider now the Panama Canal Treaty, on what is really at stake for the United States with respect to these two treaties and how important it is, so far as our national interest is concerned, especially in view of a changing world.

Mr. President, just a few days ago on March 24 an article appeared in the Philadelphia Inquirer by our esteemed former colleague Hugh Scott. Former Senator Scott wrote an article analyzing in detail the costs of the Panama Canal treaties and, more importantly, discussing the potentially far greater cost of not ratifying these treaties.

As we all know, Senator Scott served with distinction as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations and as the minority leader of the Senate of the United States, as the leader of the Republican Party in this body.

In this article he writes with the valuable experience of a Member of the Senate and one who has had long involvement in the foreign policy of the United States. I urge my colleagues to examine his remarks. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that Senator Scott's article be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COST OF REJECTING THE TREATY

I can well understand why many Americans wonder why the U.S. should have to pay money to give back the Panama Canal. Their concerns reflect some honest misunderstandings about the costs of treaty ratification. These are some candid, factual answers to the questions most often asked.

(Q) Why are we paying the Panamanians to take the canal off our hands?

(A) Actually, American taxpayers will not pay the Panamanians anything. The treaties provide for an annual payment to Panama until the year 2000, initially amounting to about $65–$75 million. But all of it is to be paid by the new Panama Canal Commission out of operating income. Not a cent is to come from American tax revenues.

Moreover, the purpose of the annuity is not to pay Panama for taking the canal back. It is payment for the right to operate a canal which intersects the nation of Panama—a right which will include the privilege of maintaining American military bases on Panamanian territory during the life of the first of the two treaties, the Panama Canal Treaty. Similar base rights elsewhere cost between two and four times as much.

(Q) What about the indirect costs of the treaties?

(A) There will be indirect costs principally related to the relocation and early retirement expenses of American personnel in the Canal Zone. In the aggregate they will require total appropriations of about $350 million and will be quickly offset by the elimination of defense costs in Panama after the year 2000.

(Q) Won't Americans have to pay more for goods which transit the canal because of higher tolls?

(A) All users will have to pay more in the future under any circumstances just to keep abreast of inflation. The best estimates are that under the new treaties tolls will have to be increased initially by no more than 30 percent. But the portion of this increase which will be paid by American consumers and exporters will be comparatively small, in part because less than 8 percent of U.S. foreign waterborne commerce uses the canal. A 30 percent toll hike would add just $3 to the price of a $3500 automobile from Japan, a fraction of a penny to the export price of a bushel of U.S. corn; just 0.15 cent per gallon of gas refined from North Slope crude oil.

(Q) Won't toll increases price the canal out of the market?

(A) Numerous studies suggest that tolls would be raised initially by as much as 75–100 percent before reaching the point of diminishing returns. The much lower increases initially required, will not dramatically affect canal use. There's no reason to expect that toll increases will jeopardize the canal's competitive position.

(Q) What about estimates that the U.S. is "giving away" property and assets worth $10 billion?

(A) Estimates of $10 billion are made on the basis of replacement value, not book value. That's like assessing at the 1978 price an ordinary automobile which was purchased in 1974 and which, since, has depreciated 50 percent. The book value of canal assets and property which will be transferred to Panama between treaty day and the year 2000 will be much less than $1 billion.

From the beginning Congress has demonstrated little interest in amortizing our investment in the canal. The canal has always been run as a service to U.S. and world shipping. Its benefits to the U.S. in war and peace have been many times greater than our investment, and these benefits will continue through the special considerations given U.S. shipping in war or emergency under the new treaties. Consequently, we are not seeking compensation for our investment through repayment from Panama.

These then, are the costs of ratification. But it is only against the consequences of non-ratification that they can be fairly measured. The Defense Department has hinted at the possible extent of those consequences.

By its estimates, the cost of securing the canal in an atmosphere clouded by growing opposition to the present treaty arrangement could be tens of thousands of additional troops in the Canal Zone.

What such a commitment would represent not only in tax dollars, but in terms of strained relations and cost of investment opportunities in Latin America, and in terms of risking a protracted entanglement in the isthmus is sobering to consider. Moreover, instability in the canal area could be a major deterrent to world traffic. What all this suggests is that the far greater cost could lie in rejecting the proposed treaties.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I want to quote the concluding remarks of Senator Scott in which he discusses the cost involved in turning over the canal to Panama pursuant to the terms of the Panama Canal Treaty, and points out how those costs are far less than the figures which have been thrown around this Chamber on the subject. But he then goes on to discuss the alternatives, to underscore the very point which the distinguished Senator from Idaho made so ably earlier this afternoon on the floor of the Senate.

He states the following:

These, then, are the costs of ratification. But it is only against the consequences of non-ratification that they can be fairly measured. The Defense Department has hinted at the possible extent of those consequences.

By its estimates, the cost of securing the canal in an atmosphere clouded by growing opposition to the present treaty arrangement could be tens of thousands of additional troops in the Canal Zone.

What such a commitment would represent not only in tax dollars, but in terms of strained relations and cost of investment opportunities in Latin America, and in terms of risking a protracted entanglement in the isthmus is sobering to consider. Moreover, instability in the canal area could be a major deterrent to world traffic. What all this suggests is that the far greater cost could lie in rejecting the proposed treaties.

It is time, as we resume debate with respect to these treaties, not to lose sight of what is at stake with respect to approving these treaties; in terms of our relationship with Panama, our relationship with all of Latin America, and, indeed, our relationship with countries throughout the world.

Mr. President, a number of this Nation's most distinguished business leaders and labor leaders have endorsed these treaties as the best means of insuring our use of the canal for commercial purposes and improving our relations with our vital trading partners in this hemisphere. These leaders and organizations know from practical experience that a disruption in our trade with the nations to the south could do severe damage to our economy. Not only is Latin America a principle market for the goods exported by the United States, but it is a primary source of a great many raw materials on which our economy is dependent.

Labor also recognizes the negative impact a rejection of the treaties could have on our economy and, thus, the employment picture. Labor's view is witnessed by the endorsement of the treaties by the AFL–CIO executive council and the United Auto Workers.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following communications expressing support for the treaties be printed in the RECORD at this point:

A letter to Chairman Sparkman from the Honorable Alexander B. Trowbridge, Vice Chairman, Allied Chemical Corporation and former Secretary of Commerce.

A letter from Mr. Harold W. McGraw, Jr., Chairman and President of McGraw-Hill, Inc.;

The statement of Mr. George Meany, President of the AFL–CIO submitted to the Foreign Relations Committee;

A letter from Mr. Jose Aceves, Executive Director of the Latin American Manufacturers Association of Washington, D.C.;

A letter from Mr. Timothy W. Stanley, President of the International Economic Policy Association;

A letter from Mr. James P. Grant, President of the Overseas Development Council;

A letter from Mr. Ricardo Zazueta; National Director of SER-Jobs for Progress, Inc.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ALLIED CHEMICAL CORP.,

Senator JOHN J. SPARKMAN,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR SPARKMAN: With the important clarifications announced by President Carter and General Torrijos on October 14th, there is really no valid basis remaining for objection to the ratification of the new treaties governing the future of the Panama Canal.

I urge you to support ratification when it comes to a vote. I do so with three perspectives in mind.

The first is personal. I lived in Panama from 1959 to 1961, and went through the 1959 riots which first exposed the raw nerve endings that brought forth greater animosity, destruction and death in 1964. The Panamanians understandably demand greater control over such a dominant physical and economic factor which divides their country geographically and psychologically. They will continue to seek such control, and if denied for too long only frustration and hatred will result—with creation of a totally vulnerable security position for the Canal and our interests there. No amount of military power, as we learned in Vietnam, can provide security if the surrounding political climate is hostile. The already great disparity of economic conditions for those living in the Zone, contrasted to most Panamanians, has led to substantial hostility already. We cannot afford to stimulate that ill will, and to reject changes provided by the new Treaties would be to lock the animosity into permanent and violent forms.

The second perspective is from my prior service as Assistant Secretary and Secretary of Commerce from 1965 to 1968. You can see now, as I did when in Washington, the delicate and vital nature of our relations with other American states in this hemisphere. Clearly, ratification of the Treaties will be a singularly prominent test of our good faith in those relations, and rejection will burden us for decades to come with resulting distrust and prejudice of damaging proportions. We have all the security protection regarding defense of the Canal we need—the Joint Chiefs are deeply convinced of that—but we must fortify it with political security. The new Treaties deal with today's realities, and to view them from the perspective of what pertained in 1903 or 1941 or 1959 is simply to overlook the facts of today and tomorrow in which U.S.-Latin American relations must be structured.

My third perspective is from my daily responsibilities as Vice Chairman of Allied Chemical Corporation. Anyone engaged in economic activity must recognize the great importance of Latin America as a supplier of resources and as a market of growing importance. The Canal must remain viable operationally to expedite the movement of goods, both intra-Hemisphere and worldwide, and it can be permanently secure only if our respective governments and people have a mutually advantageous stake in its continued successful operation. Panama must get fair value for use of its territory, and be participants in the Canal's leadership, if it is to feel some responsibility for that success. To continue under old rules, and to reject this important new framework for cooperation, will bring vulnerability and steady interruption to Canal operations.

In case none of my arguments are adequately persuasive, I am attaching a copy of an article by Vermont Royster, editor emeritus of the Wall Street Journal, which I hope you will find full of balanced common sense.

The actual vote probably won't be taken for several months, but when it comes, I hope very much that these points will persuade you to support ratification.

Sincerely yours,

ALEXANDER B. TROWBRIDGE,
Vice Chairman of the Board, Allied Chemical Corp.

MCGRAW-HILL, INC.,
New York, N.Y., November 15, 1977.

Hon. JOHN J. SPARKMAN,
U.S. Senate, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR SPARKMAN: I am writing in connection with the ratification of the Panama Canal Treaty.

For many years McGraw-Hill has carried on extensive operations in Latin America. We have subsidiaries of our Book Company in Mexico, Panama, and Brazil, and the Mexican company has a substantial branch operation in Colombia. The Mexican and Brazilian companies do extensive publishing in Spanish and Portuguese as well as marketing books from the United States. Products of all these companies and of our U.S. Book Company are marketed in all countries of Latin America. In addition, Business Week and our more than 30 other professional and technical magazines have large circulation, advertising, and newsgathering operations in Latin America.

Our years of experience in publishing and communications in Latin America have impressed us with what a vitally important and emotional issue the Panama Canal presents not only to Panamanians but to all Latin Americans, who view it as the most meaningful test of U.S. attitudes toward their countries and toward the region as a whole. We believe it would be hard to overestimate the wave of bitterness and disillusion that would sweep over even our friends in Latin America if the Senate should fail to ratify the current treaty with Panama. Certainly it would make our operations in Latin America very difficult and might make some of them impossible. Other American businesses operating in the region would undoubtedly be similarly affected.

We hope these considerations, affecting all U.S. business relations with Latin America, will weigh heavily with you when you decide your vote on ratification of the Panama Treaty.

If there is any further information we can provide, we shall of course be pleased to do so.

Very truly yours,

HAROLD W. MCGRAW, Jr.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF GEORGE MEANY, AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR AND CONGRESS OF INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS, OCTOBER 11, 1977

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate this opportunity to appear before you to urge approval by the Senate of the Panama Canal treaties.

We of the AFL–CIO have a vital interest in these treaties both as citizens, concerned with the security and welfare of our country, and as trade unionists, representing thousands of workers employed in the Canal Zone.

At its last meeting on August 29 and 30, the AFL–CIO Executive Council discussed the Panama Canal treaties at some length. Following this discussion and analysis of the summary terms of the treaties, the Council unanimously adopted the following statement:

"After thirteen years of on-again, off-again negotiations between the governments of the United States and Panama, two treaties have been agreed to which radically alter the Panama Canal Treaty of 1903.

"According to the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the treaties of 1977 provide for continuing freedom of action of the United States to maintain neutrality of the Canal and further guarantee U.S. access and rights to use all land and water areas and installations necessary for the defense of the Canal through the year 2000.

"Job security and rights of workers in the Canal Zone, both U.S. and Panamanian, will be assured. Since 1949, the AFL has called for justice in the Canal Zone in arguing for equal pay for equal work, so that Panamanian citizens would not be exploited through a double standard of remuneration. Through the years, particularly during the long and arduous periods of negotiations groping toward a new treaty, the AFL–CIO has maintained a vigilant stance concerning workers' rights in the Canal Zone and the safekeeping of the elements of U.S. defense inherent in the Panama Canal Agreement.

"We are satisfied that the new treaties cover both considerations adequately. U.S. citizens now employed in the Canal Zone will be protected and remunerated as U.S. government employees and will be offered new benefits tailored to fit the new treaty characteristics, such as early retirement.

"After reviewing the summary of the new treaties, and based on the assumption that it is an accurate reflection of the final treaty language, which is not yet available, the AFL–CIO Executive Council views the two Panama Canal Treaties guaranteeing the permanent neutrality of the Canal and the operation and defense of the Canal through the year 2000, as instruments worthy of support by U.S. citizens and their elected representatives. These new instruments constitute a just and enduring basis for harmony in the Western Hemisphere, and we support their ratification by the Senate."

Mr. Chairman, our position is based on practical grounds, in the light of the circumstances of the modern world, and the conviction that we have more to gain today, in terms of the broad interests and ideals of the United States, than we have to lose, by approval of these treaties.

In the public debate of recent weeks over the wisdom of these treaties, some arguments have drawn attention to the dubious circumstances surrounding the original treaty of 1903. I do not propose to rehash that question, for it has no bearing on our position.

While hostorically interesting, revisionist aspersions on the role of this country in a by-gone era are scarcely relevant to the issues actually before you. Adverse judgments by this generation on the actions of another generation in another world, three-quarters of a century ago, may excite the moralism of some but they have little persuasive appeal to our members today. Nor are latter-day efforts to portray Theodore Roosevelt as some sort of an international brigand likely to rally broad public support behind these treaties.

In fact, the Panama Canal treaty was renegotiated twice, in 1936 and in 1955, with duly constituted Panamanian governments, with significant modifications in its terms and increases in annual compensation to Panama.

In no way should the treaties now before you be painted or regarded as acts of atonement for American "guilt", for we are guilty of nothing. On the contrary, the construction and operation of the Panama Canal by the United States was and is an extraordinary service to humanity and to all the maritime nations of the world. The American people have every right and reason to continue to regard this as a proud chapter in our history, as has been taught to school children for generations. And I, for one, deeply deplore and resent the campaign by Latin American demagogues, and by our own guilt-mongers, to condemn it as a locus of American "imperialism" or "racism", as was put forward at the ILO last June.

But the time has now come to bring to the fore another aspect of American pride: our pride in the fact that we are not and do not want to become an old-time colonial power, clutching a sort of cloudy, semi-sovereignty over this strip of territory, for its own sake, like some faded banner of past glory.

Our real interest in this canal is simple and concrete and derives from its only real purpose and function. The function of the Panama Canal is to offer transit to the vessels of all nations (which can fit into its locks) from the Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific Ocean. That is all.

Mr. Chairman, I accept as valid the assurances by the President of the United States, supported by the Secretaries of Defense and State and by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, that the terms of the treaties afford adequate guarantees that this function will continue to be performed without let or hindrance and that there is no serious risk, as a consequence of these treaties, that American vessels, commercial or military, will ever be deprived of full access to this vital passageway between the oceans. I have no reason, in the face of those solemn and expert assurances, to interpose any less-informed judgment to the contrary.

Beyond that, I believe that the continued assertion of sovereignty, for no definable further reason, over a narrow strip of land, inside and dividing the territory of another country, would not, in the modern world, be an asset, but could on the other hand, be a liability.

Mr. Chairman, speaking for the AFL–CIO, we therefore support and strongly urge the approval of the Panama Canal treaties.

LAMA,
Washington, D.C., November 28, 1977.

Hon. JOHN SPARKMAN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR SPARKMAN: LAMA is a trade association of predominantly Hispanic-American membership which is concerned with improving opportunities for minority owned business in both domestic and international markets. Our board of directors has asked me to write to you to elicit your support for the Panama Canal Treaty.

We at LAMA were extremely encouraged by the negotiation of this treaty. While adequately protecting U.S. security interests the treaty provides a measure of national pride and autonomy to Panamanians which they have been denied for many years. This treaty should encourage an attitude of cooperation and trust between the U.S. and Latin America which is unparalleled in recent years. We expect to see the treaty bear fruit both in a long term increase in international trade and stabilization of Latin American political affairs. We urge you to cast your vote in favor of ratification.

Very truly yours,

JOSE ACEVES,
Executive Director.

INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC POLICY ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D.C., February 23, 1978.

Hon. JOHN SPARKMAN,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR SPARKMAN: As you know, this Association is a nonprofit research group concerned with international economic issues of importance to this country. For over two decades we have made our analyses available to the legislative and executive branches. We do not, as a matter of practice, take formal policy positions on major issues.

I have however, been persuaded to offer my views on the Panama Canal Treaties because many of our Board Members are concerned that the public controversy and apprehensions in various quarters might lead to a failure to ratify them in the Senate. These business leaders and their staff experts on Latin America generally feel that such a failure could have serious repercussions. Recognizing that there are controversial aspects, I believe that the long run interests of the United States in the open access to and security of the Panama Canal would be best served through the treaty process. I would therefore favor ratification with only those amendments (such as that by Senator Baker to provide security safeguards) which can be mutually agreed by the Panamanian and U.S. Governments.

Rejection, on the other hand, could frustrate these important U.S. interests; for the status quo will not be viable indefinitely and the security of the Canal, especially against irregular military operations, requires the cooperation of the government and people of Panama, a cooperation which could be jeopardized by a failure to ratify the treaties at this point.

Finally, there is the broader question of U.S. relations with the rest of the Hemisphere. Given the Canal's symbolic role in the region and the modern world's growing interdependence, final rejection of treaties which have been negotiated for years under several U.S. administrations could harm America's international credibility and the fabric of our political and economic relations throughout Latin America. I would therefore respectfully urge that the Senate ratify the treaties.

Sincerely,

TIMOTHY W. STANLEY,
President.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL,
September 21, 1977.

Hon. JOHN SPARKMAN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR SPARKMAN: In 1976 the Overseas Development Council undertook an analysis of the situation with respect to the Panama Canal and of the pros and cons of the various issues under negotiation. The results of the analysis were published in the enclosed ODC Communique. A principal conclusion was that the 1903 Treaty is an anachronism that needs to be replaced. The original treaty not only can no longer accomplish the purpose it was intended to serve but, on the contrary, threatens to jeopardize both the continual usefulness of the Canal and the intrinsic interest of the United States in its evolving relationship with the developing countries at a time when the continued well-being of the United States is increasingly dependent on their cooperation.

Concluding that the existing treaty is no longer adequate, of course, is not to say that any new treaty would be preferable.

With the signing on September 7 of the two new Panama Canal treaties, the public now has the details of the outcome of the negotiations. The results of the multi-year negotiations conducted under four Presidents are noted in the enclosed update of the earlier Communique. Considering together the earlier analysis of the issues under negotiation and the recent outcome, the current ODC analysis indicates that the new treaties are far more to the interest of the United States than continuation of the existing treaty.

I hope you will find this enclosed summary analysis useful both to yourself and in communications you may have with your constituents.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES P. GRANT,
President.

SER-JOBS FOR PROGRESS, INC.,

Hon. JOHN SPARKMAN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

ESTIMADO SENATOR SPARKMAN: National SER-Jobs for Progress, Inc., the largest employment and traininng organization serving Hispanic Americans, totally endorses the new Panama Canal Treaties.

Once again, we urge you to affirm and ratify our President's leadership, and the United States' respect for all Latin Americans.

Sinceramente,

RICARDO ZAZUETA,
National Director.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I emphasize again to the Members of the Senate that we now have set a definite date of the 26th of April by which a final vote will be taken on the Panama Canal Treaty, the permanent Neutrality Treaty having already been approved by a vote of 68 to 32. I understand it is possible that the vote may come earlier than the 26th of April, but in any event that is the definitive outside date; and as we resume this debate, I wish to thank the Senator from Idaho for again placing what is at stake here in the proper perspective.

What is at stake is whether the United States, in the latter part of the 20th century, is going to adjust in such a way to the realities of the world that we can protect our strategic and economic interests and at the same time foster and develop the harmonious relations which are so important to us in this hemisphere of the world, and indeed throughout the world; and I join with the Senator from Idaho in stressing the importance of that consideration in our deliberations on this measure.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. CHURCH. I thank the Senator from Maryland very much.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I wonder if the Senator from Alabama will accommodate me——

Mr. ALLEN. I certainly will.

Mr. CHURCH. So that I may first complete my argument, and then I will be happy to yield. I have been waiting quite patiently through the afternoon.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes. I remind the Senator from Idaho that he said earlier he was not going to make a lengthy argument.

Mr. CHURCH. I am not going to make a lengthy argument. I hope the quality will not be determined by its length, but as soon as I have completed my remarks, I will be happy to yield.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished Senator for his courtesy.

(Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. assumed the chair.)

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, tomorrow we will show that it is well established under American law and constitutional practice that property belonging to the United States may be transferred by the treaty power of article II of the Constitution. This conclusion is supported by the language of the Constitution itself, by the interpretations placed upon it by the Founding Fathers, by judicial precedents, and by the long-time treaty practice of the United States. Modern authorities on the Constitution support this view overwhelmingly.

However, I previously mentioned two points made by the Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH), that are really tangential to the principal thrust of the Senators who support the pending amendment, but which I think need to be rebutted at this time.

Page 6 of Senator HATCH's remarks, and I am quoting from the text, reads as follows:

> Already we observe that a succession of Presidents have skirted the Constitution in order to get the treaties before the Senate. The Kissinger-Tack agreement of 1974, setting forth the general principles of agreement, was never submitted to the Senate for discussion and debate. Congress has never indicated that it favors any new agreements or treaties with Panama or asked the President to make a new treaty. Presidents have simply labored at their self-appointed task in total disregard of the wishes of Congress and the American people. At no stage of the proceedings, in fact, has the Senate participated in these negotiations, or been given an opportunity to give its advice and consent until after the treaty was signed. To be sure, the Executive has bypassed the Senate, just as it is now seeking to bypass the House.

Mr. President, in all fairness I suggest that this paragraph totally misconceives the role of the Senate with respect to treaties. Under the Constitution, a treaty cannot become effective unless it is consented to by the Senate.

It is true that the Senate also has the power to advise the President, but that power is normally exercised informally. In the case of the Panamanian treaties, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee was advised of the progress made in those negotiations, and we had an opportunity to comment and to give advice to the State Department on them.

So it is simply not accurate to say we had no word of these treaties or the negotiations until they were formally laid before the Senate.

Second, the notion that the Senate has been denied its prerogative because it did not participate in the negotiations makes one think that the Senator may not be familiar with the way our Government works. The Senate has no authority to negotiate for the United States. The Constitution does not confer upon the Senate the right to participate in negotiations with foreign powers.

It is the sole and exclusive prerogative of the President to conduct negotiations with foreign nations. We simply cannot blot out 200 years of our history for purposes of scoring a debating point in connection with these treaties.

The process which has been followed in this case conforms with the practices of the past.

Certainly, the Senate did not participate in negotiations. It never does. The Constitution does not confer that authority upon the Senate. If it is necessary to quote from decisions of the Supreme Court on this question, I am happy to do so.

In the 1936 case of the United States v. Curtis-Wright Corporation, 29 U.S. 304, at page 319, the Court said:

> "[H]e [the President] alone negotiates," the Supreme Court has said. "Into the field of negotiation, the Senate cannot intrude; and Congress itself is powerless to invade it."

I am really surprised that it is necessary to recite Supreme Court decisions to underscore the fact that neither the Senate nor the House of Representatives, nor the two Houses combined, can negotiate for the United States with any foreign government. Under the separation of powers, which is the genius of our system, that particular authority is reserved to the President of the United States, and wisely so if this debate on these treaties is any example of what chaos there would be if the Constitution provided otherwise.

There is one other point made by the Senator from Utah which needs to be rebutted. On page 2 of his address, he charges:

> In effect, then, the President is now claiming for himself a new power.

The Senator argues that since the President negotiated this treaty, he is not submitting the question of the conveyance of American-owned property to the House of Representatives as well as to the Senate. Therefore he is arrogating to his office a new power not previously asserted.

As we will show tomorrow in a series of precedents dealing with previous treaties, such a charge is unsustainable. The President of the United States is not arrogating to himself a new power. He is criticized so often for so much let us at least spare him this criticism.

If he had undertaken to reach an agreement with Panama whereby American property would be transferred to the Panamanian Government, and had done so under an executive agreement, negotiated by the executive branch of the Government without reference to the Congress, then such a charge could be fairly laid upon him.

As Senators know, there are many hundreds of agreements—thousands, I should think—between the United States and foreign governments which do not take on the formality of a treaty. These executive agreements are never submitted to the Congress for its approval. This practice has grown up over the past couple of centuries for many reasons. It began with merely routine agreements of such a commonplace nature that it was thought unnecessary to consume the time of the Congress with their ratification. The Congress acquiesced in that practice. For many years it occasioned no problem, because the transactions were of a nature that would have only clogged the calendars here on the Hill for no useful purpose.

However, I have been a critic of executive agreements because in later years they came to embrace matters of such consequence, including military bases abroad, that I believed they should have taken on the formality of a treaty and should have been submitted to the Senate for its approval. For many years prior to the time the distinguished Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH) was elected to this body, I have sought to confine these executive agreements within their appropriate sphere, and often have insisted that matters of importance be brought to the Senate in treaty form so that the Constitution would not be circumvented by Presidents who wished to overreach their authority.

So I am well acquainted with this subject.

All I can say to the Senator from Utah is that this criticism is misapplied in this case. President Carter did not seek to transfer any property belonging to the United States to the Government of Panama through an executive agreement.

He chose properly to negotiate two treaties, and he brought them to the Senate for its consent. Far from attempting to arrogate to himself some new power, he was extremely conscious of his responsibility under the Constitution to present these new agreements in treaty form for the consent of the Senate. I think that much is due him, and I respect him for the scrupulous way he has respected the prerogatives of this body.

I conclude, Mr. President, by saying that we will not show a similar respect for the prerogatives of this body if we adopt the pending amendment, because we can only derogate the authority of the Senate to pass upon the treaties submitted to it by the President if we insist that this authority must now be shared with the House of Representatives. Tomorrow, we shall present to the Senate those many precedents that establish beyond any reasonable doubt that the property transfers contemplated in the treaty before us can be effectuated by action not of the President alone, but of the President in concert with the Senate, as the Constitution provides.

Now, Mr. President, I have concluded my statement and I am happy to yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH) for yielding to me at this time.

I was very much interested and pleased, as a matter of fact, to hear him make the categorical statement here, on the floor of the Senate, that the United States does own the property in the Panama Canal Zone, and for him to state that no one of the proponents of the treaties, so far as he knows, takes a different view; that that is something that is conceded and that the opponents of the treaties have used up a lot of unnecessary time in proving that fact.

The fact is that the statement has been made here, on the floor, by proponents of the treaty that we do not own the property in the Panama Canal Zone. On one occasion, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) made that statement, that we do not own the property, we rented it. I took him to task for having made that statement and pointed out that we bought the property, paid something over $4 million for it. The statement has been made by other Senators on the floor of the Senate.

I wonder if the distinguished Senator from Idaho listened to the fireside chat of President Carter, in which he was seeking to build and mold public opinion in favor of the treaties. I have before me a copy of his speech, in which he says this:

Another question is, why should we give away the Panama Canal Zone? As many people say, we bought it, we paid for it, it is ours.

This is the President speaking.

I must repeat a very important point. We do not own the Panama Canal Zone.

Said the President of the United States.

So, it is an interesting fact now that the distinguished Senator from Idaho makes the unequivocal statement that the United States does own the property in the Panama Canal Zone. Personally, I accept the view of the distinguished Senator from Idaho, and I commend him for his view. I am delighted to find an area where I do agree with the distinguished Senator in this regard.

Was the President of the United States incorrect when he made that statement? That is my question of the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH).

Mr. CHURCH. I was waiting for the Senator's question; had, in fact, anticipated it.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, and now you have it.

Mr. CHURCH. First, I want to say I take considerable consolation in the fact that the Senator from Alabama and I have found an area of agreement.

Mr. ALLEN. We agree on many things. I was merely teasing the distinguished Senator.

Mr. CHURCH. Of course we do.

I think the confusion on this matter arises from the fact that ownership does not equal sovereignty. Oftentimes in this debate, "ownership" has been used as a substitute word for "sovereignty."

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. CHURCH. And, I might say, vice versa.

Mr. ALLEN. So the President was confused, then, is that it?

Mr. CHURCH. No, I think that the President's meaning was that the United States, as I previously mentioned, never formally claimed sovereignty over the Panama Canal Zone.

Mr. ALLEN. I am not talking about sovereignty. I did not use that word. I just asked about the ownership.

Mr. CHURCH. The Senator asked me whether the President was incorrect and I am trying to interpret the President's meaning.

As I said, we do not always use words precisely. This may not be a fault of the Senator from Alabama, but it is a common fault. Ownership and sovereignty have often been confused in the course of this debate.

I could have responded to the arguments made this afternoon by giving the Senate my own analysis of the state of the title held by the United States to differing parts of the Canal Zone. I think it would be useful for me to do so at this time, since so much has been made of the legal pedigree upon which our titles rest.

The United States owns property in the Canal Zone. The facilities used in connection with the operation and defense of the canal, as well as facilities used by other agencies of the United States in the zone, are property belonging to the United States. However, the exact status of the title to much of the land in the zone is cloudy. We believe we have good title to the land originally held by the Panama Railroad, comprising roughly one-third of the zone. About another one-third of the zone is land for which we paid damages to private owners in accordance with a procedure established in the 1903 treaty. We consider the remaining lands to be public lands of Panama over which we have use rights in perpetuity under the treaty.

It would, however, be practically impossible to determine from the available records the precise state of the title to any particular parcel of land in the zone.

In addition, Panama has disputed the assertion that we have title to any of these lands.

So I think that is the exact position of the U.S. Government with respect to the question of legal title to lands within the zone.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator is saying now that we own some and we have a right in perpetuity to others and that the title is cloudy, which is at great variance with what he said just a moment ago, it would seem to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I will yield in just a moment.

I think that for purposes of the debate, the point I sought to stress earlier was that the question of title and the way that we derived it is not central to the issue.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand what the Senator is saying. I agree.

Mr. CHURCH. The issue before us, even if we assume that all of the land in the zone was indisputably owned by the United States——

Mr. ALLEN. That is what the Senator said a moment ago, that we did——

Mr. CHURCH. Even then, it seems to me to be irrelevant, because what we are seeking to do in this treaty is to recognize that the Panamanians have legitimate grievances. We are seeking to work out a new arrangement with them that will serve the interests of the United States between now and the end of the century, and then, in perpetuity, in retaining the use of this canal. This includes the direct management of the canal between now and the end of the century, and its assured peaceful and neutral use in the years beyond.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CHURCH. I think that is the issue.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. CHURCH. Not whether we have claims to title to particular parcels of land and what the derivation of those claims might be.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator now is shedding a lot of doubt on the ownership, having had the President's speech quoted to him, when just a moment ago he was of the very firm belief that we had title to all of the property in the Canal Zone.

Mr. President, I would not care to question the distinguished Senator any further and, if he is ready to yield the floor, I would like recognition.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I will yield the floor in just a moment.

Let me say that I was aware of the President's speech before the distinguished Senator from Alabama questioned me. I answered him in a way I thought to be accurate, namely, that the President referred in his speech to the fact that the United States never formally claimed sovereignty over the Canal Zone.

Of course, as the Senator knows, even though we may have exercised all the rights of a colonial power, we never have formally claimed the sovereignty over the zone.

I think that is what the President referred to because, if we take that sentence within the context of the rest of his remarks, we cannot interpret it any other way.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHURCH. Yes, I am happy to.

Mr. SARBANES. I think the last point the Senator from Idaho made is absolutely on point. In fairness to the President we ought to quote exactly what he said in the fireside chat on this point.

The President was addressing himself to this assertion made by some opponents of the canal treaties that we bought it, we paid for it, it is ours. In other words, he was addressing this assertion that a lot of people are making which mixes up the whole question of title in terms of ownership and sovereignty and jurisdiction, and all of the bundle of rights that go together to define the control that we exercise over property.

I am going to quote the President from beginning to end on this point and then I want to comment. The President said the following in his fireside address on February 1 of this year:

Another question is: Why should we give away the Panama Canal Zone? As many people say, "We bought it; we paid for it; it is ours."

I must repeat a very important point. We do not own the Panama Canal Zone. We have never had sovereignty over it. We have only had the right to use it.

The Canal Zone cannot be compared with United States territory. We bought Alaska from the Russians and no one has ever doubted that we own it. We bought the Louisiana Purchase Territories from France, and that is an integral part of the United States

From the beginning we have made an annual payment to Panama to use their land. You do not pay rent on your own land.

Mr. ALLEN. What is that? Would the Senator read that sentence over? I did not quite get it.

Mr. SARBANES. I will be happy to read the whole of it, if the Senator wants.

Mr. ALLEN. No, just the sentence.

Mr. SARBANES. I was trying to read it word for word. Does the Senator suggest I did not do so?

Mr. ALLEN. No. I just wondered if he would repeat that sentence.

Mr. SARBANES (reading from the address):

From the beginning we have made an annual payment to Panama to use their land. You do not pay rent on your own land.

The Panama Canal has always been Panamanian territory. The U.S. Supreme Court and previous American Presidents have repeatedly acknowledged the sovereignty of Panama over the Canal Zone.

We have never needed to own the Panama Canal Zone, any more than we need to own a ten-mile-wide strip of land all the way through Canada to Alaska when we build an international gas pipeline.

The new treaties give us what we do need—not ownership of the Canal but the right to use it and to protect it. As the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff has said, "The strategic value of the Canal lies in its use."

Now, that is the end of the quotation from the President's address.

I think it is clear that the President is addressing the assertion that the Canal Zone is in some way on all fours with the purchase of Alaska or the Louisiana Purchase.

Now, that is clearly not the case. We did not assume in the Canal Zone all of the bundle of property rights that we assumed with the Louisiana Purchase or with the purchase of Alaska.

There is the important matter of reserved sovereignty to the Republic of Panama. There is the matter of continuing annual payments by the United States to the Republic of Panama, for the right to continue to use this land that divides the Republic of Panama and through which the canal passes, for the right to make use of the Canal Zone.

So I think what the President was addressing is that entire problem and in that light, I think the statement he has made is accurate.

The distinguished Senator from Idaho has discussed the legal question of ownership and pointed out that, while it is true that we made certain payments to private people who owned land in what became the Canal Zone, such land involved only a minority portion of the Canal Zone area. This land was in private hands, to whom we made private payments, and the 1903 treaty has an extensive provision for how we make those damage payments.

Much of the other land was public lands of the Republic of Panama and we have been making use of them ever since for the purpose of operating the canal.

We have, of course, been paying to Panama every year under the 1903 treaty a yearly payment which has been adjusted a couple of times over the course of the history of our relationship with the Republic of Panama.

On the very narrow question of ownership it must be recognized that the payments to private parties did not begin even to approximate the total land area over which the United States assumed control in the Canal Zone for the purpose of operating the canal.

I think that the President's comments, which I fully quoted in order to get them in the RECORD so that one can have the benefit of a full perspective, ran to this broader question, whereby some people have asserted that the United States holds a position with respect to our rights in the Canal Zone which is equivalent to the rights we acquired in the Louisiana Purchase or when we bought Alaska from the Russians. I believe that is clearly not the case. We do not have that kind of property rights in the Canal Zone. We never have asserted it. The other areas were brought into the United States as an integral part of the country.

If foreigners have children in the area that formerly constituted the Louisiana Purchase or in Alaska, those children are American citizens. That is not the case in the Canal Zone. If Panamanians or other foreigners have children in the Canal Zone, those children do not become American citizens by virtue of their birth in the zone.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator is talking sovereignty now, rather than ownership.

Mr. CHURCH. The President was talking sovereignty, too. I agree fully with what the Senator from Maryland said. If the President's remarks are read within the context of the speech, it is clear he was making the point that whatever rights the United States has in the Canal Zone, they are not the equivalent of the rights we acquired in the Louisiana Purchase or the purchase of Alaska. They are not to be confused with rights we exercise over the Virgin Islands or Guam, which are territories of the States.

He was attempting to say, in his own words—and if one reads the paragraphs, it is clear what his meaning was—that the Panama Canal Zone is not an American territory. He is supported in every particular in that assertion.

Even the 1903 treaty, which we drafted ourselves and imposed upon Panama, does not make that claim for the United States. The practices to which the Senator from Maryland referred simply confirm the fact that the Panama Canal Zone is not American territory and never has been. Ownership of lands within the zone is quite a different matter.

I am the owner of a suburban house in the State of Maryland. Actually, I have finished paying the mortgage, so I do not even share that ownership any more with the savings and loan association. I tell my wife every night, "This year we own this property, after 20 years of mortgage payments." She thinks that means we should sell. I think it means we should keep the property. We have this continuing argument.

Mr. ALLEN. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. CHURCH. But I do not think either of us is operating under any illusion that our ownership of that property renders us immune from the sovereign authority of the State of Maryland or the sovereign authority of the United States.

If the State of Maryland decides to build a highway 16 lanes wide right through my residential district, my ownership of that property is going to be eradicated by the sovereign assertion of the authority of the State of Maryland, under its right of eminent domain.

Mr. SARBANES. As a Senator from Maryland, I assure the Senator that should the State seek to do that, I am prepared to lend my good offices to the Senator to aid in protecting his homestead.

Mr. CHURCH. I may need those services. But I am certain that if the Highway Department of the State of Maryland makes that decision, nothing can save my property from the bulldozer.

Furthermore, although I am the owner of that property, I do not suffer under the illusion that I do not have to pay real property taxes both to the State of Maryland and to Montgomery County; and if I failed to do that, I would find that my ownership soon would be subject to considerable peril, since it would not take long for the State to step in and seize the title.

So everybody knows the difference between the ownership of property and the exercise of sovereign power. Sovereign power is exercised by governments. Never, not from 1903 to the present day, has the United States ever formally claimed sovereignty over the Panama Canal Zone. Never have we said it was a territory of the United States, even though the treaty of 1903 gave us the prerogatives of managing the land as though we were sovereign.

This, of course, has been the nub of all the difficulty. It has caused the resentment that one would expect as times changed and as small countries everywhere in the world began to assert jurisdiction over their own territories.

So the time of reckoning has come to us, Mr. President. It comes to us in the form of these treaties. We have known since 1964 that the time of reckoning would come, that the United States could not preserve a colony in a world where colonies have disappeared, that in the end we would have to acknowledge to Panama what we claimed for ourselves from the days of Lexington and Concord—the right to our own independence and sovereign control over our own lands. We cannot live by the double standard indefinitely.

This treaty will set right what for so long has been wrong in the relationship between the most powerful nation of the world and one of the smallest and weakest nations. It will lay the basis for a cooperative management and operation of the canal which will greatly serve the interests of the United States and contribute immensely to the improvement of our relations not only with Panama but also with all the other countries of the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. I want to come back to the point of ownership, because I think it is important.

Under the 1903 treaty, the United States paid a little more than $4 million—which I think was the figure the Senator from Alabama alluded to at an earlier point—to owners of private land in the area that became the Canal Zone. By paying that money to private owners, we did not then own that land in the same way that a nation owns lands when it buys it from another nation. If the Republic of France or if Great Britain were to come to the United States and pay private owners of land and buy the land, they would acquire the private rights of those owners, but they would not acquire rights over that land equivalent to what the United States holds as the country under whose jurisdiction and whose sovereignty that land is to be found.

So the fact that we paid more than $4 million to private holders for their interests does not give us a claim to the land that those private people had, with respect to the Republic of Panama, which establishes us as the nation that holds that land instead of the Republic of Panama.

With respect to the remainder of that land, much of it is public land of the Republic of Panama, for which we make payment and have made payment year in and year out. We never have contended that we hold the Canal Zone in a way equivalent to that in which we hold the Louisiana Purchase or Alaska. That is not the bundle of rights we acquired in the Canal Zone; and the President, in his speech, was speaking of the view that we own it in the same way. He talked about both ownership and sovereignty and went on to develop his argument from that point.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SARBANES. No. The Senator, earlier today—and I must say to the Senator that it was much to my disappointment—at the outset of his extended text, which he read for some 2½ hours, made it very clear that he wanted no interruptions and no questions.

Mr. HATCH. If the Senator does it that way I am happy not to interrupt, but the Senator wishes to argue.

Mr. SARBANES. I simply wish to say to the Senator that then puts us in the position of having one assertion after another made with no opportunity at the time to comment.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Regular order is called for.

Mr. CHURCH. I assume by that that the Senator from Alabama——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator yielded for a question.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Idaho has the floor.

Mr. CHURCH. The Senator from Alabama wishes to make the point that I have the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. And yielded only for a question, not a harangue.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho has the floor.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator not agree that as to the President's statement, upon a full reading with respect to this issue, the President was clearly addressing questions of ownership and sovereignty taken together; he was really addressing the assertion that people have made which seeks to see in the Panama Canal Zone the equivalent of the Louisiana Purchase or the Alaska Purchase?

Mr. CHURCH. I agree fully, and I do not see how anyone could read the President's remarks and interpret them differently.

Mr. SARBANES. If the Senator will yield further, the President has been much put upon in this debate today. The Senator earlier pointed out in discussing the amendment that is pending that the President is in no way seeking to extend executive authority. It has been implied that that is the case.

But has not the President come to the Senate to seek the approval of the Senate; in fact he comes with a treaty requiring the extraordinary majority of a two-thirds vote in the Senate of the United States?

Mr. CHURCH. Yes. Earlier I described the trend toward the use of executive agreements in place of treaties where the subject matter was not purely routine in character but related to matters of great importance. I have been one of the most vocal critics in the Senate of this practice. I regard it as an abuse of the executive agreement and, at times, a means of circumventing the Senate, and I have said so on this floor on many occasions in the past.

But in this case the President has done none of that. He neither attempted to enter into an executive agreement, which he might or might not have submitted to Congress, nor did he use the device of an executive agreeement in combination with a request for the consent of both Houses. That requires only a majority vote and has frequently been used to avoid the hurdle of the two-thirds vote required for the Senate to ratify a treaty. He did not take any of those courses of action which previous Presidents have taken to avoid the difficulty of a two-thirds vote in the Senate.

He did it the hard way. He did it the honest way. He did it the way that totally complies not only with the express provisions of the Constitution but with a proper observance of its spirit. And I just do not think there is any basis on which he can be properly criticized on that score.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield.

Mr. SARBANES. We have received a letter signed by 15 leading constitutional authorities, distinguished deans of law schools and professors of constitutional law, a letter addressed to the Congress of the United States, which says the following:

We have been informed that the constitutional validity of the new Panama Canal Treaty has been questioned by several lawyers who have claimed that the United States may transfer its property only by legislation enacted by Congress and may not transfer its property by treaty.

We respectfully submit that such a claim is erroneous.

The Constitution unequivocally permits transfer by treaty of property belonging to the United States. The treaty power, and the power of Congress under Article IV, Section 3, Clause 2 of the Constitution, are concurrent powers, and either may be used to transfer property.

The treaty power extends to all proper subjects of negotiation with foreign nations; a transfer of United States property is such a subject, and accordingly may be effected by treaty.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this letter and the signatories to it, who encompass the deans and the professors of constitutional law of some of the Nation's outstanding law schools, be printed in the RECORD so the Senate may have the full benefit of the statement.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TO THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES:

We have been informed that the constitutional validity of the new Panama Canal Treaty has been questioned by several lawyers who have claimed that the United States may transfer its property only by legislation enacted by Congress and may not transfer its property by treaty.

We respectfully submit that such a claim is erroneous.

The Constitution unequivocally permits transfer by treaty of property belonging to the United States. The treaty power, and the power of Congress under Article IV, Section 3, Clause 2 of the Constitution, are concurrent powers, and either may be used to transfer property.

The treaty power extends to all proper subjects of negotiation with foreign nations; a transfer of United States property is such a subject, and accordingly may be effected by treaty.

Respectfully,

The foregoing letter is signed by the following:

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, to conclude my remarks, I quote from article II, section 2, clause 2 of the Constitution which reads:

The President shall have power by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

From the outset this provision has been construed as conferring upon the Senate the exclusive authority to approve treaties.

The Committee on Foreign Relations outlined the contours of the treaty power thusly in a 1902 report:

The power of the President and the Senate is derived from the Constitution. There is under our system no other source of treaty-making power. The Congress is without power to grant to the President or to the Senate any authority in respect of treaties, nor does the Congress possess any power to fetter or limit in any way the President or the Senate in the exercise of its constitutional function. It cannot enlarge or in anywise limit or attach conditions to the exercise of the treaty-making power.

Whether the treaty is one which is self-executing or one which requires legislation by the Congress to give it effect, it must first, in any event, be negotiated by the President and ratified by the Senate. Whether he will negotiate a treaty and when and what its terms shall be are matters committed by the Constitution entirely to the discretion of the President; and whether the Senate will advise and consent to it, with or without amendment, is a matter committed entirely to the discretion of the Senate.

It is that constitutional system that we seek to preserve. It has served this country well for 200 years, and I hope we do not undermine it by adopting the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN).

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Chair.

A moment ago I sought recognition or I sought to get the distinguished Senator from Idaho to yield to me, and I was going to make a comment in a somewhat jocular vein, I suppose, when he said that each night be told his lovely wife Bethine that they had their house paid for there in Maryland. While I am sure Bethine would have been glad to have heard that the first time, I rather imagine on the second, third, fourth, and fifth times that the distinguished Senator from Idaho told her, that she would have become a little bit bored by that information. I would merely wish to call the distinguished Senator's attention to his statement when I sought to get him to yield a moment ago.

But I was somewhat surprised after the distinguished Senator from Idaho stated he was ready to yield the floor, and he yielded for a question, when I propounded that question about what the President said with respect to the United States not owning the property in the Panama Canal Zone, that the distinguished Senator from Idaho and the distinguished Senator from Maryland (Mr. SARBANES) each climbed on their respective horses and galloped off in all four directions.

They were somewhat taken aback by having stated here on the floor, the distinguished Senator from Idaho having stated on the floor, that the matter of ownership of the property in the Canal Zone was conceded, that we do own the property in the Canal Zone, and that no person, the distinguished Senator from Idaho said, proposing the agreement on these treaties takes any different view, that that is the view of everybody on the side of the proponents of the treaties, when I called attention to the statement of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) that we just rented the property, and I notice the President states that you do not pay rent on your own land. So then they started talking about sovereignty, the President was talking about sovereignty.

Well, I accept as correct that we do own the property in the Canal Zone. That would then only leave the question of whether we are going to follow the provisions of article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution that gives Congress the power to dispose of property of the United States. So that is the only question remaining. The distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH) has stated and conceded that we do own the property.

Then when I called attention to the fact that the President was saying we did not own the property, they then said, "Well, we own some of it and have some of it in perpetuity, and we do not have any sovereignty over any of it," they say.

Well, who says anything about sovereignty? Only they do by making reference to something in the President's speech. The question of sovereignty does not have a thing in the world to do with it. It is a question of ownership of property. That is the question.

No one I know of feels it is necessary that you have sovereignty over land, sovereignty on the part of the United States, to trigger the application of article IV, section 3, clause 2. It is ownership by the United States of property.

Now, the distinguished Senator from Idaho said quite some time ago he was not going to make his speech tonight, and I am not going to make my speech tonight, I will fake my speech tomorrow, but I do wish to comment on another statement the distinguished Senator made, and I believe he has the matter of negotiation of a treaty and the Senate's right or lack of right to negotiate a treaty confused with the Senate's undoubted right to advise and consent with respect to a treaty.

No one that I know of contends that Senators should sit down at a negotiating table with Mr. Linowitz and Mr. Bunker and negotiate the treaty or negotiate the amendments, if any, that the Senate adds to a treaty.

I will say this: I believe any two Senators here would have negotiated a better treaty for the United States than Ambassador Bunker and pseudo-Ambassador Linowitz, 6-month Ambassador Linowitz, came up with. I believe they would have protected the interests of the American taxpayer better than Ambassador Bunker and interim Ambassador Linowitz, I will say charitably.

But that is not the point. The Senate does not negotiate the treaty; the Executive does that. That is conceded. But then the treaty is submitted to the U.S. Senate for its advice and consent or its nonassent, if it wishes to do that. It is not bound to consent. Advise, yes, but the advice might be to turn it down; that might be the advice. The advice might be nonassent or the advice might be to modify the treaty and offer amendments.

I will say that the distinguished Senator from Idaho has been absolutely consistent, absolutely consistent on the matter of the necessity to rubberstamp these treaties.

He has not left any doubt whatsoever of his position: "Don't change it at all."

Shall we say, "Well, what about the leadership amendments?" Well, I would not brag about the leadership amendments, I do not believe. All they did was to put into the treaties the language of the memorandum of agreement that had been reached between the President and the dictator, and they were just full of faults and loopholes, and yet no amendments were allowed to the leadership amendments. Except for those amendments, the leadership stonewalled against any other amendments, and would not agree to a single amendment. The distinguished Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE) said they would not even agree to put the word "American" in there. And they would not. They said, "Oh, that would cause the defeat of the treaties."

Who knows what it would cause? I have stated here on the floor that in my judgment—and I guess I have as much right to have a judgment as the leadership has—in my judgment, Torrijos would accept any amendment that does not cut down on the $100 million a year that would be paid to his regime under these treaties. He has a one-man government, and who would we be to say that he did not comply with the Panamanian constitutional processes? If he said he did, how could we question it? Moreover, as the distinguished Senator from New York (Mr. JAVITS) has pointed out, a treaty cannot be attacked collaterally.

But getting back to the matter of the Senate not having the right to negotiate, there is not any right to negotiate, but the Senate has a right that is just as important, and that is the right of advice and consent, or advice and nonassent.

If you take the position of the distinguished Senator from Idaho, that if you offer amendments you are negotiating, and we cannot negotiate, that would seem to indicate that an amendment would be out of order, because that would be negotiating.

Well, the Senate has a very elaborate procedure regarding treaties. I assume that we would not have a rule unless it had some purpose. Read rule XXXVII, telling that the treaty goes to the Committee of the Whole, when it shall be proceeded with by articles, and the amendments reported by the committee shall be first acted upon.

The Foreign Relations Committee did not come up with a single amendment, not one. There was not a single committee amendment. These treaties, both of them, are letter perfect as far as committee amendments are concerned. Yes, they recommended the leadership amendments, but aside from that they were letter perfect.

But the rules of the Senate do contemplate possible amendments:

The amendments reported by the committee shall be first acted upon, after which other amendments may be proposed; and when through with, the proceedings had as in Committee of the Whole shall be reported to the Senate, when the question shall be, if the treaty be amended, "Will the Senate concur in the amendments made in Committee of the Whole?"

That is not negotiating; that is following the rules of the Senate with respect to amendments to perfect the treaty, to make it a better treaty, to protect the interests of the taxpayers, to protect our right to defend the canal. Those are the types of amendments that have been before the Senate, and have been turned down.

And the amendments may be taken separately, or in gross, if no Senator shall object; after which new amendments may be proposed.

We short circuited this by unanimous-consent agreement, saying we should stay in Committee of the Whole after we came out to the floor. That was perfectly all right, and it did save time.

The decisions thus made shall be reduced to the form of a resolution of ratification, with or without amendments.

I merely call attention to these portions of rule XXXVII to show that the rules contemplate that amendments may be offered; and if amendments may be offered amendments may be accepted. That is still not negotiating; but the distinguished Senator from Idaho seems to think that if we pass an amendment here, we are doing something we should not do, and that is negotiating. I believe he has the two processes confused, giving our advice and consent, or our advice and nonassent, to the President with respect to a treaty. This would be embodied in shaping and molding that treaty. That is not negotiating. We would not have any contact whatsoever with the Panamanian Government. If the treaty goes back to the negotiating table, no Member of the Senate would be there. The Senate would not be negotiating. It would unilaterally be giving its advice to the President. He is the man we advise; we do not advise Torrijos, we advise the President. Then the process would be that the Panamanian Government, by their constitutional processes, be it an additional plebiscite or be it acceptance by the dictator, would accept or reject these amendments.

If the amendments were rejected by the dictator, or rejected by the Panamanian people in a plebiscite, the treaty would be dead, and we would have to start over at the negotiating table. But the Senate will not negotiate; all the Senate does is give its advice and consent or nonassent to the President.

So I hope that Senators will not feel that the statement that the Senate shall not negotiate means that it cannot agree to amendments and send the treaty thus amended on to Panama. But apparently if we have an amendment under consideration, the argument is made that we cannot agree to such amendment, because the Senate cannot negotiate.

No one says that the Senate can negotiate. But it can certainly carry out its duty and responsibility to advise the President of the United States, and that advice will not be just in the form of saying, "Why, Mr. President, we believe the negotiators could have done a better job." That is not the way it is done.

It is done by perfecting the treaty by amendments. So the point I am making, Mr. President, is that I do not feel that the managers of the treaty, the leadership, should stonewall against amendments. My only concern is the amendment that we have before us.

It is my contention, and the contention of those of us who are trying to perfect this treaty, that action by the House, along with the Senate, in a legislative enactment by statute is necessary before property of the United States can be disposed of.

Inasmuch as we do have the amendment before us, it might be well to read this amendment. It is short. It is only eight lines long, but it is an important amendment. I believe, Mr. President, that it will receive the highest vote yet that those of us who sought to strengthen these treaties have obtained on any of our amendments.

At the end of article I it adds the following new section:

5. It is expressly provided that this Treaty shall, in no event, enter into force until the Congress of the United States, in accordance with the provisions of Article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution of the United States of America, shall have disposed of, or shall have authorized the disposition of, the property belonging to the United States of America, or of any of its agencies in the Panama Canal Zone, as it existed on September 7, 1977.

That date was chosen because it is the date the treaties were signed by the President and the dictator.

This is a matter where the argument cannot be made that this amendment would kill the treaties. It cannot be made, properly and successfully. Even the distinguished Senator from Idaho could not make that argument. I will tell you why, Mr. President. If this amendment is agreed to, this step provided here would have to take place before the treaty would be sent to Panama. It is nothing that Panama is required to do. It places no burden upon Panama. This burden is placed on the managers of the treaty from our side of the negotiating table. This does not require any action whatsoever by Panama, not one single step is required.

There is really nothing in which they could find fault in the United States being required to take some action, not Panama. This does not require Panama to take any action at all. So the argument cannot properly be made, it seems to the Senator from Alabama, that this would require action which would be offensive to the Panamanian national dignity and, for that reason, dangerous to agree to. This merely says that the Congress must first authorize the disposition of this property before the treaty can go into force and effect. The Panamanian Government would be called upon to take no action whatsoever.

Mr. President, the Members of the House of Representatives, some 235, according to my understanding, have introduced and sponsored House Concurrent Resolution No. 347, saying:

It is the sense of the Congress of the United States that any right to, title to, or interest in a property of United States Government agencies in the Panama Canal Zone, or any real property and improvements thereon located in the zone, should not be conveyed, relinquished, or otherwise disposed of, to any foreign government without specific authorization for such conveyance, relinquishment, or other disposition by an act of Congress.

The House of Representatives takes the position, at least 235 Members of the House because it has that many sponsors, well over half of the Members of the House, that there must be an act of Congress to authorize the disposition of the property of the United States in the Panama Canal Zone.

Why would the leadership and the managers of the treaty here on the floor slap the House of Representatives? "No, we are not going to send it over to you."

Let me read something from the 1955 treaty to show how treaties with Panama have been handled before. Read article V of the 1955 treaty with Panama. I might say, in the 1955 treaty with Panama they did not have that Colombian firing squad that Mr. CHURCH talks about so much, that these Panamanian Government people faced a Colombian firing squad if they did not go ahead and agree to the 1903 treaty. All the firing squad members had passed onto their reward. This is 52 years later. If there were not sovereign states dealing at arm's length before in 1903, we certainly had them in 1955.

Let us see what article V says about the 1955 treaty providing for the disposition of certain property in Panama. The very first line:

The United States of America agrees that, subject to the enactment of legislation by Congress, there shall be conveyed . . . the right, title and interest—

This is what they did in 1955. Why not do the same this time? All right.

On down in the middle of the article—and the determination by the United States of America respecting the same, subject to the enactment of legislation by the Congress—

Going down farther:

The United States of America also agrees that, subject to the enactment of legislation by the Congress, there shall be conveyed to the Republic of Panama free of cost all its right, title and interest to the land and improvements in the area known as Paitilla Point . . . Subject to legislation enacted by the Congress.

What about the course of dealings? That is what was done in 1955 with Panama. The agreements they made to convey property to Panama were made conditioned on the approval of those conveyances by the Congress. No one contends that the Congress is anything other than the House of Representatives and the U.S. Senate. So if we are going to follow precedent, we certainly see that a statute is enacted, agreed to, of course, by both Houses of Congress and signed by the President, authorizing this transfer.

Mr. President, I should hate to be party to action by the U.S. Senate, slapping the composite face of the House of Representatives, the Members of the House of Representatives, 235 House Members, saying, "Have an act of Congress before this property is disposed of and given to Panama."

There should be comity between the Houses. We all recognize that. We respect their rights. They respect ours. We are not even allowed, under the custom prevailing here, to even refer to action by the other body. We cannot properly make reference to anything that takes place over in the House. So why should we say to the House of Representatives that this is a Senate show entirely, the House has no place in it? That is not conducive to comity between the two Houses.

Nor is it conducive to the free flow of legislation between the Houses. Many Senators who are going to vote against this amendment—vote to table it, I daresay—may, from time to time, have bills in which they are interested, that they would like the House to give a favorable vote to. But will they, after we stonewall again on this issue and say to the House that, even though Congress has the power to dispose of property of the United States, we feel that there is an alternate power over here that the Senate has that the House does not have—that we can dispose of this property by treaty, no matter how much it is, no matter how much of a giveaway it is, no matter how much the rights of the people are involved?

Here is a piece of property that has a replacement value—not counting the 500 square miles of land, the canal itself has a replacement value of some $10 billion. Well, if the Senate and the President can, by treaty, give away property of the United States, where can that power end? Suppose, as a good neighbor policy, it is decided that we took advantage of Mexico and took that property away from them after the Mexican War and we entered into a treaty with Mexico giving back a large portion of Texas. Would that take House action? Where does it end? There is no end in sight. If we can give this property away by the executive and the Senate, then there is no end to that power.

Now, Mr. President, I am encouraged by the fact that, in 1975, a resolution was offered in the Senate, with 37 cosponsors, in which it was stated that the Panama Canal should not be given to Panama, and in which it was stated that article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution controlled in this area. Let me read the recital of the resolution. It says there would be no recession—receding, that is—of the property in the Panama Canal Zone to Panama unless authorized by an act of Congress. That is what the resolution provided.

Mr. President, I found on that resolution the names of eight Senators who voted for the Neutrality Treaty. I hope they will not vote for the Panama Canal Treaty. Eight Senators who, in 1975, said we should not give the canal away and, if we did, it required House action as well, eight Senators who took that position then, then voted for the Neutrality Treaty.

Mr. President, I mentioned that matter to the distinguished majority leader on the floor. I called his attention to the fact that, at one time, he was against these treaties. He said,

> Well, yes, but I had not seen the treaties then and, as soon as I read them and studied them, I thought they were in the best interests of the country and I agreed to support them.

What about the constitutional question, Mr. President? Your view on the advisability of giving the canal away is one thing, but what about the expressed view on the constitutional question as contained in that resolution? How could that change? If the Constitution required it at the time that resolution was offered by 37 Senators, eight of them treaty supporters—Neutrality Treaty supporters, that is—if the Constitution required action by the House, action by the entire Congress, in 1975, the Constitution has not changed. Why would it not require it in the year 1978?

It would require it, Mr. President. If, to comply with the Constitution, it took an act of Congress in 1975, as stated by these 37 Senators, 8 of whom supported the Neutrality Treaty, I would hope that they would support the view that they had in 1975 and support this amendment.

How could a Senator say, "I thought in 1975 that it required House action," and how could they say then in 1978 that it does not require House action?

I do not believe those eight Senators are going to be that inconsistent, Mr. President, and, if they are not, there is a good chance then that this amendment will be approved.

Now what does the administration fear? It would just take a majority vote there in the House, two-thirds over here. Why would they not be willing to submit it?

Mr. President, efforts have been made to bring lawsuits on this question. The Supreme Court said they are premature, or they involve action between Houses. But once the treaty has been approved by the Senate, the Resolution of Ratification agreed to by the Senate, notes exchanged between the heads of the two governments and the treaty becomes law, I do not feel that the Supreme Court then could say that the Court has no jurisdiction of that matter, or that it is premature, or that it is action between the Houses, and we are going to have this treaty or the transfer of the property tied up, in all possibility, for months and years to come.

Mr. President, it would seem to me to be the better part of wisdom to start with a statute, start with legislation looking to the enactment of a statute to follow article IV, section 3, clause 2, of the Constitution, which gives to the Congress the power to dispose of the property of the United States.

I was somewhat amused when the statement was made here on the floor by the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH) that, "Oh, yes, we own the property there, nobody disputes that." Then when I pointed out that the President had said that we do not own the Canal Zone, they started talking about sovereignty this, that and the other, that he was talking sovereignty, that he was talking about comparing it with the Louisiana Purchase. That went on for quite a few minutes, seeking to harmonize their statement with the President's statement.

I must say that I am unconvinced, I am willing to accept, however, the statement of the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH) that the United States does own this property, which we have been contending all along. I do not know just why they come forward with that admission or concession, but it is interesting.

I am glad that point can be laid aside, though we began to wonder just what the position was after the President's statement on TV had been cranked into the equation. At the same time, we will accept the original statement.

As the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH) and I have both said, we will make our speeches on tomorrow. But we have had the opportunity to discuss portions of this point. The hour being late, I yield the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PROXMIRE). The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALLEN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The following request occurred during Mr. ALLEN's remarks and is printed here by unanimous consent.)

ORDER DESIGNATING PERIOD FOR TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when Senator ALLEN yields the floor today, there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, as in legislative session, with statements therein to be limited to 10 minutes and the period to be limited to 30 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend beyond 30 minutes, with speeches therein limited to 10 minutes each.

MESSSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT RECEIVED DURING RECESS

Under authority of the order of March 23, 1978, the Secretary of the Senate, on March 27 and March 28, 1978, received messages from the President of the United States.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the President pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations received on March 27 and March 28, 1978, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations received on March 27 and March 28, 1978, see the end of Senate proceedings today.)

BUDGET OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 159

Under authority of the order of March 23, 1978, the Secretary of the Senate, on March 27, 1978, received the following message from the President of the United States which, with the accompanying document, was referred to the Committee on Governmental Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the District of Columbia Self-Government and Governmental Reorganization Act, I am transmitting for your consideration the budget of the District of Columbia for fiscal year 1979.

REPORT ON THE STATUS OF ADVISORY COMMITTEES—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 160

Under authority of the order of March 23, 1978, the Secretary of the Senate, on March 27, 1978, received the following message from the President of the United States which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Governmental Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the provisions of Section 6(c) of the Federal Advisory Committee Act, I am transmitting the sixth annual report on the status of Advisory Committees.

This report reflects the results of the 1977 governmentwide, zero-base review that I directed be conducted of all advisory committees:

—The total number of committees was reduced to 875 from 1,159 at the end of 1976.

—While some new committees were established during the year, some 333 committees were terminated, and the number was reduced further by 81 as the result of the consolidation of existing committees.

While we recognize the contributions that advisory committees can make we will continue our efforts to assure, through careful management and review, that such committees are terminated when they no longer are necessary, and that new committees are established only when they are essential to meet the responsibilities of the Government.

REPORT OF HEALTH ACTIVITIES UNDER THE FEDERAL COAL MINE HEALTH AND SAFETY ACT—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 161

Under authority of the order of March 23, 1978, the Secretary of the Senate, on March 27, 1978, received the following message from the President of the United States which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Human Resources:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith the 1975 Annual Report of Health Activities under the Federal Coal Mine Health and Safety Act of 1969.

I recommend that the statutory reporting requirement for this report be changed from once every year to once every three years. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare staff resources and time could be better spent on more research rather than on the preparation of annual reports of largely repetitious material. Basic information in this field has been known for some time, and new findings develop only slowly and infrequently. All of the information contained in this report is available to Congress during annual appropriations and oversight hearings, and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare will inform Congress immediately of any scientific breakthroughs in the field.

PROPOSED COMPREHENSIVE NATIONAL URBAN POLICY—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 162

Under authority of the order of March 23, 1978, the Secretary of the Senate, on March 27, 1978, received the following message from the President of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, the Committee on Governmental Affairs, the Committee on Finance, the Committee on Environment and Public Works, and the Committee on Human Resources, jointly, by unanimous consent:

To the Congress of the United States:

I submit today my proposals for a comprehensive national urban policy. These proposals set a policy framework for actions my Administration has already taken, for proposed new initiatives, and for our efforts to assist America's communities and their residents in the years to come. The policy represents a comprehensive, long-term commitment to the Nation's urban areas.

The urban policy I am announcing today will build a New Partnership involving all levels of government, the private sector, and neighborhood and voluntary organizations in a major effort to make America's cities better places in which to live and work. It is a comprehensive policy aimed both at making cities more healthy and improving the lives of the people who live in them.

The major proposals will:

Improve the effectiveness of existing Federal programs by coordinating these programs, simplifying planning requirements, reorienting resources, and reducing paperwork. And the proposals will make Federal actions more supportive of the urban policy effort and develop a process for analyzing the urban and community impact of all major Federal initiatives.

Provide employment opportunities, primarily in the private sector, to the long-term unemployed and the disadvantaged in cities. This will be done through a labor intensive public works program and tax and other incentives for business to hire the long-term unemployed.

Provide fiscal relief to the most hard-pressed communities.

Provide strong incentives to attract private investment to distressed communities, including the creation of a National Development Bank, expanded grant programs and targeted tax incentives.

Encourage States to become partners in assisting urban areas through a new incentive grant program.

Stimulate greater involvement by neighborhood organizations and voluntary associations through funding neighborhood development projects and by creating an Urban Volunteer Corps. These efforts will be undertaken with the approval of local elected officials.

Increase access to opportunity for those disadvantaged by economic circumstance or a history of discrimination.

Provide additional social and health services to disadvantaged people in cities and communities.

Improve the urban physical environment and the cultural and aesthetic aspects of urban life by providing additional assistance for housing rehabilitation, mass transit, the arts, culture, parks and recreation facilities.

America's communities are an invaluable national asset. They are the centers of our culture, the incubators of new ideas and inventions, the centers of commerce and finance, and the homes of our great museums, libraries and theaters. Cities contain trillions of dollars of public and private investments—investments which we must conserve, rehabilitate and fully use.

The New Partnership I am proposing today will focus the full energies of my administration on a comprehensive, long-term effort. It will encourage States to redirect their own resources to support their urban areas more effectively. It will encourage local governments to streamline and coordinate their own activities. It will offer incentives to the private sector to make new investments in economically depressed communities. And it will involve citizens and neighborhood and voluntary organizations in meeting the economic and social needs of their communities.

The New Partnership will be guided by these principles:

Simplifying and improving programs and policy at all levels of government.

Combining the resources of Federal, State and local government, and using them as a lever to involve the even greater strength of our private economy to conserve and strengthen our cities and communities.

Being flexible enough to give help where it is most needed and to respond to the particular needs of each community.

Increasing access to opportunity for those disadvantaged by economic circumstances or history of discrimination.

And above all, drawing on the sense of community and voluntary effort that I believe is alive in America, and on the loyalty that Americans feel for their neighborhoods.

The need for a New Partnership is clear from the record of the last fifteen years. During the 1960's, the Federal government took a strong leadership role in responding to the problems of the cities. The Federal government attempted to identify the problems, develop the solutions and implement the programs. State and local governments and the private sector were not sufficiently involved. While many of these programs were successful, we learned an important lesson: that the Federal government alone has neither the resources nor the knowledge to solve all urban problems.

An equally important lesson emerged from the experience of the early 1970's. During this period, the Federal government retreated from its responsibilities, leaving States and localities with insufficient resources, interest or leadership to accomplish all that needed to be done. We learned that States and localities cannot solve the problems by themselves.

These experiences taught us that a successful urban policy must build a partnership that involves the leadership of the Federal government and the participation of all levels of government, the private sector, neighborhood and voluntary organizations and individual citizens.

PRIOR ACTIONS

The problems of our Nation's cities are complex and deep-seated. They have developed gradually over a generation as a result of private market and demographic forces and inadvertent government action; and the problems worsened markedly during the early 1970's.

These problems will not be solved immediately. They can be solved only by the long-term commitment which I offer today, and by the efforts of all levels of government, the private sector and neighborhood and voluntary organizations.

For my Administration, this commitment began on the day I took office and it will continue throughout my Presidency. With the cooperation of Congress, my Administration has already provided substantial increases in funding in many of the major urban assistance programs. Total assistance to State and local governments has increased by 25 percent, from $68 billion in FY 1977 to $85 billion in FY 1979. These increases are the direct result of actions we have taken during the past 14 months. They are as much a part of my Administration's urban policy as the initiatives which I am announcing today. Some of the most important programs have already been enacted into law or proposed to the Congress. These include:

A $2.7 billion increase over three years in the Community Development Block Grant Program, accompanied by a change in the formula to provide more assistance to the older and declining cities.

A $400 million a year Urban Development Action Grant Program providing assistance primarily to distressed cities.

An expansion of youth and training programs and an increase in the number of public service employment jobs, from 325,000 to 725,000. Expenditures for employment and training doubled from FY '77 to FY '79 to over $12 billion.

A $400 million private sector jobs proposal has been included in my proposal to reauthorize the CETA legislation. This initiative will encourage private businesses to hire the long-term unemployed and the disadvantaged.

A sixty-five percent increase in grants provided by the Economic Development Administration to urban areas.

A thirty-percent increase in overall Federal assistance to education, including a $400 million increase in the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, targeted in substantial part to large city school systems with a concentration of children from low-income families.

An economic stimulus package enacted last year (Anti-Recession Fiscal Assistance, Local Public Works and CETA) which provided almost $9 billion in additional aid to States and cities.

A welfare reform proposal which, upon passage, will provide immediate fiscal relief to State and local governments.

A doubling of outlays for the Section 312 housing rehabilitation loan program.

Creation of a consumer cooperative bank which would provide financing assistance to consumer cooperatives which have difficulty obtaining conventional financing.

IMPROVEMENTS IN EXISTING PROGRAMS

The Administration's Urban and Regional Policy Group (URPG) has examined all of the major urban assistance programs and proposed improvements. It also has worked with agencies traditionally not involved in urban policy, such as the Defense Department, the General Services Administration, and the Environmental Protection Agency, and has developed proposals to make their actions more supportive of urban areas. As a result of this massive effort, the Federal Government has become more sensitive to urban problems and more committed to their solutions.

The review of existing Federal programs has resulted in more than 150 improvements in existing programs. Most of these improvements can be undertaken immediately through administrative action. Some will require legislation. None will increase the Federal budget.

A few examples of the improvements are:

All agencies will develop goals and timetables for minority participation in their grants and contracts—five major agencies have already begun.

The Defense Department will set up a new program to increase procurement in urban areas.

EPA will modify its water and sewer program to discourage wasteful sprawl.

HUD has retargeted the Tandem Mortgage Assistance Program to provide greater support for urban housing.

The existing countercyclical fiscal assistance program will be retargeted to help governments with unemployment rates above the national average.

HUD and EDA are developing common planning and application requirements.

The General Services Administration will attempt to locate Federal facilities in cities whenever such a location is not inconsistent with the agency's mission.

The Department of Transportation has proposed legislation to consolidate many categories of urban highway and transit grants, and to standardize the local matching share. These steps will provide local governments with greater flexibility to develop transportation systems suited to their needs.

The Environmental Protection Agency will amend its regulations to accommodate new economic development in high pollution areas. Localities will be permitted to "bank" reductions in pollution which results from firms going out of business. These reductions then can be transferred to new firms locating in the community.

The effect of all these changes may be greater than even the substantial new initiatives which I have proposed in this message.

NEW INITIATIVES

The new initiatives which I am announcing today address five major urban needs:

1) Improving the operation of Federal, State and local governments.

2) Employment and Economic Development.

3) Fiscal Assistance.

4) Community and Human Development.

5) Neighborhoods and Voluntary Associations.

These initiatives require $4.4 billion in budget authority, $1.7 billion in new tax incentives, and $2.2 billion in guaranteed loan authority in FY 1979. For FY 1980 the budget authority will be $6.1 billion, the tax incentives $1.7 billion and the guaranteed loan authority $3.8 billion.

I. IMPROVING THE OPERATION OF FEDERAL STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENTS

FEDERAL PROGRAMS

Over the long run, reorganization of the economic and community development programs may be necessary. Last June, I directed my reorganization project staff in the Office of Management and Budget to begin exploring the reorganization options. They have completed the first stages of this work. During the next several months, they will consult with the Congress, State and local officials and the public to develop the best solution.

There are several actions I will take immediately.

URBAN AND COMMUNITY IMPACT ANALYSIS

I am implementing a process through my Domestic Policy Staff (DPS) and Office of Management and Budget (OMB) to ensure that we do not inadvertently take actions which contradict the goals of the urban policy. Each agency submitting a major domestic initiative must include its own urban and community impact analysis. DPS and OMB will review these submissions and will ensure that any anti-urban impacts of proposed Federal policies will be brought to my attention.

INTERAGENCY COORDINATING COUNCIL

To improve program coordination, I will form an Interagency Coordinating Council, composed of the Assistant Secretaries with major program responsibilities in the key urban departments. The Council will have two functions:

It will serve as a catalyst for operational improvements which cut across Departments (for example, instituting uniform grant applications); and it will encourage interagency cooperation on projects which are too large or too complex to be funded by one agency. This Council will, for the first time, provide a coordinated Federal response to communities which develop comprehensive and multi-year projects. It will have direction from the Executive Office of the President.

CONSOLIDATING PLANNING REQUIREMENTS AND OTHER MANAGEMENT IMPROVEMENTS

We soon will announce the consolidation of intra-agency planning requirements. I have asked the Director of the Office of Management and Budget to direct an interagency task force to improve the management of Federal grant-in-aid programs and consolidate the numerous planning requirements in the community and economic development grant programs.

IMPROVED DATA AND INFORMATION

I have asked the Secretary of Commerce, in her capacity as Chair of the Statistical Policy Coordination Committee, to design an improved urban data and information system. At the present time much of this data is inadequate or out of date.

THE ROLE OF STATE GOVERNMENTS

State government policies, even more than Federal policies, are important to the fiscal and economic health of cities. States affect their cities in a number of ways, including setting taxation and annexation powers, determining the placement of major development investments and apportioning the financial responsibility for welfare and education expenditures.

The Federal government has little or no control over these developments, all of which clearly affect the economic and fiscal health of cities and communities.

These State responsibilities underscore the need for an urban policy which includes the States as full and equal partners. The effectiveness of our urban policy will be enhanced if the States can be encouraged to complement the Federal effort.

To encourage States to support their urban areas, I will offer a new program of State incentive grants. These grants will be provided, on a discretionary basis, to States which adopt approved plans to help their cities and communities. The plans must be developed with the participation and approval of communities within the State. The grants will be provided to the States to finance a portion of the plan. The State Incentive Grant Program will be administered by HUD and will provide $400 million over two years.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT ROLE

Many communities and cities can improve management and planning improvements by reforming fiscal management practices, streamlining local regulatory procedures, and coordinating local community and economic development activities.

The Federal government provides planning and technical assistance to communities through HUD and Commerce to help cities improve their management and planning practices. These funds will be used increasingly to build the local government's capacity to undertake the necessary fiscal and management reforms.

The Federal Government will offer special consideration in discretionary programs to cities which achieve coordinated action at the local level.

II. EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

There is a serious shortage of jobs for many residents of our urban areas and a lack of investment to build the tax base of our cities.

The urban policy will address this issue in two ways.

In the short run, it will provide additional employment opportunities through a labor-intensive public works program, a targeted employment tax credit, and a private sector training and jobs initiative to encourage businesses to hire the hardcore unemployed, together with the extension I have already proposed in employment and training opportunities under the CETA Act.

In the long run, the policy attempts to rebuild the private sector economic base of these communities through a National Development Bank, a special tax incentive, an increase in economic development grants and other incentives.

LABOR-INTENSIVE PUBLIC WORKS

I ask Congress for $1 billion a year for a program of labor-intensive public works, targeted on communities with high unemployment. Half of the estimated 60,000 full-time equivalent jobs created annually by this program will be reserved for the disadvantaged and the long-term unemployed. These workers will be paid at Davis-Bacon trainee wage levels.

This program will enable cities to make needed repairs on buildings, streets, parks, and other public facilities.

In contrast to the Local Public Works program—which involves projects requiring large equipment, material expenditures and a prolonged planning period—more of the funds under this labor-intensive program will go to job creation.

TARGETED EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT

I also propose a Targeted Employment Tax Credit to encourage business to hire disadvantaged young workers between the ages of 18 and 24 who suffer the highest unemployment rates in the Nation.

Under my proposal, private employees of young and disadvantaged, or handicapped, workers would be entitled to claim a $2,000 tax credit for each eligible worker during the first year of employment and a $1,500 credit for each eligible worker during the second year.

I am proposing this Targeted Employment Tax Credit as a substitute for the expiring Employment Tax Credit. The current program costs $2.5 billion a year and has had little influence on hiring decisions. The Administration's targeted program will cost approximately $1.5 billion a year, with far greater impact.

LOCATION OF FEDERAL FACILITIES

I will sign a new Executive Order directing the General Services Administration to give first priority to cities in locating new Federal facilities or consolidating or relocating existing facilities. Under my Administration, Federal facilities will be located in cities, unless such a location is inconsistent with the agency's mission.

Federal buildings and facilities can be an important source of jobs and of rental payments and, in many cities, a principal stabilizing force preventing decline.

The Federal government should set an example for the private sector to invest in urban areas.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PROCUREMENT

To assure that Federal procurement is used to strengthen the economic base of our Nation's cities and communities, I will:

strengthen the implementation of the existing procurement set-aside program for labor surplus areas, by directing the General Services Administration to work with each agency to develop specific procurement targets and to monitor their implementation. GSA will report to me every six months on the progress of each Agency; direct the Defense Department to implement an experimental program to target more of its procurement to high unemployment areas.

NATIONAL DEVELOPMENT BANK

I propose the creation of a National Development Bank, which would encourage businesses to locate or expand in economically distressed urban and rural areas. The Bank would be authorized to guarantee investments totaling $11 billion through 1981.

To lower operating costs in urban areas, the Bank would provide long-term, low-cost financing which, in conjunction with expanded grant programs administered by HUD and EDA, will reduce a firm's financing costs by up to 60 percent.

The Bank uses four major financing tools:

Grants of up to 15 percent of a firm's total capital cost, to a maximum $3 million, for fixed assets of a project. The grants, which would be made under expanded EDA and HUD authorities, would cover expenditures for land assembly, site preparation, rehabilitation, and equipment.

Loan guarantees, provided by the Bank to cover three-quarters of the remaining capital costs up to a maximum of $15 million for project. The Bank could, at its discretion, reduce the interest rate down to 2½ percent for particularly desirable projects. Bank financing would be conditioned on obtaining 21 percent of the project's total costs from private lenders.

The ceiling for industrial reserve bonds in economically distressed areas would be increased from $5 to $20 million with the approval of the Bank. A business which used this financing for a project could also receive a grant.

The Bank also will provide a secondary loan market for private loans in eligible areas to finance capital expenditures. This will be particularly beneficial to small businesses.

Bank projects will require the approval of State or local government economic development entities, which would be responsible to the elected local leadership. Distressed urban and rural areas would be eligible. Additional employment would be a key test of project eligibility.

The Bank will be an interagency corporation, governed by a Board composed of the Secretaries of HUD, Commerce and the Treasury. This will insure coordination between the major economic, community development and urban finance agencies of the government.

The Office of Management and Budget is currently assessing the organization of the Federal economic and community development activities. The Bank will function on an interagency basis pending recommendations in this area.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT GRANTS

I propose substantial increases of $275 million each in the UDAG grant program and the EDA title IX program, These increases will be used in conjunction with the financing incentives available from the National Development Bank.

Taken together these major increases will help leverage substantial new private sector investment in urban areas and address the long-term economic deterioration experienced by certain urban and rural areas.

DIFFERENTIAL INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT

I propose that firms that locate or expand in economically distressed areas be eligible for a differential 5-percent investment tax credit, to a total of 15 percent for both structures and equipment. The credit would be available only to firms awarded "Certificates of Necessity" by the Commerce Department based on financing need and employment potential.

Commerce will be authorized to issue up to $200 million in certificates for each of the next 2 years.

AIR QUALITY PLANNING GRANTS

I propose a $25 million planning grant program to help cities and communities comply with the Clean Air Act without limiting severely new, private sector investment within their areas.

I have also asked EPA, HUD and EDA to provide technical assistance to help local governments reconcile potential conflicts between air pollution and economic development goals.

MINORITY BUSINESS

Minority businesses are a critical part of the private sector economic base of many cities, communities and neighborhoods, and provide important employment opportunities to city residents.

I propose today two important initiatives which will increase the role of minority businesses in our economy. First, in comparison with fiscal year 1977 levels, we will triple Federal procurement from minority businesses by the end of fiscal year 1979—an increase over our earlier commitment to double minority procurement.

In addition, I intend to ask all Federal agencies to include goals for minority business participation in their contract and grant-in-aid programs. Five agencies—HUD, Commerce, EPA, Interior and DOT—already have proposed improvements in minority business programs. These programs all build on our successful experience with the Local Public Works Program.

Finally, I intend to facilitate greater interaction between the minority business community and the leaders of our Nation's largest corporations.

COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT CORPORATIONS

I propose that an additional $20 million be appropriated to the Community Services Administration as venture capital for the most effective Community Development Corporations. This assistance will help them have a substantial impact on their designated areas.

The funding will be made available for projects that receive support from local elected officials, involve leveraging private sector funds and are coordinated with HUD, EDA or the Small Business Administration.

ROLE OF PRIVATE FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

An effective urban strategy must involve private financial institutions. I am asking the independent financial regulatory agencies to develop appropriate actions, consistent with safe, sound and prudent lending practices, to encourage financial institutions to play a greater role in meeting the credit needs of their communities.

First, I am requesting that financial regulatory agencies determine what further actions are necessary to halt the practice of redlining—the refusal to extend credit without a sound economic justification. I will encourage those agencies to develop strong, consistent and effective regulations to implement the Community Reinvestment Act.

Second, I propose the creation of an Institute for Community Investment, under the Federal Home Loan Bank Board. The Institute will bring together appraisers, realtors, lenders, building and insurance companies to develop a consistent approach toward urban lending and to train urban lending specialists.

Third, I propose a pilot program to create Neighborhood Commercial Reinvestment Centers under the Comptroller of the Currency. This proposal is an adaptation of the highly successful Urban Reinvestment Task Force housing credit concept to the commercial credit area. Neighborhood Commercial Reinvestment Centers will be local organizations, comprised of merchants and neighborhood residents, local government officials, and commercial banks which will provide business credit in urban neighborhoods. SBA, EDA, and HUD will work with the financial regulatory agencies to revitalize specific commercial areas.

Finally, I have asked the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development to chair an interagency task force to evaluate the availability of credit in urban areas and recommend appropriate further action. I have asked the task force to examine and make recommendations with respect to the following areas:

The availability of mortgage and commercial credit in urban areas, and the impacts of the activities of Federal agencies on such credit;

Existing mortgage insurance, casualty insurance and business credit insurance programs;

The full range of urban credit and insurance risk reduction techniques.

III. FISCAL ASSISTANCE

While the fiscal condition of many State and local governments has improved dramatically over the last three years, many cities and communities still are experiencing severe problems. These cities and communities require fiscal assistance from the Federal government, if they are to avoid severe service cutbacks or tax increases.

SUPPLEMENTAL FISCAL ASSISTANCE

Cities and communities currently receive fiscal assistance through the Anti-Recession Fiscal Assistance Act (ARFA), which expires on September 30, 1978. This program has been an effective tool for helping States and local governments withstand the fiscal impact of high unemployment.

Current unemployment projections, however, suggest that even if the ARFA program were extended in its current form, it would phase out by mid-FY 1979, when unemployment is expected to drop below six percent. If the program is permitted to phase out, many cities and communities will experience severe fiscal strain.

I propose today that ARFA be replaced with a Supplemental Fiscal Assistance Program, which will provide $1 billion of fiscal assistance annually for the next two fiscal years to local governments experiencing significant fiscal strain. Further extension of this program will be considered together with General Revenue Sharing.

FISCAL RELIEF IN WELFARE PROPOSAL

In addition, I propose to phase in the fiscal relief component of the Better Jobs and Income Act as soon as Congress passes this legislation, rather than in 1981 as originally planned.

IV. COMMUNITY AND HUMAN DEVELOPMENT

A comprehensive program to revitalize America's cities must provide for community and human needs. This involves both physical facilities, such as parks, recreation facilities, housing and transportation systems, and the provision of health and social services.

HOUSING REHABILITATION

The conservation and upgrading of our housing stock is important to maintaining the strength of urban areas. Housing rehabilitation improves the quality of community life and provides construction jobs in areas of high unemployment.

I propose an additional $150 million in FY 1979 for the Section 312 rehabilitation loan program, which will more than double the existing program. This expanded effort will permit the rehabilitation of small multi-family housing projects in distressed neighborhoods.

URBAN TRANSPORTATION

In many cities, public transportation is inadequately financed. The Federal government has begun to make substantial investments to rehabilitate, revitalize and construct urban transportation systems.

I have already submitted to Congress my proposals to extend and strengthen the highway and mass transit programs.

To supplement these efforts I today propose an additional $200 million for capital investments in intermodal urban transportation projects. These funds will be used to link existing transportation facilities in selected cities.

RESOURCE RECOVERY PLANNING

Solid waste disposal is a growing problem in the many urban areas which face a shortage of landfill sites. At the same time, techniques to recover valuable resources and energy from solid waste have emerged.

I will request $15 million for the EPA to provide grants of $300,000 to $400,000 to cities for feasibility studies of solid waste recovery systems.

ARTS AND CULTURE

Cities are centers of culture and art, which thrive on the vitality of the urban environment.

To help renew and develop this artistic and cultural spirit, I propose a new Livable Cities program administered by the Department of Housing and Urban Development, with the participation of the National Endowment for the Arts. This program will provide up to $20 million in grants to States and communities for neighborhood- and community-based arts programs, urban design and planning, and the creation and display of art in public spaces. Historic preservation of buildings should also be encouraged.

URBAN PARKS AND RECREATION

The quality of life in urban areas is critically affected by the availability of open spaces and recreation facilities. Yet hard pressed communities often lack the resources to maintain and invest adequately in these amenities.

To address this problem, I propose a major new Federal grant program. Urban communities will compete for funds to revive and rebuild parks and recreation facilities. Challenge grants totalling $150 million will be provided for construction and major rehabilitation of urban recreation systems, such as parks, tennis and basketball courts, swimming pools, bicycle paths, and other facilities. Cities will be awarded grants based on the quality of their planning, the degree of need and their ability to match the Federal funds with private and local contributions.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Urban revitalization efforts must be accompanied by efforts to help those in need to improve their own lives. A variety of income support and social service programs are designed to do this. Since 1974, however, the support given to State social service programs by the Federal government has declined in real terms.

I propose an additional $150 million of new budget authority for the Title XX program. These funds will be used to improve the delivery of social services in urban areas—ranging from Meals on Wheels for the elderly to day care for children of working mothers—and to develop greater coordination between local, public and private agencies.

HEALTH SERVICES

Nearly 50 million Americans live in areas without adequate health services. These areas, many of which are in inner cities, suffer from higher infant mortality rates, greater poverty and shortages of health care personnel.

In underserved areas, emergency room and outpatient departments of city hospitals are used as the routine source of medical care by the poor, primarily due to the lack of private physicians. As these departments were not designed to provide comprehensive medical care, the hospital resources are strained and the poor often go without adequate care.

To help meet the primary health care needs of the urban poor and reduce the strain on city hospitals, I propose to expand federally-supported Community Health Centers and to fund city-sponsored programs which provide comprehensive, but less costly, primary care services. The city-sponsored programs will enroll the medically indigent in existing health systems, such as HMOs. They also will help expand locally-supported centers, reform hospital outpatient departments and provide comprehensive health services.

EDUCATION

Schools are the focus of community activities in many places. Yet they are seldom fully used or linked to other community and social services.

I intend to provide $1.5 million to expand the experimental Cities in Schools program which seeks to bridge the gap by uniting a number of social services within schools to better serve both students and their families. We intend to expand this promising new program to 10 pilot schools.

In addition, I urge the Congress to enact the $600 million increase in the Title I program of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, which I recently proposed, including my recommendation that $400 million of these funds be targeted to cities and other areas with high concentrations of low-income families.

V. NEIGHBORHOODS AND VOLUNTEER ORGANIZATIONS

No resource of our urban communities is more valuable than the commitment of our citizens.

Volunteer groups, which gain strength from the selfless efforts of many individuals, make an indispensable contribution to their cities.

URBAN VOLUNTEER CORPS

I propose a $40 million program in ACTION to increase the effectiveness of voluntary activities at the local level. With the agreement of local government, the program will create a corps of volunteers at the local level and match their skills with the needs of local governments and community and neighborhood organizations.

It also will provide small grants averaging $5,000 for voluntary improvement and beautification projects.

ACTION would select, with the concurrence of local government, a lead agency in each city to administer the Urban Volunteer Corps.

SELF-HELP DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Neighborhood associations are playing a key role in housing and neighborhood revitalization. We must strengthen that role.

I will request $15 million in FY 1979 for a self-help development program to be administered by the Office for Neighborhoods in HUD.

This new program will provide funds for specific housing and revitalization projects in poor and low-income areas. Each project would involve the participation of local residents, the private sector and local government and would require the concurrence of the mayor.

CRIME PREVENTION

Street crime is a serious problem in America's cities and communities. Over the last few years a number of promising initiatives have been undertaken by community groups and local law enforcement agencies to combat street crime. Escort services for the elderly, centers to help the victims of crime, and neighborhood watchers are examples of promising developments.

I propose a program which will add $10 million in new resources to existing efforts in the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration for a program operated jointly by ACTION and LEAA. Under this program, mayors and local neighborhood groups will develop community crime prevention programs based on successful pilot models. My reorganization proposals for LEAA and the legislation I will submit to extend the Law Enforcement Assistance Act will strengthen our efforts at crime prevention.

COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT CREDIT UNIONS

Some urban communities are not served by any financial institutions. Community Development Credit Unions address this problem by investing their assets in the communities in which they are established. This type of credit union was first established under the poverty programs in the 1960's. About 225 exist today, and many are the only financial institutions in their communities.

I am proposing a $12 million program to provide $200,000 seed capital for new Community Development Credit Unions, to provide them with an operating subsidy for staff, training and technical assistance.

The job of revitalizing the urban communities of our country will not be done overnight. Problems which have accumulated gradually over generations cannot be solved in a year or even in the term of a President.

But I believe that a New Partnership—bringing together in a common effort all who have a stake in the future of our communities—can bring us closer to our long-term goals. We can make America's cities more attractive places in which to live and work; we can help the people of urban America lead happier and more useful lives. But we can only do it together.

JIMMY CARTER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 27, 1978.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a message from the President of the United States, relative to national urban policy, be jointly referred to the Committees on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs; Governmental Affairs; Finance; Environment and Public Works; and Human Resources.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REPORT OF THE CORPORATION FOR PUBLIC BROADCASTING—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 163

Under authority of the order of March 23, 1978, the Secretary of the Senate, on March 28, 1978, received the following message from the President of the United States which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation:

To the Congress of the United States:

Enclosed is the "Annual Report of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting for FY 1977," prepared in accordance with the requirement of Section 396(i) of the Public Broadcasting Act of 1967 (Public Law 90–129) as amended.

The Corporation has again prepared a thoughtful report which highlights its efforts for the past fiscal year. The accomplishments of public broadcasting are well articulated with emphasis on television and radio programming, technological innovation, and human development services.

It should be noted that the projections of long range Federal financial contributions from the Federal Government exceed levels contained in the Administration's legislative proposal to reauthorize the Corporation for the period FY 1981–85.

The Annual Report is being forwarded so that it is available to the Congress for its deliberations.

JIMMY CARTER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 28, 1978.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES SUBMITTED DURING RECESS

Under authority of the order of March 23, 1978, Mr. STENNIS, on March 30, 1978, from the Committee on Armed Services, reported favorably the nomination of Lt. Gen. Robert H. Barrow, U.S. Marine Corps, to the grade of general, and the nomination was placed on the Executive Calendar.

In addition, there were 138 in the Air Force and Air National Guard and Reserve for promotion to the grade of colonel and below (list beginning with James D. Simms); and, in the Reserve of the Army there were 920 for promotion to the grade of colonel and below (list beginning with Salomon Abeyta). Since these names have already appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and to save the expense of printing again, they were ordered to lie on the Secretary's Desk for the information of the Senate.

(The nominations ordered to lie on the Secretary's desk were printed in the RECORD of March 6, 1978, at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

The following bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as indicated:

By Mr. WEICKER:

S. 2816. A bill to establish a program to improve the commercial fisheries of the United States; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

By Mr. BROOKE (for himself and Mr. KENNEDY):

S. 2817. A bill to provide for the establishment of the Lowell National Historical Park in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

By Mr. CHURCH (for himself and Mr. HANSEN) (by request):

S. 2818. A bill to amend and supplement the acreage limitation and residency provisions of the Federal reclamation laws, as amended and supplemented, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

By Mr. McGOVERN:

S. 2819. A bill to improve rail freight transportation and the transportation of passengers by common carriers by motor vehicle; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. WEICKER:

S. 2816. A bill to establish a program to improve the commercial fisheries of the United States; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

COMMERCIAL FISHERIES DEVELOPMENT ACT

● Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, over the past year, the Senate Small Business Committee continued its review of the economic conditions of the domestic fishing industry. Last December the committee held a regional hearing on this matter in Groton, Conn. It was the first congressional assessment of the industry since the enactment of the 200-mile limit law.

Despite the fact we are blessed with the world's fourth largest coastline, and the third largest continental shelf, the commercial fishing industry has failed to grow over the past 25 years. During this period, U.S. fish catch remained static, while this Nation's consumption for fish products doubled, resulting in a trade deficit of $1.5 billion.

Now, with the enactment of the 200-mile limit law, the domestic industry has a tremendous opportunity to reach its full economic potential. Over the past year, foreign catches have been dramatically reduced. The 1977 foreign catch, 1.7 million tons, was about 1 million tons less than the 1976 foreign catch and approximattely half that of the peak year, 1974.

Enjoying new legal protections, the committee noticed a resurgence of activity and interest in the industry. In New England, alone, 35 vessels were constructed last year. Recent studies project that, with the enforcement of the 200-mile limit, domestic fishing industry catches will double in 5 to 7 years.

Despite this favorable outlook, private lending institutions are still reluctant to invest. The risks and uncertainties associated with the industry will continue to dampen investments by the private sector. As Clinton Wynn, vice president of Rhode Island Hospital Trust National Bank, stated at the December hearing:

> Although we envision increased investments in the fishing industry from the private sector, we think that these funds may not be adequate enough for the immediate and future needs of the industry.

Mr. President, it is clear that the Government has an important role to play in insuring the orderly development of commercial fisheries in the United States. Today several Federal agencies, including the National Marine Fisheries Service, Department of Agriculture, and the Small Business Administration provide some form of financial assistance to the fishing industry. However, the committee found that these programs were not being fully utilized. There were two principal reasons. First, many of the agencies involved lacked the expertise to effectively deal with the unique economic problems confronting the industry. Second, the programs were tangled in excessive redtape and regulations.

By passing the landmark Fisheries Conservation and Management Act, Congress dramatically improved the economic climate of the domestic fishing industry. Now, it is time to fundamentally restructure our assistance programs in order to take advantage of this new situation.

Today, I am introducing the Commercial Fisheries Development Act of 1978. This proposal is designed to make the industry a strong, prosperous internationally viable enterprise.

In order to improve the productive capacity of our Nation's commercial fisheries, it is essential that we develop the industry in a manner that will increase operational efficiency, boost the rate of return on investment, encourage the harvesting of underutilized species, and insure the perpetuality of the species. A strong fishing industry will mean jobs at home and a more favorable balance of payments situation.

To achieve these objectives, this legislation would authorize the creation of a new office—the Office of Commercial Fisheries within the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration—to administer a wide-ranging commercial fisheries development package. For the first time, the Federal Government would establish a coordinated and comprehensive approach to commercial fisheries development.

One part of this development package would consist of a fisheries loan guarantee program and a low interest loan program to ecnourage development of underutilized species. Coupled with this, a research and development grant program would be established for new fisheries.

Mr. President, under the existing Merchant Marine Act, loan guarantees are presently available only for fishing vessel construction. For this fiscal year, a loan guarantee authority of $50 million would be available for this limited purpose. In creating a comprehensive fisheries loan guarantee program, the legislation I have introduced would remove vessel construction from the merchant marine loan guarantee program.

Under this bill, the new Federal fisheries loan guarantees could be used for the construction or rehabilitation and purchase of fishing vessels or shoreside facilities. In addition, a maximum of $750 million of Federal loan guarantees would be available for fisheries assistance with the Government authorized to guarantee up to 87½ percent of the principal on the loan.

The Merchant Marine Act would also be amended to include in its tax deferred capital construction fund, shoreside facilities. Thus, owners of processing plants would enjoy the same tax advantages as vessel owners. It would allow these owners to defer a portion of their income from taxation provided that the proceeds from such funds are used for construction or rehabilitation of shoreside facilities or fishing vessels.

A second major assistance program created by this legislation is designed to help the industry in harvesting and processing a wider variety of fish. With the prospect of domestic quotas being placed on overfished species, such as haddock or cod, it has become evident that domestic fishermen will have to turn to species not previously eaten by Americans.

New species of fish, previously harvested by foreign fleets are now available to the domestic industry, provided they are caught and utilized as food fish. Howard Nickerson, executive director of the New England Fisheries Steering Committee, summarized the vessel requirements caused by these conditions:

> We do need rehabilitation of older vessels, the installation of refrigerated fish holds, chilled seawater systems, electronics and hydraulic controls and hauling gear, different type nets will have to be used and rig changes made, because we have a problem.

A similar adaptation must be made in the onshore facilities. With the prospects of domestic quotas being placed on cod and haddock for 1978, witnesses indicated that domestic fishermen will have to turn to species not presently eaten by Americans. However, processing plants are not geared to handle these type of fish, such as squid, mackerel and whiting.

Many of these underutilized species are considered delicacies in Europe. There is a great potential for domestic involvement in the international export market. This would involve the development of facilities to freeze blocs of fish for foreign consumption.

Witnesses at the hearings noted that, unless some incentives are provided, funds probably would not be available for financing vessels which would fish for underutilized species or for facilities to process these species. Since there would be no immediate demand for these products, the ventures would be too risky.

In recognition of these economic facts of life, this proposal would establish a low interest Federal loan program for harvesting or processing of underutilized species.

The interest rate on the loan would be no greater than the current borrowing rate and no less than 3 percent with a maturity of up to 25 years in the case of fishing vessels, and 30 years for loans pertaining to fisheries facilities.

Mr. President, as in any new venture, the development of new fisheries will require unique marketing and promotion techniques. New fish products will have to overcome consumer skepticism. Vessels and fisheries facilities will have to adapt in order to effectively handle underutilized species. To assist the industry in this adjustment period, this legislation would create a fisheries research and development grant program.

Projects, approved for funding by the Secretary, would be designed to:

First. Increase yields of fish products, and create better ways to preserve and process fish;

Second. Promote underutilized species by making them more appealing to the consumer;

Third. Increase markets for fish and fish products, both nationally and internationally.

A Fisheries Development Board, consisting of commercial fishermen, producers, and processors of fish products, would be established within 90 days after the enactment of this legislation. This Board would review and submit recommendations to the Secretary of Commerce on research, development and promotion projects. The Board would also assist the Secretary in the contracting of approved projects.

This legislation envisions the industry playing the major role in this applied research and development program. They have the knowledge and experience to take the lead in such experimental activities. Yet, under this bill, the industry would bear 25 percent of the work of the project. Thus, they have a significant financial stake in its successful completion.

As well as meeting the immediate needs of new fisheries, S. 2816 directs the Secretary of Commerce, within 1 year, to enact a long range research and development program through basic scientific research, the Secretary will seek to determine; the sustainable yield, life histories, behavorial patterns; and stock distribution of underutilized species.

Mr. President, a reliable market for fish stocks are essential for the long term growth of the industry. To bolster consumer confidence in fish products, title III of the legislation establishes a Federal fish inspection program, which would promulgate minimum health and safety standards. The legislation authorizes $20 million for the Secretary of Commerce to create regional fish inspection programs.

This legislation also would establation authorizes $20 million for the lish a 4-year pilot program to improve fishermen's cooperatives. By their very nature, fishermen are a diverse and independent group. However, by joining together for a common economic purpose, they would become a more effective force in the marketplace. Title IV of S. 2816 would provide management and technical assistance necessary for creating and maintaining cooperatives.

Mr. President. I believe this comprehensive legislation will provide the Congress with a vehicle to effectively assist this essential industry. This legislation integrates the insights and comments of many experts in this field and reflects major improvements over previous legislation that I have introduced. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2816

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Commercial Fisheries Development Act".

SEC. 2. CONGRESSIONAL FINDINGS AND PURPOSES.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds and declares the following:

(1) The commercial fisheries of the United States are an important industry providing a significant number of jobs and revenue to the national economy. By more effectively utilizing resources in the Fishery Conservation Zone, the economic potential of this industry will be realized.

(2) The existing United States commercial fishing fleet and facilities are inadequate to meet the current and future national need and demand for fisheries products or to provide for full domestic utilization of resources in the Fishery Conservation Zone.

(3) Federal development programs for commercial fisheries are inadequate to meet present and future national needs and to stimulate full domestic utilization of resources in the Fishery Conservation Zone.

(4) Many species in the Fishery Conservation Zone are commercially underutilized by the domestic fishing industry.

(b) PURPOSES.—It is therefore declared to be the purposes of the Congress in this Act—

(1) to increase the capability and efficiency of the commercial fisheries industry of the United States;

(2) to strengthen the competitive position of the United States commercial fisheries industry with respect to foreign harvesters and processors, thereby resulting in increased economic stability in the domestic industry and full domestic utilization of fish available in the Fishery Conservation Zone.

(3) to conserve and manage fish under United States jurisdiction in the national interest;

(4) to provide for increased financial assistance, including access to developmental capital, for the United States commercial fisheries industry;

(5) to encourage increased development of domestically underutilized species through research, development, and promotion.

(6) to establish a mandatory Federal fish products inspection program;

(7) to provide for the institutional framework that will assist the commercial fisheries industries in solving its problems;

(8) to provide technical and financial assistance to the United States fishing industry to establish fisheries cooperatives and to assist the industry in complying with the mandatory Federal fish and fish products inspection program;

(9) to provide for effective coordination of Federal manpower training programs in commercial fisheries; and

(10) to provide a central office to effectively administer Federal commercial fisheries development programs.

SEC. 3. DEFINITIONS.

As used in this Act, the term—

(1) "Board" means the Fisheries Development Board established pursuant to this Act;

(2) "citizen of the United States" means any person who is a United States citizen by law, birth, or naturalization, any State, any agency of a State or a group of States, or any corporation, partnership, or association organized under the laws of any State which has as its president or other chief executive officer and as its chairman of the board of directors, or holder of a similar office, a person who is a United States citizen by law, birth, or naturalization, and which has at least 75 percent of the interest of therein owned by citzens of the United States. Seventy-five percent of the interest in the corporation shall not be deemed to be owned by citizens of the United States—

(A) if the title to 75 percent of its stock is not vested in such citizens free from any trust of fiduciary obligation in favor of any person not a citizen of the United States;

(B) if 75 percent of the voting power in such corporation is not vested in citizens of the United States;

(C) if through any contract or understanding it is so arranged that more than 25 percent of the voting power may be exercised, directly or indirectly, in behalf of any person who is not a citizen of the United States; or

(D) if by any other means whatsoever control of any interest in the corporation in excess of 25 percent is conferred upon or permitted to be exercised by any person who is not a citizen of the United States;

(3) "commercial fisheries industry" means all commercial aspects of taking, processing, handling, distributing, and marketing of fish and fish products;

(4) "fish" means any species of living aquatic resources excluding aquatic mammals and birds;

(5) "fish products" means any product which is made wholly or in part from any fish or portion thereof, except products which contain fish only in small proportions and which are exempted from definition as a fishery product by the Secretary;

(6) "fishery" means the business, organized activity, or act of fishing for a particular stock or species of fish;

(7) "fisheries facilities" means new or used landing, receiving, processing, storage, and distribution facilities, together with all necessary equipment, including land where appropriate;

(8) "fishing" means the catching, taking, harvesting, or attempted catching, taking, or harvesting, of any fish for commercial purposes;

(9) "fishing vessel" means any new or used vessel, boat, ship, or other type of craft, together with all necessary gear and equipment, which is commercially used for, or of a type which is normally commercially used for—

(A) fishing, or

(B) aiding or assisting in the performance of any activity relating to fishing, including but not limited to preparation, supply, storage, refrigeration, transportation, or processing of fish;

(10) "forced economic distress" means action caused by Federal regulation, as promulgated by the Secretary of Commerce pursuant to the Fisheries Conservation and Management Act, that forces a fishery to cease or curtail operations on a long or short term basis;

(11) "Government's cost of money" means, as determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, the average market yield on outstanding U.S. Treasury obligations of comparable maturity;

(12) "person" includes an individual, a public or private corporation, a partnership or other association, or a Government agency.

(13) "process", "processed", and "processing", with respect to fish or fish products, means to harvest, handle, store, prepare, produce, manufacture, pack, transport, or hold such products.

(14) "Secretary" means the Secretary of Commerce;

(15) "State" means any State of the United States, the District of Columbia, or any Commonwealth, Territory, or possession of the United States.

(16) "underutilized species" means a fish species or group of fish species that are identified as available but either not domestically harvested or domestically harvested at insignificant levels pursuant to criteria set forth by the Secretary; and

(17) "wholesale purchaser" means any person who purchases fish or fish products for the purpose of resale or other commerce.

TITLE I—COMMERCIAL FISHERIES DEVELOPMENT FUND

SEC. 101. GUARANTEES OF OBLIGATIONS FOR COMMERCIAL FISHERIES.

(a)(1) The Secretary may, subject to the provisions of this section, guarantee, or make a commitment to guarantee, the payment of interest on, and the principal amount of, any obligation issued by an obligor for any of the following purposes:

(A) The financing and refinancing (including reimbursement of amounts previously expanded) of the cost of constructing, reconstructing, or reconditioning commercial fishing vessels and fisheries facilities except that no reimbursement may be guaranteed under this section later than 5 years after the date of construction, reconstruction, or reconditioning.

(B) The financing of the acquisition of used vessels or fisheries facilities in connection with their reconstruction or reconditioning.

(C) The refinancing of any existing obligation issued for any of the purposes specified in subparagraph (A) whether or not guaranteed under this section, including, but not limited to, any obligation incurred for the purpose of obtaining temporary funds.

(D) Guarantees and commitments to guarantee may be made under this section without regard to section 3679(a) of the Revised Statutes of the United States (31 U.S.C. 665(a)). (2) The full faith and credit of the United States is pledged to the payment of all guarantees made under this section with respect to both principal and interest, including any interest which may accrue between the date of default under a guaranteed obligation and the payment in full of the guarantee. (3) Any guarantee, or commitment to guarantee, made by the Secretary under this section shall be conclusive evidence of the eligibility of the obligation for such guarantee, and the validity of any guarantee, or commitment of guarantee, so made shall be incontestable.

(4) The aggregate unpaid principal amount of all obligations guaranteed under this section and outstanding at any one time shall not exceed $750,000,000.

(b)(1) Obligations guaranteed under this section—

(A) shall have an obligor approved by the Secretary as being responsible and possessing the ability, experience, financial resources, and other qualifications necessary for the adequate operation and maintenance of the commercial fishing vessels or fisheries facilities;

(B) shall be in an aggregate principal amount which does not exceed 87½ percent of the actual cost, or the depreciated actual cost, as determined by the Secretary, of construction, reconstruction, or reconditioning,

(C) shall have maturity dates satisfactory to the Secretary, but not to exceed 25 years;

(D) shall provide for payments by the obligor satisfactory to the Secretary; and

(E) shall bear interest (exclusive of charges for the guarantee and service charges, if any) at rates not to exceed such percentage per annum on the unpaid principal as the Secretary determines to be reasonable. The Secretary may allow a rate of interest higher than otherwise allowable when the obligee conducts the basic economic feasibility and credit investigation for the Secretary's review and agrees to finance, on an unguaranteed basis, not less than 20% of the cost of construction, reconstruction, or reconditioning.

(2) No obligation shall be guaranteed under this section unless the obligor conveys or agrees to convey to the Secretary such security interest as the Secretary may require to reasonably protect the interests of the United States.

(c)(1) The Secretary may charge a fee for any obligation guaranteed under this section, the amount of which shall be established by the Secretary by regulation but which may not exceed 1 percent per annum of the outstanding principal balance of the obligation. Fee payments shall be made by the obligor to the Secretary when moneys are first advanced under a guaranteed obligation and at least 60 days before each anniversary date thereafter.

(2) The Secretary shall charge and collect from the obligor such amounts as he may deem reasonable for the investigation of the application for any guarantee, for the appraisal of properties offered as security for any guarantee, and for the inspection of such properties during construction, reconstruction, or reconditioning; except that such charges shall not aggregate more than one-half of 1 percent of the principal amount of the obligation to be guaranteed.

(3) All fees and other amounts received by the Secretary under the provisions of this subsection shall be deposited in the Fund established pursuant to section 103.

(4) Obligations guaranteed under this section, and agreements relating thereto, shall contain such other provisions with respect to the protection of the security interests of the United States (including acceleration and subrogation provisions and the issuance of notes by the obligor to the Secretary), liens and releases of liens, payments of taxes, and such other matters as the Secretary may prescribe.

(d)(1) In the event of a default, which has continued for 30 days, in any payment by the obligor of principal or interest due under any obligation guaranteed under this section, the obligee or his agent shall have the right to demand, at or before the expiration of such period as may be specified in the guarantee or related arrangements, but not later than 90 days from the date of such default, payment by the Secretary of the unpaid principal amount of said obligation and of the unpaid interest thereon to the date of payment. Within such period as may be specified in the guarantee or related agreements, but not later than 30 days from the date of such demand, the Secretary shall promptly pay to the obligee or his agent the unpaid principal amount of the obligation and unpaid interest thereon to the date of payment; except that the Secretary shall not be required to make such payment if before the expiration of such period he finds that there was no default by the obligor in the payment of principal or interest or that such default has been remedied before any such demand.

(2) In the event the obligee does not make a demand on a defaulted installment before 90 days from the date of such default, that portion of the guarantee which represents the defaulted installment shall be lost but the remainder of the guarantee shall continue in full force and effect.

(3) Payments required to be made by the Secretary under paragraph (1) shall be made by the Secretary from the Fund established pursuant to section 103.
